"I will spend the night of the last day of the year with you and I assure you that your friend, as our spectator, will see and hear nothing which can lead him to suppose that you have revealed his secret to me. Be sure that I will play my role perfectly. If man's duty is to be ever the slave of his reason, if he must, so far as he is able, permit himself nothing without taking reason as his guide, I can never understand how a man can be ashamed of letting a friend see him at a moment when he is giving the greatest proofs of love to a very beautiful woman. Such is my situation. Yet I must tell you that if you had forewarned me the first time you would have done wrong. I would have refused absolutely. I should have thought that my honor was involved; I should have thought that, in inviting me to supper, you were only the willing accomplice of a friend, a strange man dominated by this strange taste, and I would have formed such an unfavorable opinion of you that it would perhaps have cured me of my love, which at that time was only beginning to bud. Such, my charmer, is the human heart; but at present the case is different. Everything you have told me about your worthy friend has shown me his character, I consider him my friend too, and I love him. If a feeling of shame does not keep you from letting him see you fond and loving with me, how—far from being ashamed of it—can I fail to be proud of it? Can a man blush at what makes him proud? I cannot, my dear, either blush over having conquered you or over letting myself be seen in moments when I flatter myself I shall not appear unworthy of your conquest. Yet I know that, by a natural feeling which reason cannot disapprove, most men feel a repugnance to letting themselves be seen at such moments. Those who cannot give good reasons for their repugnance must have something of the cat in their nature; but they can have good reasons for it and yet feel under no obligation to explain them to anyone. The chief reason is probably that a third person who is looking on and whom they see cannot but distract them, and that any distraction can only lessen the pleasure of intercourse. Another important reason could also be considered legitimate, that is, if the actors knew that their means of obtaining pleasure would appear pitiable to those who should witness them. Such unfortunates are right in not wishing to arouse feelings of pity in the performance of an act which would seem more properly to arouse jealousy. But we know, my dear, that we certainly do not arouse feelings of pity. Everything you have told me makes me certain that your friend's angelic soul must, in seeing us, share our pleasures. But do you know what will happen, and what I shall be very sorry for, since your lover can only be a most likable man? Seeing us will drive him frantic, and he will either run away or have to come out of his hiding place and go down on his knees to me, begging me to give you up to the violence of his amorous desires in his need to calm the fire which our transports will have kindled in his soul. If that happens I will laugh and give you up to him; but I will leave, for I feel that I could not remain the unmoved spectator of what some other man might do to you. So good-by, my angel; all will be well. I hasten to seal this letter, and I will take it to your casino this instant.''

I spent these six holidays with my friends and at the Ridotto,[9] which at that period was opened on St. Stephen's Day. As I could not deal, since only patricians wearing the official robe[10] were allowed to make bank there, I played day and night, and I constantly lost. Whoever punts cannot but lose. The loss of four or five thousand zecchini, which was my entire wealth, only made my love stronger.

At the end of the year 1774 a law issued by the Great Council forbade all games of chance and caused the closing of the Ridotto, as it was called. The Great Council was amazed when it saw, on counting the ballots, that it had passed a law which it could not pass, for at least three quarters of those who had cast ballots had not wanted it, and yet three quarters of the ballot proved that they had wanted it. The voters looked at one another in astonishment. It was a visible miracle of the glorious Evangelist St. Mark, who had been invoked by Signor Flangini, then First Corrector,[11] now a Cardinal, and by the three State Inquisitors.

On the appointed day I arrived at the casino at the usual hour, and there was the beautiful M. M. dressed as a woman of fashion, standing with her back to the fireplace.

"My friend," she said, "has not yet come; but as soon as he is here I will give you a wink."

"Where is the place?"

"There. Look at the back of that sofa against the wall. All the flowers in relief which you see have holes in their centers which go through to the closet behind. There is a bed, a table, and everything a man needs to stay there for seven or eight hours entertaining himself by watching what is done here. You shall see it when you wish."

"Did he have it built himself?"

"Certainly not, for he could not foresee that it might be of use to him."

"I understand that the spectacle may give him great pleasure; but since he cannot have you when nature will give him the greatest need of you, what will he do?"

"That is his concern. Besides, he is free to go if he is bored, and he can sleep, but if you are natural he will enjoy it."

"I shall be, except that I shall be more polite."

"No politeness, my dear, for you will at once become unnatural. Where did you ever hear of two lovers in the fury of love thinking of being polite?"

"You are right, dear heart; but I will be delicate."

"That you may, just as you always are. Your letter pleased me. You treated the subject thoroughly."

M. M. was wearing nothing over her hair, but it was negligently dressed. A sky-blue quilted dress was her only attire. She had on ear-buttons studded with brilliants; her neck was completely bare. A fichu of silk gauze and silver thread, arranged in haste, half revealed the beauty of her bosom and displayed its whiteness where her dress opened in front. She had on slippers. Her shy and modestly smiling face seemed to be saying: "This is the person you love." What I found most unusual and what pleased me excessively was her rouge, which was applied as the court ladies apply it in Versailles. The charm of such painting lies in the carelessness with which it is placed on the cheeks. The rouge is not meant to look natural, it is put on to please the eyes, which see in it the tokens of an intoxication which promises them amorous transports and furies. She said that she had put on rouge to please her lover, who liked it. I answered that such a taste led me to think him French. When I said this she winked at me: her friend had arrived. So it was then that the comedy was to begin.

"The more I look at your face, the more angry I am at your spouse."

"They say he was ugly."

"It has been said: so he deserves to be cuckolded, and we shall work at it all night. I have lived in celibacy for the past week, but I need to eat, for I have nothing in my stomach but a cup of chocolate and the whites of six fresh eggs which I ate in a salad dressed with Lucca oil[12] and Four Thieves vinegar." [13]

"You must be ill."

"Yes; but I shall be well when I have distilled them one by one into your amorous soul."

"I did not know that you were in need of frustratoires." [14]

"Who could need them with you? But my fear is reasonable, for if I miss you, I will blow out my brains."

"What does 'miss' mean?"

"In the figurative sense it means 'fail in one's purpose.' Literally it means that when I want to shoot my pistol at my enemy, the priming doesn't catch. I miss him."

"Now I understand you. And it would be a misfortune, my dark-haired love, but not enough to make you blow out your brains."

"What are you doing?"

"I am taking off your cloak. Give me your muff,[15] too."

"That will be difficult, for it is nailed."

"Nailed?"

"Put your hand in it. Try."

"Oh, the wretch! Is it the egg whites that gave you such a nail?"

"No, my angel, it is your whole charming person."

At that I picked her up, she held me around the shoulders to make less weight for me, and, having dropped my muff, I grasped her by the thighs and she steadied herself on the nail; but after a turn around the room, fearing what would follow I set her down on the carpet, then sat down myself and made her sit on me, whereupon she had the kindness to finish the job with her beautiful hand, collecting the white of the first egg in the palm of it.

"Five to go," she said; and after cleaning her beautiful hand in a potpourri of aromatic herbs, she gave it to me to kiss again and again. Calmed, I spent an hour telling her amusing stories; then we sat down at table.

She ate for two, but I for four. The service was of porcelain but at dessert of silver gilt, as were the candelabra, each of which held four candles. Seeing that I admired their beauty she said they were a present her friend had made her.

"Did he give you snuffers too?"

"No."

"Then I conclude that your lover must be a great lord, for great lords know nothing of snuffing."

"The wicks of our candles do not need snuffing."

"Tell me who taught you French, for you speak it too well for me not to be curious to know."

"Old La Forêt, who died last year. I was his pupil for six years; he taught me to compose verses too; but I have learned words from you which I never heard pass his lips: à gogo, frustratoire, dorloter.[16] Who taught them to you?"

"Good society in Paris, Madame de Boufflers[17] for example, a woman of profound intelligence who one day asked me why the Italian alphabet contained con rond.[18] I laughed, and did not know how to answer."

"I think they are abbreviations used in the old days."

After making punch we amused ourselves eating oysters, exchanging them when we already had them in our mouths. She offered me hers on her tongue at the same time that I put mine between her lips; there is no more lascivious and voluptuous game between two lovers, it is even comic, but comedy does no harm, for laughter is only for the happy. What a sauce that is which dresses an oyster I suck in from the mouth of the woman I love! It is her saliva. The power of love cannot but increase when I crush it, when I swallow it.

She said that she was going to change her dress and come back with her hair ready for the night. Not knowing what to do I amused myself looking at what she had in her desk, which was open. I did not touch her letters but, opening a box and seeing some condoms,[19] I quickly wrote the following verses and substituted them for what I had stolen:

Enfants de l'amitié, ministres de la peur,
Je suis l'amour, tremblez, respectez le voleur,
Et toi, femme de Dieu, ne crains pas d'être mère
Car si tu fais un fils, il se dira son père.
S'il est dit cependant que tu veux te barrer
Parle; je suis tout prêt, je me ferai châtrer.

("Children of friendship, ministers of fear, I am Love, tremble, and respect the thief. And you, wife of God, do not fear to become a mother, for if you bear a son he will say he is its father. Yet if you are determined to bar your door, speak; I am ready, I will have myself gelded.")

M. M. reappeared in a new guise. She had on a dressing gown of India muslin embroidered with flowers in gold thread, and her nightcap was worthy of a queen.

I threw myself at her feet to beg her to yield to my desires then and there; but she ordered me to hold my fire until we were in bed.

"I do not want," she said with a smile, "to be bothered with keeping your quintessence from falling on the carpet. You shall see."

With that she goes to her desk, and instead of the condoms she finds my six verses. After reading them, then reading them over again aloud, she calls me a thief and, giving me kiss after kiss, she tries to persuade me to restore the stolen goods. After reading my verses slowly aloud once more, pretending to reflect on them, she goes out on the pretext of looking for a better pen, then comes back and writes the following answer:

Dès qu'un ange me f..., je deviens d'abord sûre
Que mon seul époux est l'auteur de la nature.
Mais pour rendre sa race exempte des soupçons
L'amour doit dans l'instant me rendre mes condoms.
Ainsi toujours soumise à sa volonté sainte
J'encourage l'ami de me f... sans crainte.

("When an angel f...s me I am at once sure that my only husband is the author of nature. But to make his lineage free from suspicion Love must instantly give me back my condoms. Thus always obedient to his sacred will, I encourage my friend to f... me without fear.")

I thereupon returned them to her, giving a very natural imitation of surprise; for really it was too much.

Midnight had struck, I showed her her little Gabriel, who was sighing for her, and she made the sofa ready, saying that as the alcove was too cold, we would sleep there. The reason was that in the alcove her friend could not see us.

While waiting I tied up my hair in a Masulipatam[20] kerchief which, going round my head four times, gave me the redoubtable look of an Asiatic despot in his seraglio. After imperiously putting my sultana in the state of nature and doing the same to myself, I laid her down and subjugated her in the classic manner, delighting in her swoons. A pillow which I had fitted under her buttocks and one of her knees bent away from the back of the sofa must have afforded a most voluptuous vision for our hidden friend. After the frolic, which lasted an hour, she took off the sheath and rejoiced to see my quintessence in it; but finding, even so, that she was wet with her own distillations, we agreed that a brief ablution would restore us in statu quo. After that we stood side by side in front of a large upright mirror, each putting one arm around the other's back. Admiring the beauty of our images and becoming eager to enjoy them, we engaged in every kind of combat, still standing. After the last bout she fell onto the Persian carpet which covered the floor. With her eyes closed, her head to one side, lying on her back, her arms and legs as if she had just been taken down from a St. Andrew's cross,[21] she would have looked like a corpse if the beating of her heart had not been visible. The last bout had exhausted her. I made her do the "straight tree,"[22] and in that position I lifted her up to devour her chamber of love, which I could not reach otherwise since I wanted to make it possible for her, in turn, to devour the weapon which wounded her to death without taking her life.

Reduced after this exploit to asking her to grant me a truce, I set her on her feet again; but a moment later she challenged me to give her her revenge. It was my turn to do the "straight tree" and hers to grasp me by the hips and lift me up. In this position, steadying herself on her two diverging pillars, she was horrified to see her breasts splattered with my soul distilled in drops of blood.

"What do I see?" she cried, letting me fall and herself falling with me. Just then the alarm chimed.

I called her back to life by making her laugh.

"Have no fear, my angel," I said, "it is the yolk of the last egg, which is often red."

I myself washed her beautiful breasts, which human blood had never soiled before that moment. She was very much afraid that she had swallowed some drops of it; but I easily persuaded her that even if it were so, it would do no harm. She dressed in her habit and then left, after imploring me to go to bed there and to write and tell her how I was before I went back to Venice. She promised to do as much for me the next day. The caretaker would have her letter. I obeyed. She did not leave until a half hour later, which she certainly spent with her friend.

I slept until evening, and scarcely had I waked before I wrote her that I was well. I went to Venice, where, to fulfill my promise, I looked up the same painter who had made my portrait for C. C. He needed only three sittings. I had him make it a little larger than the first, because M. M. wanted it in a medallion concealed under some sacred image which would hide it from everyone, she alone possessing the secret of uncovering it. It was the jeweler's task to produce a secret device different from the first. The same painter made me an Annunciation, in which the Angel Gabriel appeared as dark-haired and the Holy Virgin as a blonde, opening her arms to the divine messenger. The famous painter Mengs used the same idea in the Annunciation[23] which he painted at Madrid twelve years later.

CHAPTER V

I give M. M. my portrait. Her present to me. I go to the opera with her. She gambles and replenishes my purse. Philosophical conversation with M. M. Letter from C. C. She knows all. Ball at the convent: my exploits as Pierrot. C. C. comes to the casino instead of M. M. I spend an absurd night with her.

1754.

ON THE second day of the year, before going to the casino I went to Laura's house to give her a letter for C. C. and to receive one which made me laugh. M. M. had initiated the girl not only into the mysteries of Sappho,[1] but also into pure metaphysics. She had become a freethinker. She wrote that, not wishing to give an account of her doings to her confessor but at the same time not wanting to lie to him, she had stopped telling him anything. "He told me," she wrote, "that perhaps I confessed nothing to him because I did not examine my conscience well, and I answered that I had nothing to tell him, but that if he liked I would commit some sin on purpose, so that I could have something to tell him."

Here is a copy of the letter from M. M. which I found at the casino:

"I am writing to you in bed, my dark-haired dear, because I feel as if my hips were completely out of joint; but it will go away, for I am eating and sleeping well. What brought balm to my blood was the letter in which you assured me that the loss of yours had no ill effect. I shall be certain of it on Twelfth-night in Venice. Write me if I can count on that. I want to go to the opera. I forever forbid you egg whites in salad. In future when you go to the casino you must ask if anyone is there, and if you are told there is, you must go away; my friend will do likewise; so you will never meet; but it will not be for long, for he is mad about you and determined that you shall make his acquaintance. He says he did not believe there was a man of your vigor in the universe; but he insists that, making love as you do, you are defying death, for he maintains that the blood you spurted out must have come from the brain. But what will he say when he learns that you think nothing of it? But here is something to make you laugh: he wants to eat salads of egg whites, and I am to ask you to give me some of your Four Thieves vinegar; he says he knows it exists, but it is not to be had in Venice. He told me he spent a sweet and cruel night, and he expressed a certain uneasiness for me, too, for he thought my efforts were beyond the delicacy of my sex. That may well be; but in the meanwhile I am delighted at having outdone myself and having been put to such a noble test of my strength. I love you to adoration; I kiss the air, thinking that you are there; and I cannot wait to kiss your portrait. I hope that mine will be as dear to you. I believe we are born for each other, and I curse myself when I think that I have put a barrier between us. The key which you see here is to my jewel-box. Search it; take whatever you see addressed 'To my Angel.' It is a small present which my friend wanted me to give you in exchange for the nightcap you gave me. Farewell."

The small key which I found in the letter was to a casket in the boudoir. Impatient to see the nature of the present which her friend had inspired her to give me, I go and open the little casket, and I undo the packet. I find a letter and a shagreen case. Here is the letter:

"What will make this present dear to you, my loving friend, is my portrait, of which our friend, who has two, is happy to deprive himself when he thinks that you will become its owner. In this box you will find my portrait twice concealed by two different secret devices. You will see me as a nun if you remove the bottom of the snuffbox lengthwise; and if you push the corner of it you will see a hinged cover open, under which I appear as you have made me. It is impossible, my dear, that any woman has ever loved you as I love you. Our friend encourages my passion. I cannot decide if I am more fortunate in my friend or in my lover, for it is beyond my powers to imagine anything better than either."

In the case I found a gold snuffbox, which a few traces of Spanish snuff showed had been used Following the instructions I found her at the bottom of it, dressed as a nun, standing, and in half profile. Raising the false bottom showed her to me lying naked on a black silk mattress in the pose of Correggio's Magdalen.[2] She was looking at a Cupid who had his quiver at his feet and was seated on her nun's habit. It was a present of which I did not think myself worthy. I wrote her a letter in which she could not but find the deepest gratitude truly depicted. In the same small casket I saw all her diamonds in drawers and four purses filled with zecchini. Handsome behavior being one of my great admirations, I shut the casket and went back to Venice, happy if I could only have found the will and the means to escape from the sway of Fortune by ceasing to gamble.

The jeweler gave me the medallion of the Annunciation just as I wished it to be. It was made to be worn hanging from the neck. A link through which the neck cord was to pass contained the secret device. If it was pulled hard, the Annunciation sprang up and revealed my portrait. I attached it to a gold chain of Spanish links six ells long, which made it a most noble present. I put it in my pocket and in the evening of Epiphany Day I posted myself at the foot of the fine statue which the grateful Republic had erected to the hero Colleoni after having him poisoned,[3] if backstairs history tells true. Sit divus, modo non vivus ("Let him be a god so long as he is not alive")[4] is a saying of the enlightened monarch which will endure as long as there are monarchs.

At exactly two o'clock[5] I saw M. M. get out of the gondola dressed, and very well masked, as a woman. We went to the opera at San Samuele, and at the end of the second ballet we went to the Ridotto, where she greatly enjoyed looking at all the patrician ladies, whose rank gives them the privilege of sitting down with their faces unmasked. After walking about for half an hour we went to the room set apart for the great bankers. She stopped at Signor Momolo Mocenigo's[6] bank; at that time he was the handsomest of all the young patrician gamesters. As there was no play at his table, he was lolling easily in front of two thousand zecchini, with his head bent toward the ear of a masked lady sitting beside him. She was Signora Marina Pisani,[7] whose adoring cavalier he was.

M. M. having asked me if I wished to play, and I having answered no, she said that she was taking me for her partner and, not waiting for me to reply, she draws out a purse and puts a roll of coins on a card. The banker, moving only his hands, shuffled, then cut, and M. M. won her card and then the paroli. The Signore pays, takes a new pack of cards, and begins whispering to the lady beside him, quite indifferent to four hundred zecchini which M. M. had already put on the same card. The banker continuing his conversation, M. M. said to me in good French: "Our stakes are not high enough to interest the Signore; let us go." So saying, she takes away her card and moves on. I pick up the money without answering the Signore, who says:

"Your masker is too intolerant."

I rejoin my beautiful gamester, who was surrounded. She stops at the bank of Signor Piero Marcello,[8] another charming young man, at whose side was Signora Venier,[9] Signor Momolo's sister. She plays, and loses five rolls one after the other. Having no more money, she takes coins by handfuls from the pocket in which I had the four hundred zecchini, and in five or six deals she has the bank at death's door. She stops, and the noble banker congratulates her on her luck. After pocketing all the money she had won I give her my arm and we go downstairs and set off to have supper. Noticing that several busybodies were following us I took a traghetto gondola, and had it land where I wished. This is the way to escape from busybodies in Venice.

After eating a good supper I emptied my pockets. For my share I found I was in possession of nearly a thousand zecchini; she asked me to do hers up in rolls and put them in her little casket and keep the key to it. I finally gave her the medallion containing my portrait, whereupon she reproached me for not having done her the favor sooner. After having tried in vain to discover the secret, she was delighted to learn it, and she thought me a very good likeness.

Remembering that we had only three hours before us I urged her to undress.

"Yes," she said; "but be careful; for my friend maintains that you may die on the spot."

"And why does he think you are not in equal danger, since your ecstasies are more frequent than mine?"

"He says that the liquid which we women distill cannot come from the brain, since the womb has no connection with the seat of understanding. It follows, he says, that the child is not the mother's son in respect to the brain, which is the seat of reason, but the father's; and I think it is true. According to this system woman has at most only the quantity of reason which she needs; she has none over to give a portion of it to the fetus."

"Your lover is wise. According to this system we must forgive women all the follies they commit for love's sake, and men none. That is why I shall be in despair if I find that you have become pregnant."

"I shall know that in a few weeks, and if I am pregnant so much the better. I have decided what course I shall take."

"And what course is that?"

"To entrust myself entirely to my friend and to you. I am certain that neither of you will let me be brought to bed in the convent."

"That would be a stroke of fate which would determine our destiny. I should have to carry you off and take you to England and marry you."

"My friend thinks that it would be possible to bribe a physician who would declare that I was suffering from some malady of his own invention and order me to go and drink mineral waters at the springs, which the Bishop might allow. At the watering place I would be cured, then I would come back here; but I would far rather that we united our destinies until death. Could you live comfortably anywhere, as you do here?"

"Alas, no! But with you could I be unhappy? We will talk of this when it becomes necessary. So now let us go to bed."

"Let us. If I bear a son my friend will take care of him as his father."

"Could he believe that he is?"

"You can both take the credit; but some resemblance will show me the truth."

"Yes—for example if in time to come he writes pretty verses you can conclude that he is his."

"Who told you that he can write verses?"

"Admit that he wrote the six in answer to mine."

"I will not admit it. Good or bad, they are mine, and I mean to convince you of it on the spot."

"No, no. Let us go to bed, or Love will challenge Apollo to a duel."

"An excellent idea! Take this pencil and write. At the moment I am Apollo."

She then dictated the following four lines:

> Je ne me battrai pas. Je te cède la place.
> Si Venus est ma sœur, commune est notre race.
> Je sais faire des vers. Un moment de perdu
> Ne pourra pas déplaire à l'amour convaincu.
> (I will not fight. I yield the ground to you. If Venus is my sister, we are kindred. I can write verses. A moment lost cannot offend a confident Love.")

I thereupon asked her pardon on my knees, admitting that she was also versed in mythology; but could I suppose that a Venetian lady of twenty-two who had been brought up in a convent could be so talented? She said that she had an insatiable desire to convince me that she deserved my heart, and she asked me if I thought her a shrewd gamester.

"Shrewd enough to make the banker tremble."

"I do not always play so high, but having taken you as my partner I defied Fortune. Why did you not play?"

"Because having lost four thousand zecchini during the last week of the year, I had no money left; but I will play tomorrow and Fortune will favor me. Meanwhile here is a little book I took from your boudoir. It is Pietro Aretino's postures. In these three hours I want to try some of them."

"That is very like you. But some of them are impossible and even silly."

"True, but four are very interesting."

It was in these labors that we spent the three hours. The chimes of the clock put an end to our celebration. After escorting her back to her gondola I went home to bed; but I could not sleep. I got up and went to pay some pressing debts. One of the greatest pleasures a wastrel can enjoy is that of paying certain debts. The money M. M. had won for me brought me luck all night, and I reached the end of the Carnival having won every day.

Going to the casino in Murano three days after Twelfth-night to put ten or twelve rolls in M. M.'s casket, I found the caretaker's wife with a letter from her for me. I had just received one from C. C. by Laura. After giving me as good news of her health as I could wish, M. M. asked me to find out if the same jeweler who had set her medallion had by any chance set a ring which displayed a St. Catherine which must also conceal a portrait; she wanted to know the secret of it. She said that it was a boarder of whom she was fond who had the ring, that it was very thick, and that the girl did not know that there must be a secret device for opening it. I answered that I would obey all her commands. But here is C. C.'s letter, which is amusing because of the quandary in which it put me. The letter from C. C. was of very recent date; M. M.'s had been written two days earlier.

"Oh, how happy I am! You love my dear friend Mother M. M. She has a medallion as thick as my ring. She can have received it only from you; it must contain your portrait. I am sure that the painter who painted her Annunciation is the same one who painted my patron saint; the jeweler must be the same one too. I feel very sure that it was you who gave it to her. Content to know all, I did not want to risk grieving her by telling her that I had discovered her secret. But my dear friend, being either more frank or more curious, did not do likewise. She told me she was certain that my St. Catherine served to cover a portrait, which must be that of the person who had given it to me. I answered that it was true my ring came from my lover, but that I did not know it could contain his portrait. She replied that if such was the case, and I was willing, she would try to find out the secret and afterward she would reveal hers to me too. Certain that she could not find the secret, I gave her my ring, saying that discovering it would please me. The nun who is my aunt sending for me just then, I left my ring with her, and she gave it back to me after dinner, saying that she had been unable to discover anything, but she was still certain the portrait must be in it. She is convinced of it, but I assure you that in this respect she will not find me obliging, for if she saw you she would guess everything and then I should have to tell her who you are. I am sorry that I must keep something from her, but I am not at all sorry either that you love her or that she loves you, and I pity you so much for being cruelly reduced to making love at a grating that I would gladly let you take my place. I should make two people happy at one stroke. Farewell."

I answered that she had guessed rightly that my portrait was in M. M.'s medallion; but I urged her to continue to keep my secret, assuring her that the fancy I had taken for her dear friend in no way detracted from the constancy of my passion for her. Thus did I equivocate, to keep up the intrigue, which I yet saw coming to its end in the closeness of their friendship.

Having learned from Laura that on such-and-such a day a ball was to be given in the large visiting room of the convent, I made up my mind to go to it masked in such a way that my two dear friends could not recognize me. I was certain that I should see them. During the Carnival in Venice nuns are allowed to have this innocent pleasure. There is dancing in the visiting room, and they remain inside, watching the festivities from behind their wide gratings. At the end of the day the festivities are over, everyone leaves, and they retire well satisfied to have been present at one of the pleasures of the laity. The ball was to take place on the day on which M. M. had invited me to sup at her casino; but that did not prevent me from going masked to the visiting room, where I was sure to see my dear C. C. as well.

Wanting to make certain that my two friends would not recognize me, I decided to mask as Pierrot.[10] There is no costume better fitted to disguise a person, provided he is neither a hunchback nor lame. The wide tunic of a Pierrot, the long, very wide sleeves, the wide trousers which come down to the heels, conceal everything distinctive in his figure by which someone who knew him intimately could recognize him. A cap which covers his whole head, his ears, and his neck hides not only his hair but also the color of his complexion, and a piece of gauze in front of the eyes of his mask prevents anyone from seeing whether they are black or blue.

So, having eaten a dish of soup, I mask after this fashion and, heedless of the cold (for the whole costume being of white linen, one cannot be more lightly clad), I board a gondola, have it drop me at a traghetto, and there take another gondola which conveys me to Murano. I had no cloak. In my trouser pockets I had only a handkerchief, the keys to the casino, and my purse.

I go down to the visiting room, which was full, but everyone makes way for the strange mask, whose characteristics were unknown in Venice. I walk on, assuming the gait of a booby as the nature of the mask demands, and I enter the circle of dancers. I see Punches, Scaramouches, Pantaloons, Harlequins. At the gratings I see all the nuns and all the boarders, some seated, others standing, and though I do not let my eyes linger on any of them I see M. M. and, on the opposite side, my loving C. C., who was standing up to enjoy the spectacle. I proceed around the entire circle, walking as if I were drunk, looking everyone up and down, but more looked at and studied. Everyone was trying to make me out.

I stop in front of a pretty girl disguised as a female Harlequin and rudely take her hand to make her dance a minuet with me. Everyone laughs and draws back to make room for us. The Harlequiness dances in perfect character with her costume, and I with mine: I amused the company vastly by constantly appearing to be on the verge of falling, though I always kept my balance. Each time the general apprehension was followed by laughter.

After the minuet I danced twelve furlanas[11] with extraordinary energy. Out of breath, I let myself drop and pretended to sleep, and when my snores were heard everyone respected Pierrot's slumbers. Next there was a contradance which lasted an hour and in which I thought it best not to join; but after the contradance up comes a Harlequin who, with the impertinence permissible to his character, spanks me with his lath. This is Harlequin's weapon. Having, as Pierrot, no weapon, I catch him by the belt and run about the room carrying him, he meanwhile continuing to hit me with his lath on my behind. His Harlequiness, who was the charming girl who had danced with me, comes running to rescue her friend and also hits me with her lath. At that I put the Harlequin down, snatch his lath, and take the Harlequiness on my shoulders, hitting her on the behind and running at full speed all over the room to the laughter of the company and the frightened cries of the girl, who was afraid that if I fell she would show her thighs or her drawers. But an impertinent Punch put a sudden end to the whole comical struggle. He came up behind me and tripped me so hard that I could not keep from falling. Everyone booed him. I quickly got up and, very much annoyed, began an out-and-out wrestling match with the insolent fellow. He was as tall as I am. Since he was awkward and had no resources but his brute strength, I made him bite the dust and I handled him so roughly that his coat came unbuttoned, whereupon he lost his hump and his false belly. To the sound of the clapping and laughter of all the nuns, who had perhaps never enjoyed such a spectacle, I seized the moment, dashed through the crowd, and escaped.

Dripping with sweat, I called a gondola, shut myself up in it, and had it take me to the Ridotto to avoid catching a chill. Night was falling, I was not to be at the casino in Murano until two o'clock, and I could not wait to see M. M.'s surprise when she saw Pierrot before her. So I spent the two hours playing at all the small banks, going from one to another, winning, losing, indulging in all sorts of antics in complete freedom of body and soul, sure that no one recognized me, enjoying the present and snapping my fingers at the future and at all those who are pleased to exercise their reason in the dreary task of foreseeing it.

But two o'clock strikes and reminds me that love and a delicious supper await me to bring me new pleasures. With my pockets full of silver I leave the Ridotto, I hurry to Murano, go to the casino, and enter the bedroom, where I think I see M. M. in her habit standing with her back to the fireplace. I approach to see the effect of the surprise on her face, and I am turned to stone. What I see is not M. M., but C. C. in a nun's habit; even more surprised than I am, she neither speaks nor moves. I drop into an armchair to give myself time to get over my astonishment and recover my intellectual faculties.

When I saw C. C. I was as if struck by lightning. My soul was left as motionless as my body, lost in an inextricable labyrinth.

"It is M. M.," I said to myself, "who is playing this trick on me; but how did she manage to find out that I am C. C.'s lover? C. C. has betrayed my secret. But if she has betrayed me how dare she appear before me? If M. M. loves me how can she have deprived herself of the pleasure of seeing me and sent me her rival? It cannot be meant as a favor for no one carries doing favors to such lengths. It is meant to be a stinging, scornful insult."

My self-esteem did not fail to produce strong arguments to refute the possibility, but in vain. Shivering in the cold gloom of my disappointment, I alternately saw that I was tricked, deceived, trapped, scorned.

In this fashion I spent half an hour, bleak and silent, keeping my eyes fixed on C. C.'s face while she, too, looked at me without a word, more embarrassed and nonplussed than I, for she could at most recognize me as the same masker who had cut such capers in the visiting room.

Being in love with M. M., and having gone there only for her sake, I did not have the easy recourse open to the so-called reasonable man—I could not make the best of the situation by substituting the one for the other, despite the fact that I was far from scorning C. C., whose merits were at least as great as M. M.'s. I loved her, I adored her; but at that moment she was not the one for me to have. It would have been an outright denial of love, which could not but rouse my reason to indignation. It seemed to me that if I settled for doing the honors to C. C. I should be contemptible; it seemed to me that honor forbade me to lend myself to such deceit; in addition, I was glad both to gain the opportunity of reproaching M. M. with an indifference very far from love and of refraining from acting in a way which would ever lead her to suppose that she had done me a favor. Add that during all this time I was inclined to believe that she was in the hiding place and her friend with her.

I had to resolve on a course, for I could not think of spending the whole night there masked as I was and saying nothing. I considered deciding to leave, the more so because neither M. M. nor C. C. could be certain that the Pierrot was I; but I dismissed the idea with horror when I thought of the intense mortification C. C.'s beautiful soul would suffer if she ever learned that I was the Pierrot; it was with the greatest grief that I thought that she might even now suspect it. I was her husband; I was the man who had seduced her. These reflections lacerated my soul.

I suddenly begin to imagine that M. M. is in the secret closet and that, if she is, she will show herself when she considers the time is ripe. With this thought in mind, I decide to remain. I untie the handkerchief which bound the white mask of Pierrot to my head, and I relieve my charming C. C. from anxiety by showing her my face.

"It could only be you," she says, "but I breathe again. You seemed surprised to see me. Did you not know that you would find me here?"

"You may be sure I knew nothing about it."

"If you are displeased, I am in despair; but I am innocent."

"My adorable love, come to my arms. How can you suppose that I could be displeased to see you? You are always my better half; but I beg you to release my soul from the cruel labyrinth in which it is lost, for you could not be here unless you have betrayed our secret."

"I! I could never have done that, even if it cost me my life."

"Then how can you be here? How did your dear friend manage to discover everything? No one on earth can have told her that I am your husband. Perhaps Laura—"

"Laura is loyal. My dear love, I cannot even guess."

"But how were you persuaded to put on this disguise, to come here? You are able to leave the convent, and you have never told me so important a secret?"

"Can you believe that I would not have told you anything so important if I had ever left it? Today was the first time—two hours ago; and nothing is so simple or so natural as what made me do what I have done."

"Tell me about it, my love; my curiosity is boundless."

"Your curiosity is dear to me, and I will tell you everything. You know how fond M. M. and I are of each other; our affection could not be greater; you must be sure of it from all that I have written to you. Well, then —two days ago M. M. asked the Abbess and my aunt to let me sleep in her room instead of the lay sister, who had a bad cold and had gone to cough in the infirmary. She was given permission, and you cannot imagine how happy we were to find ourselves free for the first time to sleep together in the same bed.

"Today, a moment after you left the visiting room where you made us laugh so much, and where neither M. M. nor I could ever have imagined that it was you, she went out. I followed her, and as soon as we were alone she said she needed me to do her a service on which her happiness depended. I replied that she had only to tell me what it was. She thereupon opened a drawer and to my great surprise dressed me as you see me now. She kept laughing, and I laughed too, not knowing where the joke might end. When she saw that I was all dressed she said that she was going to trust me with a great secret, which she fearlessly confided to my loyalty. 'Know, my dear friend,' she said, 'that I was going to leave the convent tonight and not come back until tomorrow morning. But now it has been decided that it is not I who will go, but you. You have nothing to fear, and you need no instructions, for I am sure that in your situation you will not be at a loss. In an hour a lay sister will come here, I will speak to her privately, then she will tell you to follow her. Accordingly, you will go out with her by the small door and cross the garden until you reach the room which gives on the little quay. There you will get into a gondola, saying nothing to the gondolier except, "To the casino." You will be there in five minutes, you will get out, and you will enter a small room in which you will find a fire burning. You will be all alone there, and you will wait.' 'Wait for whom?' I said. 'No one. That is all you are to know. Nothing will happen to you which will offend you. Trust to me. At the casino you will eat supper and go to bed, too, if you wish, for no one will disturb you. I beg you not to ask me any further questions, for I cannot tell you more.'

"Tell me, my dear, what I could do after hearing this, and after having promised her that I would do whatever she asked? Begone, base suspicion! I laughed, and expecting only something pleasant, as soon as the lay sister came I followed her, and here I am. After being bored for three quarters of an hour, I saw Pierrot.

"I can assure you on my honor that the very moment I saw you appear my heart told me that it was you; but the next moment, when I saw you start back after looking at me closely, I knew just as clearly that you felt that you had been tricked. You sat here in such a gloomy silence that I should have thought it very wrong if I had been the first to break it, and the more so since, despite what my heart told me, I could not but fear that I was mistaken. Pierrot's mask might hide someone else —but certainly no one who could be dearer to me than you after eight months during which only force has kept me from embracing you. Now that you must be sure I am innocent, let me congratulate you on your knowing this casino. You are fortunate, and I wish you happiness. M. M. is the only woman, after me, who is worthy of your affection, the only woman with whom I can be content to share it. I pitied you; I pity you no more, and your happiness makes me happy. Kiss me."

I should have been an ingrate and a barbarian if I had not then clasped to my breast with unfeigned signs of the most sincere affection the angel of goodness and beauty who was there only for friendship's sake. But after convincing her that I considered her entirely justified, I did not fail to express my tender feelings and then to launch into theories equally reasonable and unreasonable to account for M. M.'s extraordinary behavior, which I considered very dubious and next to impossible to interpret to her credit. I told her in so many words that, apart from the pleasure it gave me to see her, it was obvious that her friend had played a vile trick on me which I could not but resent for its patent offensiveness.

"I do not see that," C. C. replied. "My dear friend must have contrived to find out, though I don't know how, that you were my lover before you met her. She might well have believed that you still love me, and she believed—for I know her soul—that she was giving us a sacred proof of perfect friendship by procuring us, without forewarning, the highest happiness for which two lovers can hope. I cannot but love her for it."

"You are right, my dear one; but your situation is very different from mine. You have no other lover, and, unable to live with you, I could not resist M. M.'s charms. I have fallen madly in love with her; she knows it; and, with her intelligence, she cannot have done what she has done except to show me her scorn for me. I admit that I feel it most keenly. If she loved me as I love her she could never have done me the excruciating favor of sending you here in her stead."

"I do not agree with you. Her soul is as great and noble as her heart is generous, and just as I am not displeased to know that you love her and are loved by her and that you have made each other happy, as appearances tell me you have, so she is not displeased to know that we love each other and indeed is delighted to have an opportunity to convince us that she approves of it. She wants you to understand that she loves you for yourself, that your pleasures are hers, and that she is not jealous of me, who am her dearest friend. To convince you that you should not be displeased that she has discovered our secret, she tells you, by sending me here, that she is satisfied that you should share your heart between her and me. You know that she loves me, and that I am often her wife or her fond husband; so, just as you do not object to my being your rival and to my often making her happy, she does not want you to suppose that her love is like hate, for such is the love of a jealous heart."

"You plead your friend's cause like an angel, my dear wife, but you do not see the thing in its true light. You have intelligence and a pure soul; but you have not my experience. M. M. loves me only to amuse herself, knowing perfectly well that I am not such a fool as to be taken in by what she has now done. I am miserable, and it is she who makes me so."

"Then I, too, should have cause to complain of her. She has shown me that she has all power over my lover and that, having made him her own, she finds no difficulty in giving him back to me. On top of that, she shows me that she scorns the affection I feel for her, by putting me in a position to show it to someone else."

"Now your argument is getting shaky. The case between her and you is entirely different. The love you and she indulge in is only a game by which you delude your senses. The pleasures you enjoy do not exclude others; what could make you jealous of each other would be a love of the same kind between women; but M. M. could not feel offended that you had a lover, just as you could not if she had one—provided in either case that the lover was not the other's."

"But that is precisely our case, and you are wrong. We are not a bit offended that you love us both. Didn't I write you that I wished I could give you my place? Does that make you think I scorn you too?"

"Your wish, my dear, to give me your place when you did not know that I was her lover arose from the fact that your love had changed into friendship, and for the time being I must be glad of it; but I have good reason to be offended if M. M. entertains the same sentiment, for I love her now and I am certain that I can never marry her. Do you understand that, my angel? Being sure that you will become my wife I am equally sure of our love, which will have time enough to be rekindled; but M. M.'s love will not return. Is it not humiliating for me if all I have done and all I have been able to do is to make myself an object of contempt? As for you, you cannot but adore her. She has initiated you into all her mysteries; you owe her eternal gratitude and friendship."

Such is the substance of our discussion, which continued until midnight, when the tactful caretaker brought us an excellent supper. I could not eat, but C. C. had a good appetite. Despite my gloom I had to laugh when I saw a salad of egg whites. She said that I was right to laugh, because the yolks, which were the best part, had been removed. I took pleasure in admiring the increase in her beauty, though I felt not the least desire to show her my feeling. I have always held that there is no merit in being faithful to a person one truly loves.

Two hours before dawn we went back to sit in front of the fire. C. C., seeing me sad, showed the most delicate respect for my situation—not a trace of provocation, no posture which deviated from the strictest decency. Her words were loving and tender, but she never once dared to reproach me for my coldness.

Toward the end of our long conversation she asked me what she was to say to M. M. when she returned to the convent.

"She expects," she said, "to see me perfectly happy and full of gratitude for her generous gift of this night. What shall I tell her?"

"The plain truth. You must not keep one word of our conversation from her, or one of my thoughts if you can remember them. You must tell her that she has made me unhappy for a long time to come."

"I should distress her too much if I told her that, for she loves you, and the medallion which contains your portrait is her dearest possession. I will do my very best to make it up between you quickly. I will send you a letter from me by Laura, unless you assure me that you will go to her house for it tomorrow."

"Your letters will always be dear to me; but you will see that M. M. will not want to have things out. There is one point on which she may not believe you.''

''Yes, I know—the strength of mind we had to spend eight hours together like brother and sister. If she knows you as I know you she will think it impossible.''

''In that case tell her the opposite if you wish.''

''No, no! It would be a very ill-timed lie. I can dissimulate a little; but I shall never learn to lie. I love you, too, because all through this night you have not pretended that you still love me.''

''Believe me, my angel, I am sick with grief. I love you with all my soul; but now I am in a situation to be pitied.''

''You weep, my dear; I beg you to spare my heart. I cannot forgive myself for having said that to you; but believe that I had no intention of reproaching you. I am sure that in a quarter of an hour M. M. will be weeping too.''

When the hour struck, having no more hope that M. M. would appear to justify herself, I kissed C. C., I resumed my disguise to cover my head and so shelter myself from a very strong wind whose whistlings I heard, and I hurried down the stairs after giving C. C. the key to the casino and telling her to return it to M. M.

CHAPTER VI

I am in great danger of perishing in the lagoons. Illness. Letters from C. C. and M. M. Reconciliation. Assignation at the casino in Murano. I learn the name of M. M.'s friend, and I consent to have him to supper at my casino with our common mistress.

I RUN to the traghetto, expecting to find a gondola, and I find none.

According to Venetian police regulations this can never happen, for at all hours each traghetto is required to have at least two gondolas ready for the public service; nevertheless, it sometimes happens, though rarely, that there is none. This was one of the times. There was a very strong wind from the west, and the disgusted gondoliers had apparently gone home to bed. What was I to do at the end of the quay an hour before daylight and almost naked? I might have gone back to the casino if I had had the key. The wind was blowing me off my feet, and there was no house I could enter to take shelter from it.

I had in my pockets at least three hundred filippi[1] which I had won at the Ridotto, and a purse full of gold; I had reason to fear the robbers of Murano, very dangerous and determined cutthroats who enjoy and abuse a number of privileges which the policy of the government grants them in return for the work they do in the glass factories with which the island abounds; to keep them from emigrating the government grants all of them Venetian citizenship. I expected to encounter a pair of them, who would have stripped me to my shirt, for I did not even have in my pocket the usual knife which all honest men in Venice carry to defend their lives. Unfortunate predicament! I was to be pitied and I was shaking with cold.

Through the cracks in the blinds of a wretched one-story house I see light. I decide to knock modestly at the door of the little house. Someone calls:

"Who is knocking?"

The blind is opened.

"What do you want?" says a man who is amazed to see me in such a costume. I beg him to let me in, giving him a filippo, a coin which was worth eleven lire, telling him my perilous situation in a few words. He comes and opens the door, and I ask him to go and fetch me a gondola which will take me to Venice for a zecchino. He quickly dresses, thanking Providence and assuring me that he will get me one immediately. He puts on his cloak and leaves me in his bedroom, where I see his whole family in one bed, all amazed at my appearance. A half hour later in comes my man and tells me that a two-oared gondola is at the quay, but that the gondoliers insisted on having the zecchino in advance. I agree, I thank him, and I leave, fearing nothing, for I see that the two gondoliers are stout fellows.

We make good progress as far as San Michele;[2] but scarcely have we passed the island before the wind increases with such fury that I see I am in danger of perishing if I go on; for though I was a good swimmer I was sure neither of my own strength nor of the possibility of resisting the current. I order the gondoliers to tie up to the island; but they answer that I am not in the hands of cowards and to have no fear. Knowing the character of our gondoliers I decide to say nothing; but the gusts of wind redoubled, the foaming waves were coming in over the side of the gondola, and my men, despite their strong arms, could not drive it forward.

We were only a hundred paces from the mouth of the Rio dei Gesuiti[3] when a furious gust of wind knocked the man at the poop into the water, but he caught hold of the gondola and had no difficulty getting aboard again. Having lost his oar he took another; but the gondola, going about, had already traveled two hundred paces to my left and broadside on in one minute. The situation was desperate. I shout to them to abandon the *felce [4] to the sea, throwing a handful of silver pieces on the carpet of the gondola. I was instantly obeyed, whereupon my two hearties, using all their energy, showed Aeolus[5] that his strength must yield to theirs. In less than four minutes we entered the Rio dei Mendicanti,[6] and, praising them, I ordered them to take me to the quay of the Palazzo Bragadin in Santa Marina,[7] where I had no sooner arrived than I got into bed under blankets to recover my natural heat; a good sleep would have restored me to my usual state, but nothing I could do would bring it. Five or six hours later Signor Bragadin and the other two inseparables came to see me and found me in the throes of fever; but that did not keep Signor Bragadin from laughing when he saw my Pierrot costume on the couch. After congratulating me on having escaped safe and sound, they left me to myself. Toward evening I began to sweat so profusely that my bed had to be changed during the night, and in the morning I had a recurrence, accompanied by delirium. The next morning I ached all over. The stiffness kept me from moving. The fever having abated, I could hope to recover my health only by a good diet.

* What envelops the gondola. (C.'s note.)

Very early on Wednesday I saw Laura. I told her that I could neither write nor read, but asked her to come back the next day. She put on my night table what she had brought for me, and she left having seen enough of my condition to tell C. C. how I was.

It was not until evening that, feeling a little better, I had my servant lock my door so that I could read what C. C. had written me. The first thing which pleased me was the key to the casino, which she returned to me, for I already very much regretted having left it. I already felt that I had done wrong, and having the key in my hands again was balm to my blood. In the packet I see a letter from M. M., and I read it avidly.

"The details which you have read, or will soon read, in C. C.'s letter will, I hope, make you forget the wrong I did when I hoped to give you the pleasantest of surprises. I saw and heard everything, and you would not have gone off without the key if I had not fallen asleep an hour before you left. So keep the key which C. C. is sending back to you and use it to return to the casino tomorrow evening, since Heaven has preserved you from the storm. Your love perhaps entitles you to complain, but not to ill-treat a woman who has certainly shown you no sign of scorn."

Here is C. C.'s long letter, which I translate only because I think it is interesting:

"I beg you, my dear husband, not to send this key back to me unless, become the most cruel of men, you take pleasure in grieving two women whose only love you are. Knowing your heart, I am certain that you will go to the casino tomorrow night, and that you will make it up with M. M., who cannot go there this evening. You will see that you can insist you are right only if you are stupid. Meanwhile, here is all that you do not know and must be very glad to learn.

"As soon as you left in that terrible storm, which kept me very uneasy, just as I was about to go downstairs to return to the convent I was greatly surprised to see M. M. before me. She said dejectedly that from a place where we could not see her she had seen and heard everything. She had several times been tempted to appear; but she had never made up her mind to it because she was always afraid of arriving at the wrong moment and particularly at the moment when her presence would have prevented the reconciliation which must take place between two people who could not but be in love with each other. Yet she would have decided upon it toward the end of our conversation if she had not fallen asleep. She woke as the clock chimed, just when, after giving me a key of which I knew nothing, you left as if you were fleeing from some den of infamy. M. M. said that she would tell me everything in her room and we left in a terrible storm and in great distress, thinking of you, who, she said, if you had been sensible should have stayed in the casino. As soon as we were in her room we undressed, I to resume my secular clothing and she to go to bed. I sat down by her bedside, and here, almost in her own words, is the account she gave me: 'When you left your ring with me to go and see what your aunt wanted, I examined it so carefully that I suspected the little blue dot. As it had nothing to do with the white enamel border around the arabesque I saw that the secret might be in it. So I took a pin and pushed it. Imagine my surprise and my great satisfaction when I discovered that we loved the same man, and at the same time the grief I felt at the thought that I was keeping him from you. Delighted with my discovery and instantly resolving to make use of it to procure you the pleasure of supping with him, I quickly pushed down your St. Catherine and gave it back to you pretending to have discovered nothing. What joy! At that moment I felt that I was the happiest of women. Acquainted with your heart, knowing that you knew that your lover loved me, since I had let you see his portrait in my medallion, and seeing that you were not jealous, I should have considered myself contemptible if I could have entertained sentiments different from yours—and the more so since your right over him could not but be stronger than mine. As for the care you always took to keep your lover's name a dead secret from me, I at once guessed that it could only be at his order, and I admired the beauty of your soul in your fidelity. Your lover, I judged, must be afraid that he would lose us both if we should discover that neither of us possessed his heart entirely. You cannot believe what pity I felt for you when I reflected that you continued to appear indifferent even after seeing his portrait in my possession must have made you certain that he did not love you alone. Enchanted with the soundness of my reasoning, I gave myself up to it heart and soul, determined to act accordingly and in a manner to convince you both that M. M. deserves your love, your friendship, and your esteem. My satisfaction was unimaginable when I considered that all three of us would be a hundred times happier when there were no more secrets between us. With this thought in mind, I arranged everything to play such a trick on you both as could not but bring the affection you feel for me to the highest pitch. I substituted you for myself, thus perfecting my scheme, which I thought the masterpiece of human intelligence in its kind. You let me dress you as a nun, and, with a readiness which bespoke the greatest confidence in me, you went to my casino not knowing where you were going; after taking you there, the gondola came back for me and I secreted myself where, sure that I could not be seen, I could not fail to see and hear whatever took place between you. Being the author of the play, it was only natural that I should give myself the pleasure of being its audience. I was sure that I did not risk seeing anything unpleasant.

" 'I reached the casino a quarter of an hour after you, and you cannot imagine my delighted surprise when I saw the same Pierrot who had amused us in the visiting room and whom neither you nor I had been clever enough to recognize. But his appearance as Pierrot was the only surprise in the play which I enjoyed. My fear, my uneasiness, and my disappointment began at once, and I contrived my own unhappiness. Our lover misconstrued everything, he left in despair, he still loves me; but his only thought is to be cured of his passion, and he will be. His returning this key is enough to tell me that he will not come back to the casino. Accursed night—in which, intending only to make three people happy, I have made three people unhappy, and which will cost me my life if you do not bring him to see reason, for I feel that I cannot live without him. You certainly have some way of writing to him, you know him, you know where you can send this key back to him with a letter which will persuade him to come to the casino tomorrow evening or the next to talk with me at least once; and I have hope. Sleep today, my dear friend, and tomorrow write him the whole truth, take pity on your poor friend and forgive her if she loves your lover. I will write him a short letter too, which you will enclose in yours. I am the reason why he no longer loves you, you ought to hate me, and you still love me, I adore your soul, I saw his tears, I saw how much and how he loves me, I know him now; I did not know there were men who loved as he does. I have spent a night in hell. Do not think that I am angry, my dear friend, because I heard you confide to him that we loved each other as husband and wife; it does not displease me; it is not an indiscretion to have told it to him, whose mind is as free from prejudice as his heart is good.'

"Her words ended in tears. I tried to comfort her by promising to write to you and I retired to my own bed, where I slept for four good hours; but M. M. could not sleep. However, she got up in the morning; we found the convent full of sad news which could not but greatly concern us. We heard that an hour before dawn a fishing boat had gone down in the Lagoon, that two gondolas had capsized, and that the people in them had drowned. Imagine our anxiety; we did not dare to ask questions. An hour before dawn was just the time you had left. M. M. returned to her room, I followed her and took care of her when she fainted for fear you had perished. More courageous than she, I told her that you could swim; but chills heralding a fever obliged her to go back to bed. We were in this state when, a half hour later, my aunt, who is always merry, came in laughing and said that in the storm before dawn the same Pierrot who had made us laugh so much had very nearly been drowned. 'Poor Pierrot!' I said. 'Tell us all about it, my dear aunt. I am very glad he was saved. Who is he? Does anyone know?' 'Yes,' she answered, 'the whole story is out, for the gondola which took him home is ours. The prow gondolier has just told us that Pierrot spent the night at the Briati ball,[8] and that, wanting to go back to Venice and finding no gondolas at the traghetto, he gave ours a zecchino to take him home. The poopman, his companion, fell into the Lagoon; but do you know what our fine Pierrot did then? He threw all the money he had on the *zenia and threw the felce of the gondola into the sea, and then, the wind being west, they took him home, entering Venice by the Rio dei Mendicanti. The gondoliers happily divided thirty filippi in silver which they picked up from the carpet, and then went back and recovered the felce. Pierrot will remember Murano and the Briati ball. The gondolier says he is the son of Signor Bragadin, the brother of the Procuratore; they took him to the palace nearly dead with fright and cold, for he was dressed in linen and had no cloak.'

"After this account my aunt left and we remained there looking at each other as if we had returned from death to life. M. M. asked me, smiling, if it was true that you were Signor Bragadin's son. I could only answer her that it might possibly be so, but that your name did not show that you were his bastard, still less his legitimate son, for the Signore had never married. M. M. answered that she would be very sorry if you were a Bragadin. I then felt I must tell her your real name, and about Signor Bragadin's attempting to obtain me as your wife and the result of it, which was putting me in the convent. And so, my dear, your little wife has no more secrets to hide from M. M. I hope that you will not accuse me of indiscretion, for it is better that our loving friend should know the pure and simple truth than truth mixed with falsehood. What amused us and made us really laugh was the assurance with which everyone says that you spent the night at the Briati ball. When people do not know something which is needed to round out a story, they make it up; and the probable often substitutes very nicely for the true. What I can tell you is that the news brought balm to the soul of our dear friend, she slept very well last night, and has regained her beauty only from the hope that you will come to the casino at once. She has read this letter three times and kissed me more than thirty. I could not be more eager than I am to give her the letter which you will write her. Laura will wait. Perhaps I shall see you again at the casino, and in a better humor, I am sure. Farewell."

* The carpet of a gondola. (C.'s note.)

It was more than enough to bring me to my senses. When I finished reading I admired C. C. and adored M. M.; but I was ill and stiff, though I had no fever. Being certain that Laura would come back early the next morning, I could not keep from writing to them both—only a little, but enough to assure them that I was myself again. I wrote C. C. that she had done well to tell her friend my name, and the more so because, having ceased to appear in the church, I no longer had any good reason to conceal my identity. For the rest, I assured her that

I admitted I was at fault and that I would give M. M. the greatest possible assurances of it as soon as I was fit to leave my bed. Here is a copy of the letter I wrote to M. M.:

"I left the key to the casino with C. C. to give back to you, my charmer, because I believed I was deliberately tricked, scorned, and dishonored by you. In this self-delusion, I felt it impossible to let you see me, and despite my love I trembled with horror at the thought of seeing you. Such was the effect upon me of an act on your part which I should have considered heroic if my intelligence had been equal to yours. I am beneath you in everything, and at our first meeting I shall convince you of the sincerity with which my repentant soul implores your forgiveness. Except for this, I have no reason to wish to recover my health. The stiffness which cripples me did not allow me to write to you yesterday. I can assure you that in the middle of the Murano canal, when I was within inches of death, I thought that Heaven was punishing me for the fault I had committed in sending you back the key to the casino, for when I found no boats at the traghetto I should have returned there if I had had it in my pocket; and, as you see, I should not now be ill and unable to move. Is it not clear that, if I had perished, it would only have been a just punishment for my crime in sending you the keys? Praise be to the God who brought me back to my senses, chastising me in a manner which shows me all the error of my ways. In future I will keep a better watch over myself, and nothing shall again have power to make me doubt your love. But what do you think of C. C.? She is an angel incarnate and she is like you. You love us both, and she loves us equally. I am the only weak and imperfect creature who cannot imitate you both. Yet I think I would give my life for one of you as freely as for the other. I feel a curiosity which I dare not confide to paper; but you will satisfy it, I am sure, the first time we see each other. It will be a miracle if we can meet again before a week from today. Farewell, my angel."

The next day Laura found me sitting up and on the way to recovery. I asked her to tell it to C. C. when she gave her the letter I had written her, and she left after giving me a letter from C. C. which required no answer. Her letter contained one from M. M.; there was nothing in either of them but doubts and fears and desperately loving questions about my health.

It was before dinner six days later that I went to the casino in Murano, where the caretaker gave me a letter from M. M.

"Impatient," she wrote, "to know that your health has returned and that you have resumed possession of the casino where you now are and of all its privileges, I write you this note, my dear one, to ask you to let me know definitely when we shall meet again and where. Whether you want me to come here or to Venice is all one to me. In neither place will we have a witness."

I answered that I was in good health and that we would meet again on the next day but one at the usual hour in the place from which I was writing to her.

I was on fire to see her again. I considered myself at fault in a manner which made me ashamed. Knowing her character, I should have seen beyond doubt that what she had done, far from indicating scorn, had been the most refined exercise of a love whose aim was my pleasure rather than its own. She could not have guessed that I loved her alone. Just as her love for me did not prevent her from accommodating the Ambassador, so she supposed that I might accommodate C. C. She did not consider the different constitution of the two sexes and the privileges which Nature accords to women.

On the next day but one, the fourth day of February in the year 1754, I was again face to face with my beautiful angel. She was wearing her habit. Our mutual love declaring us equally guilty, we fell on our knees before each other at the same moment. We had both mistreated love, she treating it too childishly and I too Jansenistically.[9] Since the forgiveness which we were compelled to ask of each other could not be expressed in words it could only consist in a stream of kisses back and forth, all their power being felt by our loving souls, delighted for the moment that they needed no other language to express their desires and the joy with which they were flooded.

Transported with emotion, impatient to give each other proofs of the sincerity of our repentance and of the fire which urged us on, we rose without letting go of each other and we fell together on the sofa, where we remained inseparable until the time came for a long sigh which we would not have restrained even if we had been sure that it heralded our death. Such was the picture of the rekindling of our love, sketched out, executed in flesh and blood, and finished off by the great painter, all-wise Nature, who, inspired by love, could never paint another either truer or more interesting.

In the tranquillity in which perfect conviction leaves the soul, I laughed with M. M. when I saw that I had taken off neither my cloak nor my bautta.

"Is it certain," I asked as I took them off, "that our reconciliation has had no witness?"

At that she picked up a candlestick and, taking me by the hand, led me into the room which contained the large cupboard which I had concluded was the repository of the great secret. She opened it and, after she removed a board which covered the back of it, I saw a door, through which we entered a closet where I saw everything necessary for a person who had to spend a few hours in it. There were a sofa which became a bed when wanted, table, easy chair, desk, candles on flat candlesticks, in short, everything needed by a curious voluptuary one of whose principal pleasures must have been to remain there as the unknown spectator of others' pleasures. Beside the sofa I saw a movable board. M. M. drew it aside; and through twenty holes spaced a little way apart I saw the whole bedroom, in which the spectator must have seen dramas whose author had been Nature and in which he had had no reason to be dissatisfied with the actors.

"And now," said M. M., "I will satisfy the curiosity which you very prudently did not dare to commit to paper."

"You cannot know—"

"Be still. Love is divine, and a diviner; he knows all. Admit that you wish to know if our friend was here on the fatal night which cost me so many tears."

"I admit it."

"So there! He was; and you will not be sorry to learn that you enchanted him completely and that you have all his friendship. He admired your character, your love, your sentiments, and your probity; he approved of the passion you have inspired in me. It was he who consoled me that morning by telling me it was impossible that you would not come back to me as soon as I had acquainted you with my true feelings, my intention, and my good faith."

"But you and he must often have fallen asleep, for without something to interest it is impossible to spend eight hours in darkness and silence."

"His interest and mine were equally keen; besides, we were not in the dark except when you and she were on the sofa, where you could have seen the light coming through the holes in these flowers. We drew this curtain and we supped, listening closely to all your conversation while we were at table. His interest in it was even greater than mine. He told me that he had never known the human heart so well as on that occasion, and that you must never have suffered as much as you did that night; he pitied you for it; but C. C. astonished him as much as she did me, for it is impossible that a girl of fifteen should reason as she reasoned in her efforts to justify me, and should say all that she said with the help of no other art than that with which nature and truth supplied her, unless she has the soul of an angel. If you marry her you will have a divine wife. When I lose her I shall be miserable; but your happiness will make it up to me. I cannot understand either how you could fall in love with me when you loved her or how she can manage not to hate me when she knows that I stole your heart from her. C. C. is a goddess. She tells me that she told you of her sterile pleasures with me only to disburden her conscience of the crimes she thought she was committing against the loyalty she believed she owed you.''

When we sat down at table M. M. remarked that I had become thinner. We grew merry recollecting past dangers, my masquerading as Pierrot, the Briati ball, where she had been told there was another Pierrot, and the extraordinary effect of the disguise, which made a person unrecognizable, for she thought the Pierrot in the visiting room was shorter and thinner than I. She reflected that if I had not happened to take the convent gondola and if I had not gone to the visiting room dressed as Pierrot, she would not have known who I was, for the nuns would not have been curious to know what happened to me; and she added that she breathed again when she learned that I was not a patrician as she feared, for otherwise she might in time have encountered a difficulty which would have driven her to despair.

I knew very well what she had to fear, but pretending not to know:

``I cannot imagine,'' I said, ``what you might fear if I had been a patrician.''

``My dear, the reason for my fear is such that I cannot tell it to you unless you give me your word of honor that you will do me the favor I will ask of you.''

``What could prevent me from doing you any favor you could ask of me, provided it was in my power and did not jeopardize my honor, now that there are no more secrets between us? Speak, my dear one; tell me your reason and count upon my affection and hence on my willingness to do anything that would please you."

"Very well. I want you to give a supper at your casino. I will come to it with my friend, who is dying to make your acquaintance."

"And after supper you will leave with him?"

"You see that it must be so."

"And your friend already knows who I am?"

"I felt it necessary to tell him. Otherwise he would not have dared to sup with you."

"Now I have it! Your friend is a foreign ambassador."[10]

"Exactly."

"But when he does me the honor to sup with me he will not remain incognito."

"That would be outrageous. I will introduce him to you by his name and title."

"And could you suppose that I would hesitate to grant you this favor? Tell me if even you can do me a greater one. Set the day, and be sure that I shall await you impatiently."

"I should have been sure of your willingness if you had not taught me to doubt."

"I deserve your jibe."

"Please laugh at it. Now I am satisfied. The person who will sup with you is Monsieur de Bernis, the French Ambassador. Remember that he is aware that you must know he is my lover, but that you must not show that you are aware that he knows of our mutual affection."

"I know my duty, my love. This supper party crowns my wishes. You were right to be concerned over my rank, for if I were a patrician the State Inquisitors would have come prying in good earnest, and the terrible consequences of that make me tremble. If you had confided your uneasiness to me, I would have told you who I am, for the only reason for my secrecy was that, if I were known, C. C.'s father would put her in some other convent. Can you tell me the day for our supper? I am impatient."

"Today is the fourth; we can sup together on the eighth. We shall come to your casino after the second ballet at the opera. Just give me the directions, so that we can find it without having to ask anyone the way."

I thereupon wrote down for her all the directions for reaching the door of my casino either by water or, if they preferred, by the streets. Delighted with a prospect which would do me honor, I begged my angel to come to bed. I explained to her that I was recovering from an illness and that, having supped with a good appetite, once in bed I should no doubt offer my first homage to Morpheus. So she set the alarm for ten o'clock[11] and we went to bed in the alcove. From ten to twelve—for the nights were growing short—we made love.

We had fallen asleep not only without separating but with our mouths, which had treasured our last sighs, still clinging together. It was this position which kept us from cursing the alarm which six hours later warned us that we must finish the race which we had only interrupted. M. M. was a well-spring of light. Her cheeks, animated by joy, showed me the bright roses of Venus which heralded it. I told her so, and she, trying to understand me, urged me to look closely at her beautiful breasts, which by their unusual throbbing seemed to invite my lips to deliver them from the amorous spirits which were troubling them. After drinking in as much of them as I could, I hastened to her mouth, open to receive the kiss which signified her defeat and which I accompanied with mine.

Morpheus might perhaps have gained a second victory over us, if the clock had not warned us that we had only time enough left to dress.

She returned to the convent after confirming our engagement for the eighth. After sleeping until noon I went back to Venice, where I gave my cook orders for the supper, the thought of which brought me the greatest pleasure.

CHAPTER VII

Supper for three with Monsieur de Bernis, the French Ambassador, at my casino. M. M.'s proposal; I accept it. Consequences. C. C. is unfaithful to me but I cannot complain.

IN SUCH a situation I thought that I should have felt happy; but I was not. I loved gambling; and as I could not deal I went and punted at the Ridotto and lost day and night. My vexation over my losses made me miserable. But why did I gamble? I did not need to, for I had all the money I wanted to satisfy my wishes. Why did I gamble when I felt my losses so keenly? What made me gamble was avarice. I loved to spend, and my heart bled when I could not do it with money won at cards. In those four days I lost all the money M. M. had won for me.

On the night of February 8th I went to my casino; and at the appointed hour I saw M. M. with her distinguished gallant, whom she introduced to me by his name and title as soon as he took off his mask. He said that he had been most anxious to renew our acquaintance since the Signora had told him that we had met in Paris.

While he spoke he looked at me attentively, as one does when one is trying to remember a face. He complained of his poor memory. I put him at ease on that article by telling him that we had not spoken, so that he had not looked at me enough for my person to make an impression on his memory.

"The day," I said, "on which I had the honor to dine with Your Excellency at Signor Mocenigo's, your attention was entirely occupied by the Lord Marshal,[1] the Prussian Ambassador. You were to set off on your journey here four days later. After dinner you took your leave."

He remembered me then, recollecting that he had asked someone if I was the embassy secretary.

"But from this moment," he said, "we can never forget each other. The mysteries which unite us are of a nature to make us intimate friends."

After this remarkable couple had made themselves comfortable we sat down at table, where it was of course my part to do the honors. The Ambassador, an epicure, having highly approved of the Burgundy, the champagne, and the Graves, which I gave him after oysters from the Arsenal,[2] asked me where I had obtained them and was delighted to learn that it was from Count Algarotti.[3]

My whole supper was choice, and my attitude toward them both was that of a private citizen to whom a king in the company of his mistress should do the greatest of honors. I saw that M. M. was enchanted with my respectful behavior toward her and by all the things I said which induced the Ambassador to listen to me with the greatest attention. Seriousness never interfered with jesting on His Excellency's part, who in this was perfectly of the French temper. Everything was accompanied by an apt witticism; and M. M., skillfully turning the conversation, brought up the subject of the combination of circumstances which had led to her making my acquaintance.

Speaking of my passion for C. C., she gave him a most enticing description of her person and her character, to which he listened as if he had known nothing about the girl. It was the part he was obliged to play, for he was not aware that I knew he was in the hiding place. He told M. M. that she would have made me the most charming of presents if she had brought her to our supper. She answered that it would have been too risky for her.

"But," she added, addressing me in a tone of magnanimous condescension, "if you wish, I could arrange for you to sup with her at my casino, for she sleeps in my room."

The proposal greatly surprised me; but it was not the moment to show my surprise.

"It is impossible, Signora," I said, "to add anything to the pleasure one feels when one is with you; nevertheless, I could not but consider it a favor."

"Well, I will give it further thought."

"But," the Ambassador said to her, "if I am to be of the party I think you should warn her that a friend of yours will be present besides her lover."

"That will not be necessary, Your Excellency," I said, "for I will write to her to do whatever the Signora tells her to. I will make it my duty to do so tomorrow."

"Then I invite you to supper," said M. M., "day after tomorrow."

I then begged the Ambassador to be prepared to be indulgent to a girl of fifteen who had no experience of society.

It was then that I told them, in all its details, the story of O-Morphi.[4] My account gave him the greatest pleasure. He asked me to let him see her portrait. He said that she was still at the Parc aux Cerfs,[5] to the delight of the King, to whom she had already given a child.[6] They left at eight o'clock, well pleased; and I remained at the casino.

The next morning, in accordance with my promise to M. M., I wrote to C. C., not telling her that someone she did not know would be at the party. After giving my letter to Laura I went to the casino, where the caretaker gave me a letter from M. M., who wrote as follows:

"Ten o'clock has struck and I am going to bed; but if I am to have any hope of sleep I must first unburden my conscience. You may have consented to the supper with our young friend only out of politeness. Tell me the truth, my dear, and I will put an end to the whole thing without in any way implicating you; leave it to me. But if you like the idea of the supper, she shall come. I love your soul even more than I do your body."

Her fear was well justified, but I should have felt too ashamed if I had gone back on my word; and M. M. knew me too well to believe me capable of it. Here is my answer:

"Will you believe that I expected your letter? Yes, I was expecting it, for I know your mind and I know the idea that you must have of mine now that my sophisms have twice given you cause to fear me. I repent of it, my indulgent dear, when I think that my having made you suspect me must have lessened your love. So I beg you to forget my delusions and to believe in future that my soul is of the same stamp as yours. The supper which has been planned will give me real pleasure. My acceptance of it was prompted by gratitude rather than by politeness. Believe this. C. C. is inexperienced, and I am delighted that she should begin learning to appear in society. I commend her to you, and I beg you to show her even more of your kind attentions if that is possible. I am mortally afraid that you will persuade her to take the veil; but be sure that it would drive me to despair. Your friend is a king among men."

After thus cutting off my retreat, I allowed myself all the reflections which, knowing the human heart, I could not but make. I saw clearly that the Ambassador had become interested in C. C., that he had told M. M. so, and that, compelled by her part of the bargain to satisfy all his wishes, she had undertaken to do whatever she could to accomplish his purpose. This she could not do without my consent, nor would she have dared to suggest the arrangement to me. They had conspired to bring up the subject in such a way that politeness, my feelings, and my sense of propriety would force me to agree. The Ambassador, whose very profession demanded the skill to carry on an intrigue, had been successful in this one, and I had fallen into the trap. It was done; and it was now my part to accept whatever was to come with good grace, not only to keep from looking a fool but also not to seem ungrateful to a man who had granted me unparalleled privileges. But the consequence might well be a cooling of my feelings toward both M. M. and C. C.

M. M. had realized all this on her way home and she had hurried to set everything to rights, or at least to justify herself to me, by writing me that she would put an end to the whole thing without implicating me. She knew that I would not accept her offer. Self-esteem, which is stronger than jealousy, will not allow a man who aspires to be accounted intelligent to show that he is jealous, and especially if he is matched with another man who outshines him only by being free from every trace of that base passion.

The next morning, going to the casino a little earlier, I found no one but the Ambassador, who received me in the most friendly fashion. He said that if he had known me in Paris he would have found a way to introduce me at court, where, he insisted, I would have had the greatest success. "That may well be," I say to myself today when I think of it; "but to what would that success have led me?" I should have been one of the victims of the Revolution, as the Ambassador himself would have been if his position had not taken him to Rome to die in 1794. He died there unhappy though rich,[7] unless he changed his way of thinking before his death, which I consider unlikely.

I asked him if he enjoyed being in Venice, and he answered with a smile that he could not but enjoy it since he was in good health and, having money enough, could procure all the pleasures of life more easily there than anywhere else, but he added that he did not believe he would be allowed to remain the Ambassador there very long. He asked me to say nothing of this to M. M., for it might grieve her.

She arrived with C. C., whose surprise I saw when she found that I was not alone. I encouraged her by greeting her most lovingly, while the stranger showed every sign of pleasure when she answered his compliment in his own language. We applauded the skill of the mistress who had taught her so well.

But considering C. C. something which was to belong to me, my desire to see her shine drove out any base feeling of jealousy which might have preoccupied me. I brought her to a pitch of gaiety, making her talk on subjects on which I knew that she was charming. Applauded, listened to, flattered, and encouraged by the expression of satisfaction on my face, C. C. appeared a miracle to the man whom I nevertheless did not wish to see fall in love with her. What a contradiction! I myself did what anyone else would have earned my hatred by doing.

During supper the Ambassador showed C. C. all kinds of attentions. Wit and gaiety presided over our delightful party, and witticism followed witticism without the slightest lapse from decency.

If a critical observer, who knew nothing of the circumstances, had tried to guess if love made one of the company, he might perhaps have suspected it but he could never have been sure. M. M. never displayed anything but friendship toward the Ambassador, esteem toward me, and fond consideration toward C. C. The Ambassador, maintaining an attitude of respect mingled with gratitude toward M. M., showed the greatest interest in C. C.'s remarks, doing all that he could to draw attention to them yet referring everything to me with the most generous understanding. Of the four of us, the one who had least difficulty in playing her role was C. C., for, having no share in the conspiracy, she had only to follow her nature. So she played her role to perfection. Success is assured; but the nature must be beautiful—otherwise the tyro is certain to be hissed.

We had spent five equally happy hours; but the one who showed it the most was the Ambassador. M. M. looked like a person satisfied with her work, and I appeared to approve. C. C. seemed proud of having been able to delight all three of us, and vain that the stranger had appeared to bestow his greatest attention on her. She looked at me smiling, and I understood the language of her soul perfectly: she wanted to make me think of the difference between this company and that in which her brother had given her such an ugly example of society the year before.

At eight o'clock we talked of breaking up, and it was the Ambassador who expended himself in compliments. Thanking M. M. for having given him the pleasantest supper he had enjoyed in all his life, he obliged her to offer him its counterpart on the next day but one, keeping up appearances by asking me if I would attend it with equal pleasure. Could she doubt that I would accept? I do not think so. The appointment made, we parted.

Reflecting the next day on this exemplary supper, I had no difficulty in foreseeing how the thing would end. The Ambassador had not made women the stepping-stones to his successful career except by possessing and practicing the art of coddling love. Very voluptuous by nature, he made his nature serve his turn; pampering himself, he awakened desires, without which he was perfectly right not to want fruition. I saw that he was obviously in love with C. C.; and I could not believe that he was the man to enjoy no more than the light of her beautiful eyes. I was sure that he had a definite plan, which M. M., despite all her loyalty, was to manage, but with such delicacy and skill that I should see no evidence of it. Although I knew I was not one to push compliance too far, I nevertheless foresaw that I should end by being taken in and losing C. C. to them. I was not disposed either to fall in with the scheme or to raise obstacles to it. Knowing that my little wife was incapable of going to lengths which could displease me, I chose to shut my eyes, relying on the difficulty of seducing her. It was an intrigue of which I greatly feared the consequences yet whose end I was curious to see. I knew that this repetition of the supper did not mean that the same play would be performed again; I was certain that there would be vital changes.

I thought that all I need do was to adhere to the same line of conduct; thus enabled to set the tone, I promised myself that I should find a way to baffle them. But after all these reflections C. C.'s inexperience, which despite all that she had learned still kept her a novice, made me afraid. It would be easy to abuse her duty to be polite; but here the thought of M. M.'s innate delicacy reassured me. After she had seen how I had spent ten hours with the girl and convinced herself that I intended to marry her, I could not suppose her capable of such heinous treason. All these reflections, which were essentially only those of my weakness, jealousy, and shame, decided nothing. I could only let things take their course and look on.

At the usual hour I went to the casino and I found my two beauties before the fire.

"I greet you, my angels. Where is our Frenchman?"

I unmask; I sit down between them, showing that I loved them both equally by bestowing a full measure of kisses now on one, now on the other. Although I knew that they knew I had undeniable rights over them, I nevertheless remain strictly within the bounds prescribed by decency. I congratulate them on their attachment to each other, and I see that they are delighted to find that they need not blush for it. So we spent an hour, during which I never thought of permitting myself the slightest overt act, for, since M. M. was uppermost in my heart, C. C. could not but be insulted by any proof I might have given her of it.

Three o'clock having struck and the amiable Frenchman not making his appearance, M. M. was beginning to be uneasy, when the caretaker came up and gave her a letter which our friend had written her:

"A courier who arrived two hours ago prevents me from being happy tonight. I must spend the whole of it replying. I hope that you will not only forgive me but pity me too. May I hope that you will grant me on Friday the pleasure of which an adverse Fortune deprives me tonight? Let me know tomorrow. I hope I shall find you in the same company."

"We must bear our disappointment," said M. M., "it is not his fault; the three of us will eat supper. Will you come on Friday?"

"Yes, with pleasure. But what is the matter?" I said to C. C. "The news seems to have made you sad."

"Not sad; I feel sorry for my dear friend and for you, for I have scarcely ever met a man so polite and obliging."

"I congratulate you, my dear; I am delighted that he has made such an impression on you."

"What do you mean by that? Could anyone fail to be charmed by his behavior?"

"Better and better! I agree with you, my dear child. Now tell me that you are in love with him."

"Even if I loved him it doesn't follow that I would go and tell him so. Besides, I am sure that he loves my wife."

So saying, she rises and sits down on her lap, and the two fond friends begin giving each other caresses which make me laugh and which gradually arouse my interest. I am of a mind to excite and enjoy a spectacle with which I had long been familiar.

M. M. fetches the engravings for Meursius,[8] representing a fine series of amorous encounters between women, and, with a malicious glance at my face, asks me if I would like her to order a fire lighted in the room with the alcove; divining her idea, I answer that I should be glad of it, for since the bed was very big we could all three lie in it. She was afraid I might suspect that her friend was in the hiding place. So the table is placed in front of the alcove, and I am thus relieved of my fear that I might be seen. Supper is served, and we eat it hungrily. M. M. was teaching C. C. to make punch. Having them before me, I admired the progress C. C. had made in beauty.

"In nine months," I said, "your bosom will have achieved its utmost perfection."

"It is like mine," M. M. added. "Do you want to see?"

Whereupon she interrupts her punch to unfasten her dear friend's dress, who offers no resistance, then immediately unfastens her own to enable me to judge; at which I am instantly intoxicated with the desire to compare and judge everything. Keeping up the game, I put L'Académie des dames[9] on the table and show M. M. a posture I wanted to see. She asks C. C. if she is willing to demonstrate it for me, and she answers that they would have to undress and get into the bed. I beg them to do me the favor.

After laughing heartily over what they were going to show me, I set the alarm for eight o'clock and in less than five minutes we are all in a state of nature and prey to pleasure and love. They set to work with a fury like that of two tigresses which seem ready to devour each other.

The sight of my two beauties in combat making me ardent, I am at a loss how to begin. For the honor of sentiment I should have given the preference to C. C., but I feared M. M.'s jibes, for she was sure to crow over my love which I wanted her to believe was hers alone. C. C. was thinner than M. M., yet she had bigger hips and thighs; her ornaments were brown, the other's blonde, and they were both equally skilled in a combat which was tiring them without the possibility of their reaching a conclusion.

Unable to resist any longer, I fling myself on them, and, pretending to separate them, I put M. M. under me, but she escapes, throwing me onto C. C., who receives me with open arms and makes me give up my soul in less than a minute, accompanying my death by her own, with neither of us ever thinking of taking any precautions.

Recovered from our ecstasy, we attack M. M., C. C. animated by gratitude and I eager for the revenge which she owed me for having forced me to be unfaithful to her. I held her in subjection for a good hour, enjoying the sight of C. C., whose looks seemed to say that she was proud of having given her friend a lover worthy of her.

My heroines surrendered to my remonstrances. With one accord we succumbed to sleep until the chime should sound, certain that we would make good use of the two hours which would remain to us until we must leave.

Thus refreshed, the sight of one another in a state of nature gave us a new vigor. C. C. having complained with dignity that with her I had had only a last gasp of life, M. M. urged me to make it up to her, but she did not find me reluctant. After a long combat inspired by a formal resolve on both our parts to crown it by marriage if it should have consequences which we made it our duty to defy, M. M. wanted to run the same risk, surrendering completely to love. Braving whatever might come, she gave me an unqualified order not to spare her, and I obeyed her. All three of us, intoxicated by desire and frustratoires and transported by continual furies, played havoc with everything visible and palpable which Nature had bestowed on us, freely devouring whatever we saw and finding that we had all become of the same sex in all the trios which we performed. A half hour before dawn we parted, weary, exhausted, at the end of our strength, satisfied and humiliated that we had to admit it, but not surfeited.

Reflecting the next day upon this overanimated night, during which, as always, pleasure had conquered reason, I felt a certain remorse. M. M. wished to convince me that she loved me by combining her love with all the virtues which I made a part of mine: honor, probity, truth. But her temperament, which enslaved her mind, led her into excesses, and she made every preparation to indulge herself in them, meanwhile waiting for a chance to turn me into her accomplice. She pampered love and flattered it to make it compliant and thus gain the power to direct it as she would yet at the same time to feel that she was immune from reproach. She thought she had the right to demand my admiration. She chose to overlook the fact that I could complain of her having taken me by surprise. She knew that I could do that only by acknowledging that I was weaker or more cowardly than herself, which I must be ashamed to confess.

I was certain that the Ambassador's absence had been arranged between them. They had foreseen that I would guess it and that gratitude and my sense of honor would prompt me to be no less forward than they to sacrifice nature to sentiment and to the obligation I should feel to be as generous and polite as they had been.

The Ambassador having led off by procuring me a delicious night, how could I bring myself to oppose his wish for a night of the same kind? They had reasoned well. My mind resisted, but I knew that I must yield them the victory. They saw no obstacle to their plans in

C. C.; they were sure of her once they were not hindered by my presence; and I knew that they were right. It was M. M.'s part to make C. C. feel mortally ashamed if she should fail to imitate her. Poor C. C.! I saw her debauched, and it was my doing. Alas! I had not spared them. What was I to do if, a few months later, they proved to be pregnant? I saw them both on my hands. In this wretched struggle between reason and prejudice, nature and sentiment, I could not make up my mind either to go to the supper or to stay away. "If I go, the night will pass decently, and I shall show that I am ridiculous, jealous, niggardly, ungrateful, and impolite. If I stay away, C. C. will be lost, at least in my estimation. I feel that I will no longer love her and that I will certainly have no more thought of marrying her."

With this combat in my soul, I feel an absolute need for some certainty. I mask and I go straight to the French Embassy.[10] I tell the Swiss that I have a letter for Versailles and that he would do me a favor if he would give it to the courier who was to return there as soon as he had received His Excellency's dispatch. He answers that no special courier has been seen there for two months.

"What! Did not a courier arrive last evening?"

"Last evening His Excellency supped at the Spanish Ambassador's."[11]

Thus informed beyond peradventure, I saw that I must swallow the pill. I must abandon C. C. to her fate. If I write to the dear girl not to go, I shall be behaving like a churl.

Toward nightfall I go straight to the casino in Murano and I write M. M. a note in which I ask her to excuse me if unexpected and urgent business of Signor Bragadin's obliged me to spend the whole night with him. That done, I return to Venice in a very bad humor and go to pass the night at the Ridotto, where I lost my money three or four times over.

On the next day but one I went to the casino in Murano, certain that I should find a letter from M. M. The caretaker hands it to me; I open it and find another from C. C. Everything had become common between them. Here is C. C.'s letter:

"We were very sorry, my dear husband, when we learned that you could not come to supper. My dear M. M.'s friend, who arrived a quarter of an hour later, was not less disappointed. We expected that we should sup gloomily; but not a bit of it. The gentleman's charming comments put us in high spirits; and you cannot imagine, my dear, how gay we became when the champagne followed the punch; but he was as gay as we were. In our trios he did not tire us, but he made us laugh a lot. I assure you he is a charming man with every quality to make him loved; but he is in no way your equal. Be certain that I will never love anyone except you and that you will always be sole lord of my heart."

Despite my resentment, her letter could not but make me laugh. But M. M.'s was even stranger:

"I am certain, my angel, that you lied out of politeness; but you may be sure that I expected it. It was a splendid present which you generously made to our friend in exchange for his present to you in letting his M. M. give you her heart. It would be yours in any case, my dear, but it is sweet when one can season the pleasures of love with the charms of friendship. I was sorry not to see you; but I saw afterwards that if you had come we should not have had a very amusing evening, for despite his great intelligence our friend has some natural prejudices. C. C.'s mind is now as unprejudiced as ours; and she owes it to me. I can boast that I have completed her education for you. I wish you had been hidden in the observatory; I assure you that you would have spent delicious hours there. On Wednesday I shall be all alone, and all yours, at your casino in Venice. Send me word if you will be at the statue at the usual hour. If you cannot, fix another day.''

I had to write to the two girls in the same spirit. I was bitter, and I must appear to be all sweetness: Tu l'as voulu, Georges Dandin (''It's what you asked for, Georges Dandin'').[12] I have never been able to decide whether I was truly ashamed or merely embarrassed; and it would take me too long to thresh out the problem now. In my letter to C. C. I had the strength of mind to congratulate her and encourage her to imitate M. M. in all things as the true model of perfection.

I wrote to the latter that she would find me waiting obediently, as always, at the foot of the statue. In my letter, which was full of false congratulations on the education she was giving C. C., I told her only this one equivocal truth: ''I thank you for the place in the observatory which you wished I had occupied. I could not have held out there.''

On Wednesday I was at the meeting place in good time. She arrived dressed as a man. She declined both the opera and the theater.

''Let us go,'' she said, ''to the Ridotto and either lose our money or double it.''

She had six hundred zecchini and I had about a hundred. Fortune was against us. After losing everything, she went to a place where she knew she would find her friend and asked him for money. He came back an hour later and gave her a purse containing three hundred zecchini. She began punting again and she had recouped her losses; but not satisfied with that, she lost again, and after midnight we went to supper. She saw that I was sad, though I tried not to show it. For her part, she was beautiful, gay, playful, amorous, always the same.

She thought she would restore my spirits by telling me in detail the whole history of the night she had spent with C. C. and her friend. It was just what she ought not to do, but the mind only too often falls into the error of supposing that another's is as much at ease and as free as it is itself. I could not wait for us to get to bed and so put an end to a story whose voluptuous details did not have the effect on me they should have had. I feared that I should be in no condition to cut a good figure in bed; and to cut a bad one takes no more than the dread of it. A young man in love never fears that his love will be inadequate; if he does, love takes its revenge and abandons him.

But in bed my charming mistress's beauty, her caresses, and the purity of her soul banished all my bad humor. The nights having grown shorter, we had no time for sleep. After spending our two hours with love, we were still in love when we parted. She made me promise to go to the casino for money to play in partnership with her. I went there and took all the gold I found, and, determinedly doubling my stakes according to the system known as the martingale,[13] I won three or four times a day during the rest of the Carnival. I never lost the sixth card. If I had lost it, I should have been out of funds, which amounted to two thousand zecchini. In this way I was increasing my dear M. M.'s little capital, when she wrote to me that politeness demanded that the four of us should sup together on the last Monday in Carnival, and I agreed.

It was the last time that I supped with C. C. She was very gay; but having decided on my course I showed particular attention only to M. M. Not in the least embarrassed by my presence, the girl devoted hers entirely to her new suitor.

Foreseeing, however, that embarrassing moments were inevitable, I asked M. M. to arrange things so that the Ambassador could spend an uninterrupted night with C. C. and I with her, and she managed it very well.

After supper he talked of faro, which the two beauties did not know,* and to show them what it was he called for cards and made a bank of a hundred double louis, which he saw to it that C. C. won. Not knowing what to do with so much money, she asked her dear friend to take care of it for her until she should leave the convent to be married.

After the game M. M. said that, having a headache, she would go to bed in the alcove and she asked me to go with her and put her to sleep. Thus we left the novice alone with the Ambassador. Six hours later, when the chime told us that we must end our orgy, we found them sleeping. For my part, I spent a night as amorous as it was peaceful with M. M. and with never a thought of C. C. So we finished out the Carnival.

CHAPTER VIII

Monsieur de Bernis departs, leaving me his rights to the casino. Wise advice which he gives me; how little I follow it. Danger of perishing with M. M. Mr. Murray, the English envoy. We are without a casino and our meetings cease. M. M. dangerously ill. Zorzi and Condulmer. Tonina.

ON THE first Friday in Lent I found at her casino a letter from M. M. in which she gave me two sad pieces of news. The first was that C. C.'s mother having died,[1] the poor girl was in despair. The second was that, her lay sister having recovered from her cold, she had returned to her room and at the same time the nun who was C. C.'s aunt and who was especially fond of her had obtained permission from the Abbess for her to sleep in her apartment. This ended the Ambassador's hope of supping with her again. All these misfortunes seemed to me of little account in comparison with a greater which I feared. C. C. might be pregnant. Though the feelings which bound me to her were no longer love, they were still strong enough to keep me from ever abandoning her. M. M. invited me to supper with her friend on the following Monday. I went and I found both the Ambassador and M. M. very sad—he because he had lost C. C., she because she no longer had her in her room and did not know what to do to console her for the misfortune of losing her mother.

Toward midnight the Ambassador left us, saying sadly that he believed he would have to spend some months in Vienna on a matter of great importance. At the same time we agreed to meet for fast-day suppers every Friday.

As soon as we were alone she told me that the Ambassador would be grateful to me if in future I would come to the casino two hours later. Rational though he was, he could not abandon himself to love in the presence of a third person. At all our suppers until he went to Vienna[2] he always left us at midnight. It was no longer in order to go and hide in the closet, for we always went to bed in the alcove, and in any case, having made love before I arrived, he had no desires left. M. M. found me still in love and even more ardent, for since I could see her only once a week I always waited impatiently for Friday. C. C.'s letters, which she brought me, touched me to tears. After losing her mother, she could no longer count on friendliness in any of her relatives. She called me her only friend and, speaking of the grief she felt at the thought that as long as she remained in the convent she could not hope to see me, she begged me ever to remain a faithful friend to M. M.

It was on Good Friday that, arriving at the casino at suppertime, I found the couple very sad. They did not eat, they scarcely spoke; it troubled me, and good manners and discretion prevented me from asking the reason. M. M. having gone somewhere, the Ambassador told me that she was unhappy and that she well might be since he had to leave for Vienna two weeks after Easter.

"I will even tell you," he said, "that I may not come back; but you must not say so to her, for she would be in despair."

When she returned to the table I saw that her eyes were swollen. This is what he said to her:

"My departure is unavoidable, for I am not my own master; but my return is certain as soon as I finish the business which obliges me to go. The casino remains yours, but friendship and prudence oblige me to advise you, my dear, not to set foot in it during my absence, for once I am gone I can no longer count on the fidelity of the gondoliers I employ, and I doubt if our friend here can hope to find any who are incorruptible. I will tell you further that I not only believe our doings are known to the State Inquisitors, who dissimulate their knowledge from policy, but that I also cannot vouch for our secret's being kept at the convent once the nun whom you know becomes certain that your reason for going out can no longer be to sup with me. The persons for whose fidelity I can vouch are the caretaker and his wife. Before I leave I will order them to regard our friend as another myself. You can make arrangements with them, and all will be well until I return if you behave circumspectly.

"I will write to you through my caretaker, and his wife will convey my letters to you as she has been doing, and you will use the same means to answer me. I must go, my dear, but my heart remains with you. Until my return I leave you in the hands of a friend whom I am very glad to have met. He loves you, he has a heart, he knows the world, and he will not let you make any mistakes."

The news was such a blow to M. M. that she asked us to let her leave, as she felt she must go to bed. We set the Thursday after Easter for our next supper.

After she left, the Ambassador impressed upon me the absolute necessity of keeping it from her that he might not return.

"I am going to work," he said, "with the Vienna cabinet on a project which will set all Europe talking.[3] Write me everything; and if you love her, protect her honor and, above all, if the necessity arises, have the strength to speak out against anything which could expose you to calamities which you could foresee and which would be fatal to you both. You know what happened to Signora da Riva, who was a nun in the convent of St. XXX.[4] She simply disappeared as soon as they discovered she was pregnant, and Monsieur de Froulay,[5] then the French Ambassador as I am now, soon afterward went mad and died. J. J. Rousseau[6] once told me that it was from poison; but he is a visionary. His poison was the grief he felt because he could do nothing for the unfortunate woman, whom the Pope finally dispensed from her vows, and she married and is now living in Parma.

"So let your feelings of friendship be stronger than your love, see her sometimes in the visiting room, and refrain from taking her to the casino, for the gondoliers will betray you. Our certainty that neither she nor her friend is pregnant lessens my grief a great deal; but admit that you have been very imprudent! You risked a terrible misfortune! Think of the desperate course you would have had to follow, for I am sure you could not have abandoned her. She believed that it was easy to bring on an abortion by taking certain drugs, but I disabused her. In God's name be prudent in future, and write me everything. It is my duty to be concerned for her fate."

He took me to Venice and went home. I spent a most uneasy night, and the next day I went back to the casino to write the sorrowing M. M. a letter designed to console her and to impress upon her how necessary it was for us to adopt a prudent course of conduct.

In her answer, which I received the next day, I saw the liveliest image of the despair which weighed on her soul. Nature had fostered in her a temperament which made the cloister intolerable to her, and I foresaw the terrible struggles, both with her and with myself, which I must be prepared to undergo.

We saw one another on the Thursday after Easter. I had sent her word that I would come at midnight. She had spent four hours with her friend, sadly lamenting her cruel destiny. After supper he left, asking me to stay with her—which I did, certainly never thinking of those pleasures which can find no place when the heart is preoccupied by a great grief. She had grown thinner, and she aroused a compassion in me which banished every other feeling. I held her in my arms for an hour, printing countless kisses on her appealing face, well content to find that my soul was wholly concentrated on respecting her grief. I should have thought I was insulting her if I had invited her to distract herself by frenzies in which her soul, even as mine, could not have indulged. She said when I left her that she had never felt so sure that I loved her as she had that night, and she begged me to remember that I was now her only friend.

The next week the Ambassador summoned the caretaker before supper and in his presence wrote out a document, which he made him sign, in which he transferred to me all his rights to whatever was in the casino and ordered him to serve me in everything just as he now served him.

We were to sup together for the last time on the next day but one; but I found M. M. alone, looking like a statue of white Carrara marble.

"He is gone," she said, "and he commends M. M. to you. Tomorrow evening he will leave Venice. Fatal being, whom I shall perhaps not see again and whom I did not know I loved! It is now when I lose him that I realize it. I was not happy before I knew him; but I did not think myself unhappy. I feel that I am so now."

I spent the whole night with her trying to calm her grief. I knew the nature of her soul, as transported by pleasures when she felt she was happy as it was sensible to pain when grief overwhelmed her. She told me the hour at which I should go to the visiting room on the next day but one, and I was delighted to find her less sad. She showed me a short letter which our friend had written her from Treviso. Then she said that I must come to see her two or three times a week and that she would often come to the grating accompanied by another nun, and sometimes by still another, because she foresaw that the visits I would pay her would become the talk of the convent when it was discovered that I was the same man who always went to mass at their church; so she told me to have myself announced by a different name to prevent any suspicion from arising in the mind of C. C.'s aunt. But she said that this would not keep her from coming to the grating alone when she needed to talk to me without a witness. She asked me to do her another favor, which I had no difficulty in granting. She wanted me to promise her that I would sup and spend the night at the casino at least once a week and after supper write her a short letter, which the caretaker's wife would convey to her as always.

In this way we spent two weeks quietly enough, until she recovered her vivacity and her amorous inclinations returned in full force. The news which she gave me, and which was balm to my soul, was that C. C. no longer had anything to fear.

Still in love and reduced to having no resource but an awkward grating, we were inflamed. We racked our brains to devise some way of meeting freely. M. M. assured me that she could still count on the fidelity of the gardener's wife for getting out and in without any fear of being seen, since the little door close to the convent by which she entered the garden was not visible from any window and indeed was thought to have been walled up, and that no one could see her either when she crossed the garden to reach the lodge on the little quay, which was also thought to be unusable. We only needed a one-oared gondola, and she thought it impossible that, with the help of money, I could not find a gondolier upon whom we could rely. I was unhappy to realize that she suspected me of having very little love for her.

I proposed to go all alone in a boat of which I would myself be the boatman and from which I would disembark, enter the garden, and then, shown the way by herself or the lay sister, her room, in which I would spend the whole night and even the whole of the next day if she was sure that she could keep me hidden; but the plan made her tremble: she shuddered to think of the risk I would run.

"But," she said, "since you can row, come in the boat, let me know the hour and, if possible, the minute; the faithful woman will be on the watch and you can be sure you will not wait more than four minutes; I will get into the boat, we will go to the casino, and we will be happy for a time."

I promised her that I would consider it; and this was the way I found to satisfy her:

I bought a small boat and, without telling her, I went to the island alone at night and rowed around it to see all the walls of the convent on the Lagoon side. A small closed door which caught my eye could only be the one onto the quay by which she habitually left. But to go from there to the casino the necessary rounding of half the island was no small matter, for the dry season forced me to fetch a wide course. With only one oar it took me at least a quarter of an hour.

As soon as I felt sure of it, I communicated my plan to M. M., who greeted it joyously. We settled on Friday, the day after Ascension Day, and on the same day I went to the visiting room masked, and we set our watches together; then I went to the casino to order supper for two.

An hour after sunset I went to San Francesco della

Vigna,[7] where I had my boat in a cavana[8] which I rented. After having it bailed and put in good order I quickly dressed in the costume of the gondoliers and, stationed on the poop, I went directly to the little quay of the convent, the door of which opened at the very moment I arrived and where I did not have to wait the four minutes. Scarcely was the door open before M. M. came out, the door was shut again, and she got into the boat concealed in the hood of her cloak. Without in the least forcing my speed, in a quarter of an hour I reached the casino, where she got out at once and I followed two minutes later, for I had to fasten the boat to a chain and secure it with a padlock to safeguard it from thieves, who amuse themselves at night stealing as many boats as they can when they find them fastened only with rope. I was dripping sweat; but that did not prevent my angel from falling on my neck; gratitude challenged love; proud of my exploit, I smiled at the impulses of her soul. Since I had forgotten to bring a shirt with me, she gave me one of her shifts after drying me off and applying powder to absorb the sweat which covered my head. We did not sup until after we had spent two hours in prey to the flame which burned us even more violently than at the beginning of our acquaintance; but for all her protests I cheated her at the moment of danger, too greatly fearing the picture which our friend had drawn and which was ineffaceably imprinted on my mind. M. M., gay and wanton, finding me quite different in the guise of a gondolier, animated our encounters with the freest expressions; but she did not need to add anything to my ardor, for I loved her more than myself.

The nights were short. She had to return to the convent at six o'clock,[9] and four o'clock was just striking when we sat down at table. But what happened then not only to mar our joy but to make our hair stand on end was a storm coming up in the west. We could only console ourselves by counting on the nature of these storms, which usually last no more than an hour; we hoped that it would not be an unusual one and that it would not leave behind it a wind which would be too strong for me, who, though brave, had neither the experience nor the strength of a gondolier.

In less than a half an hour the storm bursts with thunder and lightning, the thunder roars incessantly, and after a heavy rain the sky clears again, but without a moon, which cannot shine during Ascension Week.[10]

Five o'clock strikes, but what I had foreseen happened. After the storm the west wind, which was contrary for me, was blowing hard: ma tiranno del mar Libecchio resta ("but Libecchio remains the tyrant of the sea").[11] This libecchio, which Ariosto rightly calls "the tyrant of the sea," is the southwest; I said nothing, but it terrified me. I tell M. M. that we must sacrifice an hour of pleasure to prudence: we must leave at once, for if the wind increases it will be impossible for me to round the point. She listens to reason and she goes to the chest, to which she also had a key, to take forty or fifty zecchini which she needed. She was delighted when she saw four times as much money as she had had at the end of Lent. She thanked me for not having told her and, saying that she wanted only my heart, she went down and lay at full length in the bottom of the boat. I mounted the poop, full of courage and fear at the same time, and in five minutes I rounded the point. But beyond it I encountered a resistance greater than my strength. Except for that resistance, I should have needed only ten minutes. Without a rower at the prow I thought it impossible that I could combat the wind and the current; I was rowing with all my strength; but all I could do was to keep the boat from going backward. After half an hour of this trying effort I felt that I was losing my breath and I dared say nothing; I could not think of resting, for the least rest would instantly have driven me back. M. M. lay there in silence, afraid to speak, for she knew that I would not have the strength to answer her. Finally I felt sure that I was lost.

Far off I see a boat approaching rapidly; certain that I shall be rescued, I wait for it to pass me, for otherwise the wind would have prevented it from hearing my voice. As soon as I see it on my left, only two fathoms away, I cry:

"Help! for two zecchini!"

The boat at once lowers sail, rows to me with four oars, makes fast, and I ask only for one man to take me to the opposite point of the island. They demand a zecchino, which I hand over at once, promising another to whoever will get me to the point by manning the poop. In less than ten minutes, I rowing at the prow, we were off the little quay of the convent; but our secret was too precious to me to be risked. We reached the point, where I dismissed my man, giving him his zecchino. From there, with the wind in my favor, I easily reached the small port, where M. M. disembarked, saying only these words to me:

"Go and sleep at the casino."

I thought her advice very good, and I followed it. I had the wind in my favor, and if I had done the opposite I should have been in the same peril. I went to bed, I slept eight hours, I wrote to M. M. that I was well and that we would see each other at the grating; then I went to San Francesco, where, after having my boat put back in the cavana, I masked and went to the Liston.

The next day M. M. came to the grating alone so that I could share in the many reflections which her mind needed to make after all that had happened to us. But the result of our reflections was not to determine us never again to expose ourselves to such a danger; we only decided to anticipate the storm, if it should recur, by leaving everything the moment we saw it rising. It took us no more than a quarter of an hour. This was the only precaution which love allowed us to adopt. We fixed our second meeting for the Tuesday in Whitsun Week. Had we not encountered the boat bound for Torcello, I should have had to go back to the casino with M. M., who, it being then impossible for her to return to the convent, would have remained with me. I should have had to leave Venice with her and I could not have returned there, and, her fate being linked with mine, my life would have been governed by a destiny entirely different from the one whose vicissitudes have combined to bring me, at the age of seventy-two, to Dux, where I am today.

We continued for three months to see each other once a week, always in love and never troubled by the slightest mishap. M. M. could not keep from reporting it to the Ambassador, to whom I was also obliged to write an account of all that happened to us. He answered that he congratulated us on the happiness we were enjoying, but that he could foresee nothing but misfortunes if we did not resolve to make an end.

Mr. Murray,[12] the English Resident, a handsome man, full of wit, learned, and a prodigious lover of the fair sex, Bacchus, and good eating, was keeping the celebrated Ancilla,[13] who, encountering me in Padua, wanted me to make his acquaintance. After treating me to three or four suppers, this gallant man became my friend in the same way that the Ambassador had been, with only the difference that the latter liked to be the spectator and the former liked to provide the spectacle himself. I was never unwelcome at his amorous encounters, in which, to tell the truth, he acquitted himself well, the voluptuous Ancilla being delighted to have me for a witness; but I never gave them the satisfaction of joining in their bouts. I loved M. M.; but that was not the chief reason. Ancilla was always hoarse and constantly complained of a pain in her throat. I feared the pox, despite the fact that Murray was in good health. She died of it in the autumn,[14] and a quarter of an hour before she expired her lover Murray, in my presence, yielded to her insistence and paid her the homage of a devoted lover despite a cancer which disfigured her. The thing became known all over the city, for it was he himself who told it, citing me as witness. It was one of the most striking spectacles I have seen in all my life. The cancer which ate away her nose and half of her beautiful face came up again from her esophagus two months after she believed she was cured of the pox by mercury ointment, which was administered to her by a surgeon named Lucchesi, who had undertaken to cure her for a hundred zecchini. She promised them to him in writing on condition that she would not pay them to him until after he had himself played the role of devoted lover to her. Lucchesi was unwilling to go so far, and since she obstinately refused to pay him unless he fulfilled the stipulated condition, the matter was taken before the magistrate. In England Ancilla would have won her case, but in Venice she lost it. The judge in his decision said that an unfulfilled criminal condition could not invalidate the contract. A very wise decision.

Two months before the cancer had eaten away the charming face of the celebrated courtesan and made it revolting, Signor Memmo,[15] my friend, later Procuratore di San Marco, asked me to take him to her house. At the height of the conversation a gondola arrives, and we see that the person getting out of it is Count Rosenberg,[16] Ambassador from the Court of Vienna. Signor Memmo was panic-stricken, for a Venetian nobleman cannot be in the company of an envoy of a foreign court without becoming guilty of a grave crime. So Signor Memmo rushes out of Ancilla's room and takes to his heels, and I follow him; but near the stairs he meets the Ambassador, who, seeing that he is trying to hide, bursts out laughing. I instantly board Signor Memmo's gondola with him and accompany him to the house of Signor Cavalli,[17] Secretary to the State Inquisitors, who lives a hundred paces away on the same Grand Canal. The only way Signor Memmo had of saving himself from at least a serious reprimand was to go at once and tell the story to the Secretary of the tribunal, who would see that the thing was innocent; he was very glad that I was with him to testify to the harmlessness of the occurrence.

Signor Cavalli receives Signor Memmo with a smile, saying that he had done very well to come and confess without losing any time. Signor Memmo, in the utmost astonishment, then told him the brief story of the meeting, and the Secretary gravely said that he was informed of it and that he did not doubt the truth of his account, since the circumstances were the same as those which he already knew.

Leaving Signor Cavalli's we discussed the occurrence sufficiently to decide that it could not possibly be known to him; but the maxim of the tribunal was never to let it be thought that it was in the dark concerning anything.

After Ancilla's death Resident Murray remained without an official mistress; but, changing from one to another, he always had the prettiest girls in Venice. This amiable epicurean left two years later[18] for Constantinople, where he remained for twenty years as his country's envoy. He returned to Venice in 1778, intending to settle down and end his days in peace there without taking any further hand in politics; but he died in the Lazaretto[19] a week before finishing his quarantine.

Fortune, which continued to treat me well at cards, my meetings with M. M., the secret of which no one could any longer betray since the nuns, who alone could reveal it, were concerned to keep it inviolable, combined to make my life very happy; but I foresaw that as soon as the Ambassador should decide to disabuse M. M. of her continued hope that she would see him back in Venice, he would also recall the servants to whom he was still paying wages in Venice and we should be without a casino. In addition I could no longer continue to go to Murano rowing alone in a small boat once the bad weather set in.

The first Monday in October—the day on which, with the opening of the theaters, masking began—I go to San Francesco, I mount the poop of my boat, and I go to Murano to fetch M. M., who was waiting for me; from there I go to the casino and, the nights having grown longer, we sup, then go to bed, and, at the sound of the alarm, prepare to exchange an amorous good morning, when a noise I seem to hear from the direction of the canal sends me to the window. I am greatly surprised to see a large boat row away, taking mine with it. I tell the robbers that I will give them ten zecchini if they will leave it for me; but they laugh, they refuse to believe me, and they make off, certain that at that hour I could neither raise a hue and cry nor go after them. The loss distresses me, and even M. M. is in despair, for she does not see how I can make it good. I quickly dress, thinking no more of love and with my only consolation the fact that I still had two hours in which to go and find a boat at all costs. I should have had no difficulty if I could have called a gondola; but the gondoliers would have been certain the next day to tell all Murano that they had taken a nun back to such-and-such a convent. So my only resource was to find a boat and buy it. I put pistols in my pocket and, after getting an oar and a rowlock, I leave, assuring M. M. that I will return with a boat even if I have to steal the first one I find. It was with this idea that I was taking the oar and the rowlock. The robbers had filed the chain of my boat with a smooth file. I had no files.

I go to the big bridge, where I knew that there were boats, and I see a quantity of them of all sorts, and tied, but there were people on the quay. Running like a madman I see a tavern open at the end of the quay. I go in and ask the waiter if there are any boatmen there; he answers that there are two who are drunk. I go and speak to them and ask them which of them wants to earn four lire to take me to Venice at once. My proposition sets them quarreling over which shall have the preference. I quiet them by giving forty soldi to the one who was the more drunk, and I go out with the other.

"You've drunk too much," I say, "lend me your boat and I will return it to you tomorrow."

"I don't know you."

"I'll leave you a deposit. Here are ten zecchini; but who will vouch for you, for your boat is not worth that and you might leave it on my hands."

He then takes me back to the same tavern, and the waiter stands surety that if I come back that day with the boat the tavernkeeper will return me my money. Very glad that he had succeeded, he takes me to his boat, puts two rowlocks and another oar in it, and goes off well satisfied to have cheated me, as I was to have submitted to being cheated. The whole business had cost me an hour. I arrived at the casino, where M. M. was in the greatest uneasiness; but as soon as she saw me all her gaiety reappeared. I took her to the convent and I went to San Francesco, where the man who rented me the cavana thought I was making fun of him when I told him that I had exchanged my boat for this one. I masked and I went home to bed, for the strain had exhausted me.

At this same time my destiny decreed that I should make the acquaintance of the patrician Marcantonio Zorzi,[20] a great wit and famed for his skill at writing couplets in the Venetian language. He also loved the theater, and, aspiring to the honor of being an author, he had written a comedy which the public had hissed. Having taken it into his head that his play had failed only because of a cabal mounted against him by the Abate Chiari,[21] poet of the Teatro di Sant'Angelo,[22] he became the declared enemy of all the Abate's comedies.

I had no difficulty in being accepted into the circle of this Signor Zorzi, who had a good cook and a pretty wife. He knew that I did not like Chiari as an author, and Signor Zorzi paid people who mercilessly hissed all his plays. My amusement consisted in criticizing them in Martellian verse,[23] a sort of doggerel then in fashion; Signor Zorzi circulated copies of my criticisms. These maneuvers made me a powerful enemy in the person of Signor Condulmer,[24] who also disliked me because I seemed to have monopolized the good graces of Signora Zorzi, whom he had been courting assiduously before my appearance. However, Signor Condulmer had good reason to dislike me because, since he owned a good share of the Teatro di Sant'Angelo, the failure of the poet's plays injured him. The boxes could only be sold at a very low price. He was sixty years of age, he loved women, gambling, and usury; but he passed for a saint because he showed himself every morning at mass at San Marco, weeping before a crucifix. He was made a Councilor[25] the following year and as such was for eight months a State Inquisitor. In that eminent position he did not find it difficult to suggest to his two colleagues that I should be put under the Leads as a disturber of the public peace. My reader will hear of this nine months hence.

The beginning of the winter[26] brought the astonishing news of the alliance concluded between the House of Austria and France. The political system of all Europe became entirely different in consequence of the unexpected treaty, which until then had seemed beyond probability to all thinking minds. The part of Europe which had the most reason to rejoice at it was Italy, because she was suddenly delivered from the fear of becoming the unhappy theater of war whenever the least difference should arise between the two courts. The celebrated treaty had sprung from the head of a young minister who until then had done nothing in politics except play the role of wit. The surprising treaty, which perished after forty years, was hatched in the year 1750 between Madame de Pompadour, Count (later Prince) Kaunitz, the Viennese Ambassador, and the Abbé de Bernis, who became known only the following year when the King appointed him Ambassador to Venice. It reunited the Houses of Austria and Bourbon in friendship after two hundred and forty years of enmity. Count Kaunitz, having returned to Vienna at the same time, brought the Empress Maria Theresa a letter from the Marquise de Pompadour which put the finishing touch to the great negotiation. The Abbé de Bernis concluded it at Vienna[27] the same year, still as Ambassador of France to Venice. Three years later,[28] as Minister of Foreign Affairs, he re-established the Parlement, after which he was created a cardinal, then disgraced, then given a post in Rome, then died. Mors ultima linea rerum est ("Death is the final boundary line of all things").[29]

Nine months[30] after he left he announced his recall to M. M., putting it as gently as possible; but if I had not forestalled the blow by preparing her little by little to rise above it, she would have succumbed under it. It was to me that he gave his instructions. All the furnishings of the casino were to be sold and whatever they brought was to go to M. M., except the books and the engravings, which the caretaker was to convey to him in Paris.

While M. M. did nothing but weep, I carried out all the instructions. By the middle of January 1755 we no longer had a casino. She took away two thousand zecchini and her diamonds and pearls, thinking she might sell them some other time to buy herself an annuity, and she left me our winnings at cards, in which we always shared and shared alike. At this time I had three thousand zecchini, and we no longer saw each other except at the grating; but she fell ill and her life was in danger. I saw her at the grating on February 2nd; her face displayed the signs of approaching death. She gave me the case with all her diamonds, all the money she had except a small sum, all the scandalous books, and all her letters, saying that I should return everything to her if she escaped from the illness on which she was entering and that everything would be mine if she died. She said that C. C. would be at pains to write me all her news and she begged me to have pity on her and continue to write to her, for she could look for no consolation except from my letters; she hoped to have the strength to read until the last moment of her life. I assured her, melting into tears, that I would stay in Murano until she had recovered her health. She said as she left me that she was sure C. C.'s aunt would let her be with her.

In the greatest grief, I had a sack full of books and packets of letters put into a gondola; and having pocketed the purses filled with money I returned to Venice, where I put everything in a safe place in the Palazzo Bragadin.[31] An hour later I went back to Murano to ask Laura to find me a furnished room in which I could live in complete freedom. She answered that she knew where there were two furnished rooms and a kitchen which I could have very cheaply and even without saying who I was if I would pay a month in advance to an old man who lived on the ground floor; he would give me all the keys, and if I liked I need never see anyone. She gave me the address, I went there at once, and finding everything more than satisfactory I paid for a month, he gave me the key to the street door and immediately made up the beds. It was a casino at the foot of a blind alley ending at the canal. I went back to Laura's and told her I needed a maidservant who would bring in meals for me and who could make my bed, and she promised me one for the next day.

I then returned to Venice, where I packed as if I had to make a long journey. After supper I took my leave of Signor Bragadin and my two other friends, telling them that I should be away for several weeks on very important business.

The next morning I took a traghetto gondola and went to my new little casino, where I was very much surprised to find Tonina, Laura's pretty fifteen-year-old daughter, who, blushing but with a presence of mind which I had not known she possessed, said that she would not be afraid to serve me with as much zeal as her mother herself could have shown.

In my afflicted state I could not be grateful to Laura for such a present, and I even decided at once that, since the thing could not lead where she wished it to, her daughter could not remain in my service. Meanwhile I treated her gently, I told her that I was certain of her good will, but that I wanted to talk with her mother. I said that as I wished to spend the whole day writing I would not eat until nightfall, and that I left it to her to see that adequate meals were brought in for me. After leaving my room she came back and gave me a letter, saying that she had forgotten to give it to me at once.

"You must never forget," I said, "for if you had waited another minute before giving me this letter a great misfortune might have resulted."

She blushed for shame. It was a short letter from C. C., in which she told me that her dear friend was in bed and that the convent physician had found that she had a fever. She promised me a long letter the next day. I spent the day setting my room in order, then writing to M. M. and to my poor C. C. Tonina came to bring me candles and say that my dinner was ready. I told her to serve it to me, and seeing that she had set only one place I made her set another, saying that she would always eat with me. I had very little appetite, but I found everything good except the wine. Tonina promised to find me some better wine, and she went off to bed in my anteroom.

After sealing my letters I went to see if Tonina had locked the door of her room on the stairway side, and I found it bolted. I sighed when I saw the girl, who was in a deep sleep or pretending to be, and whose idea I easily saw through; but I had never in my life felt so afflicted; I judged the intensity of my feeling by the indifference with which I looked at her and by my certainty that neither she nor I ran the slightest risk.

In the morning I called her very early, and she came in fully and neatly dressed. I gave her my letter for C. C., which contained one for M. M., and I told her to take it to her mother at once and return to make me coffee. At the same time I told her that I would dine at noon. She then said that she had cooked dinner for me the evening before, and that if I had been satisfied with it she would do the same every day. After telling her that it would please me if she did so, I gave her another zecchino. She said that she still had six lire left from the one I had given her the day before; but when I told her that I made her a present of the difference and that I would do the same thing every day, I could not prevent her from kissing my hand ten times. I was careful not to take it from her and embrace her, for I should but too easily have yielded to my natural inclination for amusement, which would have dishonored my grief. Et faveo morbo cum juvat ipse dolor ("I foster my sickness when the pain itself gives me pleasure").[32]

So the day passed like the one before. Tonina went to bed very glad that she had pleased me in her role of servant and that I had not again said that I wanted to talk with her mother. After sealing my letter, fearing that I should wake too late, I called the girl in a low voice, not wanting to wake her if she was asleep; but she heard me and came to find out what I wanted, wearing only a petticoat over her shift. Seeing too much, I at once turned my eyes away. Without looking at her I gave her the letter addressed to her mother, ordering her always to take it to her in the morning before entering my room.

She went back to her bed, and aware of my weakness I was saddened. I saw that Tonina was so pretty that, thinking how easily she would have cured my grief, I felt ashamed. My grief was precious to me. I fell asleep resolved to tell Laura to rid me of her talisman, but in the morning I could not bring myself to do it. I was afraid of causing the kindhearted girl the most painful of mortifications.

CHAPTER IX

Continuation of the preceding chapter. M. M. recovers. I return to Venice. Tonina consoles me. Weakening of my love for M. M. The physician Righelini. My strange conversation with him. Its consequences in regard to M. M. Mr. Murray undeceived and avenged.

DURING the following days she did not go off to bed until after receiving my letter, and I was grateful to her, because for two entire weeks M. M.'s illness grew so much worse that I expected every moment to receive word of her death. On the last day of the Carnival C. C. wrote me that her dear friend had not had the strength to read my letter, and that she was to receive the last sacraments the next day. Stricken by the news, I could neither get up nor eat. I spent the day writing and weeping, and Tonina did not leave my bedside until midnight; but I could not close my eyes.

The next morning Tonina gave me a letter from C. C., in which she told me that, between life and death, M. M. might live for another two or three weeks; a slow fever never left her, her weakness was extreme, she could take only broths, and her confessor was hastening her death by his boring sermons. I melted into tears. I could only soothe my grief by writing, and Tonina, with her sound sense, said that I was fostering it and that I would die of it. I myself saw that grief, staying in bed, eating almost nothing, and writing all day would drive me mad. I had imparted my sorrow to the poor girl, who no longer knew what to say to me. Her occupation had become drying my tears. I pitied her.

On the eighth or tenth day of the Carnival, after assuring C. C. that if M. M. died I should survive her by only a few days, I begged her to tell her dying friend that, if I was to live myself, I needed her promise that she would let me carry her off if she recovered. I told her that I had four thousand zecchini and her diamonds, worth six thousand, amounting to a capital which would give us enough to live well on anywhere in Europe.

C. C. wrote me the next day that the patient, after listening attentively while she read her my plan, had been seized with spasmodic twitchings and that when they subsided a high fever had risen into her brain, so that for three whole hours she had raved in French in a way which would have scandalized the nuns who were present if they had understood what she was saying. This ominous effect of my letter made me desperate.

I saw that I should die too if I did not go back to Venice, for C. C.'s two letters, which I received morning and night, made a mockery of my love twice a day. My dear M. M.'s delirium lasted three days. C. C. wrote me on the fourth that, after sleeping for three hours, she had been able to reason and had told her to write me that she was sure she would recover if she could be certain that I would carry out the plan I had proposed to her. I answered that she should have no doubt of it, and the more so since my life depended upon my being certain that she would consent to it. And so, both deceived by our own hope, we recovered. Each letter from C. C. telling me that her friend was on the road to health was balm to my soul; my appetite returned and I listened with pleasure to the simple-minded Antonina, who had got into the habit of not going to bed until she saw that I was asleep.

Toward the end of March M. M. herself wrote me that she thought she was out of danger and that, with the help of a proper diet, she hoped she would be able to leave her room after Easter. I replied that I would not leave Murano until after I had seen her at the grating, where we would agree in good time on the plan which would make us happy until death. On the same day I thought I should go to dine with Signor Bragadin, who, having heard no news of me for seven weeks, must be uneasy.

After telling Tonina not to expect me until about the fourth hour[1] of the night, I went to Venice without a cloak because, having gone to Murano masked, I had none. I had spent forty-eight days without ever leaving my room, forty of them in grief, and fifteen of those scarcely eating or sleeping. I had just conducted an experiment on myself which was highly flattering to my self-esteem. I had been waited on by a girl as pretty as they come, who had done everything to please me, gentle as a lamb, and whom, without any conceit on my part, I could believe to be, if not in love with me, at least inclined to grant me all the favors I might ask; and despite all that I had been able to resist all the power which her young charms had wielded over me during the first two weeks. I had reached the point, after the illness which had kept me prostrate for almost three weeks, of no longer fearing her. Being used to seeing her had dissipated my amorous sensations and had replaced them by feelings of friendship and gratitude, for her attentions to me had been most assiduous. She had spent whole nights in an armchair near my bed, and she had ministered to me as if she had been my mother.

It is true that I had never given her a single kiss, that I had been careful never to undress in her presence, and that, except for the first time, she had never entered my room less than decently dressed; nevertheless, I knew that I had fought. I felt proud of having gained the victory. What annoyed me was that neither M. M. nor C. C. would have believed the thing if they had heard of it, and that Laura herself, to whom her daughter must certainly have told everything, would only have pretended to believe it.

I arrived at Signor Bragadin's just as the soup was being served. He received me with cries of joy, laughing because he had always said that I would give them just such a surprise. Besides my two other friends, De La Haye, Bavois, and the physician Righelini[2] were at the table.

"What! without a cloak!" said Signor Dandolo.

"Because, having set out masked, I left it in my room."

The laughter redoubled, and I sat down. No one asked me where I had been for so long, since politeness demanded that it be left to me to bring up the subject; but the curious De La Haye could not refrain from making a little thrust at me, though with a smile.

"You have grown so thin," he said, "that evil tongues will be saying the worst about you."

"What will they say?"

"That you may well have spent the Carnival and nearly the whole of Lent in a warm room in the house of a skillful surgeon."

After allowing the company to laugh, I answered De La Haye that to escape such a hasty judgment I would leave that same evening. For all his saying "No, no," I told him that I thought too highly of his opinion not to act in accordance with it. Seeing that I was speaking seriously, my friends showed their displeasure, and the critic remained silent.

Righelini, who was an intimate friend of Murray's, said that he could not wait to bring him the news of my resuscitation and tell him that everything that had been said about my disappearance was nonsense. I said that we would sup at his house and that I would leave again after supper. To reassure Signor Bragadin and my other friends I promised to dine with them on April 25th, St. Mark's Day.

When the Englishman Murray saw me, he fell on my neck. He introduced me to his wife, a Lady Holderness,[3] who most obligingly invited me to supper. After telling me any number of stories which had been invented about me, Murray asked me if I knew a short novel [4] by the Abate Chiari which had been published at the end of the Carnival, and he made me a present of it, assuring me that it would interest me. He was right. It was a satire which tore Signor Marcantonio Zorzi's circle to shreds and in which the Abate made me cut a very poor figure; but I did not read it until some time afterward. Meanwhile I put it in my pocket. After supper I went to a traghetto to take a gondola and returned to Murano.

Midnight had struck, and, the sky being cloudy, I did not stop to see if the gondola was in good condition. It was raining just a little, and when the rain became heavier, I wanted to protect myself by drawing the blinds, but I found neither blinds nor the heavy cloth which usually covers the felce. A slight cross wind made the rain soak me. The harm was not great. I arrive at my little casino, I grope my way up the stairs, I knock at the door of my anteroom, where Tonina had already gone to bed. She had waited for me until four o'clock, and it was an hour after midnight.

As soon as Tonina heard my voice she came and opened the door. She had no light, I needed one, she fetches the tinderbox, and since I was in her room she gently warns me, with a little laugh, that she is in her shift. I answer offhandedly that unless she is dirty it does not matter. She does not reply and she lights a candle. She bursts out laughing when she sees me wetter from the rain than anyone has a right to be.

I said that all I needed her to do for me was to dry one side of my hair, and she quickly brought powder and powder puff; but since her shift was very short and wide across the shoulders, I repented too late. I foresaw that I was lost, and all the more lost since she was laughing heartily because, having both hands encumbered with the powder puff and the powder box, she could not hold her shift up to prevent me from seeing a budding bosom whose power only a dead man would not feel. How was I to turn my eyes away? I fasten them there so openly that poor Tonina blushes.

"Come," I said, "take the front of your shift between your teeth and I will see nothing."

I put it there myself, but then I see half of two thighs which make me cry out. Not knowing how to hide her top and bottom from me at the same time, Tonina quickly sits down on the sofa, and I remain on fire, unable to make up my mind to anything.

"What now?" she says in an agitated voice. "Shall I go and get dressed to put on your nightcap?"

"No. Come sit on my lap and blindfold my eyes. Then I will blindfold yours, for I need you to help me undress."

She came; but I could bear it no longer, I clasped her in my arms, and there was no more thought of playing blindman's buff. I laid her on my bed, where, after I had covered her with kisses and sworn that I would be hers until death, she opened her arms in such a way that I saw she had long desired the moment. I picked the beautiful flower, finding it, as always, better than any of those I had picked during fourteen years.

At the end of our second encounter sleep overtook me and when I woke I found that I was in love with Tonina as I thought I had never been in love with any girl. She had got up without waking me. She came a quarter of an hour later, and giving her a thousand kisses I ask her why she had not waited for me to bid her good morning. Her only answer is to hand me C. C.'s letter. I thank her; I lay the letter aside, and I take her in my arms.

"What a wonder!" she said, laughing. "Are you in no hurry to read it? Inconstant man! Why would you not let me cure you six weeks ago? Blessed rain! But I do not reproach you. Love me as you have loved her who writes to you every day and I will be content."

"Do you know who she is?"

"She is a boarder, beautiful as an angel; but she is in there, and I am here. You are my master; and it rests only with you to be my master always."

Delighted that I could leave her in error, I promise her eternal love and ask her to come back to bed. She replies that, on the contrary, I ought to get up to dine, and she persuades me by describing a choice dinner in the Venetian fashion. I ask her who prepared it, and she answers that it was she herself, that it was an hour after noon, and that she had been up for five hours.

"You slept nine hours. We will go to bed tonight very early."

Tonina seemed to me to have become another person. Her face had the triumphant expression which is bestowed by satisfied love. I did not understand how I could have failed to perceive her rare qualities the first time I had seen her at her mother's house; but I was too much in love with C. C.; besides, she was not then mature. I got up, I drank coffee, and I asked her to put off our dinner for a couple of hours.

I found M. M.'s letter all tenderness, but not so interesting as the one of the day before. I at once set about answering her, and I was surprised to find it a burden. However, I filled four pages with the story of my short journey to Venice.

Tonina's company made my dinner delicious. Considering her at once my wife, my mistress, and my servant, I congratulated myself on being happy so easily. It was the first day on which I ate with her as her lover; so she found me all eagerness to give her unmistakable proofs of it. We spent the whole day at table talking of our love; nature does not afford a wider subject when the speakers are judge and plaintiff. She said, with enchanting sincerity, that, knowing very well that I could not fall in love with her because my heart and soul were filled with another, she only hoped to win me at some moment of surprise, and that she had seen that it was at hand when I had told her that she need not dress to light a candle. She said that until then she had told her mother the plain truth and that she had never believed her; but that now, to punish her, she would tell her nothing. Tonina was intelligent, and she could neither write nor read. She was delighted to have become rich without anyone in Murano being able to say the slightest thing about her which could reflect on her honor. I spent twenty-two days with the girl; and today, when I recall them, I count them among the happiest of my life. I did not return to Venice until toward the end of April, as soon as I had seen M. M. at the grating, finding her greatly changed; nevertheless, sentiment helped me to act toward her in such a way that she could not be aware either that I no longer loved her as I had before or that I had abandoned the plan which had restored her to life and on which she was still counting. I was too much afraid that she would fall ill again if I deprived her of that hope. I kept my casino, which cost me only three zecchini a month, going to see M. M. twice a week and sleeping there on those days with my dear Tonina.

After keeping my word to my friends and dining with them on St. Mark's Day I went with the physician Righelini to the visiting room of the Vergini[5] to attend a profession. The Convento delle Vergini is under the jurisdiction of the Doge of Venice; the nuns address him as "Most Serene Father"; they are all Venetian ladies from the leading families.

I having praised Mother M. E., who was a perfect beauty, to Righelini, he whispered to me that he was sure he could arrange for me to see her if I was curious enough to pay for it. A hundred zecchini for her and ten for the go-between was the price; he assured me that Murray had had her and that he could have her again. Seeing my surprise, he said there was not a nun in Venice whom one could not have for money if one knew how to go about it. "Murray," he said, "had the liberality to pay five hundred zecchini to have a nun from Murano whose beauty is amazing. Her lover was the French Ambassador."

Though my passion for M. M. was declining, I felt my heart gripped as if by an icy hand. I had to resist all the power of sentiment in order to find the strength to seem indifferent to this piece of news. Despite my certainty that it was pure fiction, I was far from letting the subject drop without getting as much light on it as possible. I quietly answered Righelini, who was intelligent and a man of honor, that one might perhaps have some nun for money, but that it must happen very seldom because of the usual difficulties in convents; and as for the nun in Murano who was famous for her beauty, if it was M. M., a nun in the XXX convent, I told him that not only did I not believe Murray had had her but neither had even the French Ambassador, who must have confined himself to visiting her at the grating, where I did not know what one could accomplish.

Righelini answered coldly that the English Resident was a man of honor and that he had heard from his own lips that he had had her.

"If he had not confided it to me under the seal of secrecy," he said, "I would get him to tell you so himself. I beg you never to let him know what I have told you."

"You need say no more."

But the same evening, supping at Murray's casino with Righelini, and only the three of us being present, I spoke enthusiastically of the beauty of Mother M. E. whom I had seen at the Vergini.

"Between Masons," the Resident said to me, "you can have her for a certain price, and not a very high one, if you want to; but you must know how to go about it."

"You have been talked into believing it."

"No, I am convinced of it. It is not as difficult as you think."

"If you are convinced I congratulate you and I no longer doubt it. I do not believe that a more perfect beauty is to be found in the convents of Venice."

"You are mistaken. Mother M. M., at the XXX in Murano, is still more beautiful."

"I have heard talk of her, after seeing her once; but is it possible to have her for money too?"

"I believe so," he said with a smile, "and when I believe something it is with good reason."

"You amaze me. Nevertheless, I would wager that you have been misled."

"You would lose. Since you have seen her only once, you would perhaps not recognize her from her portrait."

"I should indeed, for her face is striking."

"Wait a moment."

He gets up from the table, leaves the room, and comes back a minute later with a box in which there were eight or ten miniature portraits, all in the same costume. They were heads with hair down and bare bosoms.

"So those," I said, "are the rare beauties whom you have enjoyed."

"Yes, and if you recognize any of them be discreet."

"You may be sure of that. I know these three. This one looks like M. M.; but admit that you may have been deceived, unless you had her by going into the convent yourself or bringing her out yourself, for after all there are women who look alike."

"How on earth can I have been deceived? I had her here, dressed in her habit, all one night. It was to herself that I gave a purse containing five hundred zecchini, and I gave the pimp another fifty."

"You must, I suppose, have called on her in the visiting room before and after you had her here?"

"No, never, for she was afraid that her official lover would learn of it. You know that he was the French Ambassador."

"She received him in the visiting room."

"She went to his house dressed as a woman of fashion whenever he wished. I know it from the same man who brought her here to me."

"Did you have her several times?"

"Once. That is enough. But I can have her when I please for a hundred zecchini."

"This is no doubt all true, but I wager five hundred zecchini that you have been tricked."

"I will answer you in three days."

I did not believe a word of it; but I needed to be certain. I shuddered when I thought that it might be true. It would have been a crime which did not deserve to be forgiven, and which, moreover, would have relieved me of a number of obligations. I was sure that I should find her innocent; but if I was to find her guilty, I would gladly lose five hundred zecchini. In short, I needed to be certain; but on the most conclusive evidence. The uncertainty rent my soul. If Murray had been tricked, M. M.'s honor demanded that I find some way to undeceive the honest Englishman. Here is how Fortune helped me.

Three or four days later the Resident said to me, in Righelini's presence, that he was sure he could have the nun for a hundred zecchini, and that he would not wager more than that.

"If I win," he said, "I shall have her for nothing; if I lose, I will give her nothing. My Mercury[6] tells me that I must wait until a masking day. The question now is to decide what we must do to be convinced, for otherwise neither of us will feel obliged to pay the wager; and to convince ourselves seems to me a difficult matter, for my honor will not permit me, if it is really M. M. who is with me, to let her know that I have betrayed her secret.''

''That would be unpardonable. Here is my plan, which cannot but satisfy us both, for after we have executed it we shall be convinced that we have fairly won or lost. As soon as you believe that you have secured the nun, you will leave her on some pretext and join me at a place where you can be sure I will be waiting for you. We will at once go to the convent, and I will have M. M. come down to the visiting room. When you have seen her, and even spoken with her, will you be convinced that the woman you have left in your house is nothing but a whore?''

''Completely convinced, and I shall never in my life have paid a wager more willingly.''

''I make you the same offer. If when I send for her the lay sister tells us that she is ill or busy, we will leave, and you will have won. You will go to supper with her and I will go where I please.''

''That is perfect. But since it can only be at night, it is possible that when you send for her the portress will answer that at that hour she does not announce visitors.''

''Then I shall have lost too.''

''So you are sure that if she is in the convent she will come down?''

''That is my concern. I repeat: if you do not speak with her, I declare myself satisfied that I have lost a hundred zecchini and even a thousand if you like.''

''No one can speak more plainly, my dear friend, and I thank you in advance.''

''I only insist that you come exactly on time, and that the hour is not too unusual for a convent.''

''An hour after sunset. Will that do?''

''Excellent.''

"I will also see to making the masker wait where I have her, even if it is the real M. M."

"She will not wait long if you can have her brought to you at a casino I have in Murano, where I secretly keep a girl with whom I am in love. I will arrange for her not to be there that day and I will give you the key to the casino. I will even have a little cold supper ready for you."

"That is perfect. I must know where the casino is so that I can tell my Mercury."

"Of course. I will have both of you to supper tomorrow evening, and all three of us will observe the greatest secrecy. We will go to my casino by gondola and we will leave after supper by a door onto the street; in that way you will learn how to go there by water and by land. You will only need to show M. M.'s guide the quay and the door. On the day he is to bring her to you, you will have the key and no one will be there except an old man who lives in a little room downstairs, from which he will see neither those who come in nor those who go out. My little girl will see nothing and will not show herself. Rest assured that I will arrange it all perfectly."

"I begin to believe," said the Resident, delighted with my arrangement, "that I have lost the wager; but I will see the thing out with the greatest pleasure."

I left them after making an appointment to meet them again the following evening.

In the morning I went to Murano, to tell Tonina that I would come to supper with her bringing two friends and to leave her some bottles of good wine, for my dear Englishman was a great and capable drinker. Tonina, delighted at the pleasure it would give her to do the honors of the table, only asked me if my two friends would leave after supper; and I saw that she was very happy when I said yes. After spending an hour in the visiting room with M. M., who was recovering her health and beauty every day, I went back to Venice and at the second hour of the night I returned to Murano with the Resident and Righelini, reaching my little casino by water.

The dinner was made delicious by the graces and the bearing of my dear Tonina. What a pleasure for me to see Righelini enchanted and the Resident reduced to silence by his admiration! When I was in love my manner did not encourage my friends to ingratiate themselves with the object of my love, though I was more obliging when time had cooled my flame.

After midnight we rose from table, and after showing Murray the way from the door of my casino to the place where I would wait for him on the night I was to take him to the convent, I went back to the casino to pay Tonina all the compliments she deserved both for the excellent plain supper she had prepared and for her charming behavior at table. She praised my friends, greatly astonished that the Resident had left fresh as a rose after emptying six bottles. Murray looked like a fine Bacchus painted by Rubens.

On Whitsunday Righelini came to tell me that Murray had arranged everything with M. M.'s alleged Mercury for the next day but one. I gave him the keys to the two doors of my casino, and told him to assure him that at the first hour of the night I would be at the door of the cathedral church.[7] My impatience brought on palpitations which would not subside; I spent two nights unable to sleep. Despite my being certain and more than certain that M. M. was innocent, I was nevertheless very uneasy. But what was the cause of my uneasiness? It seemed that it could only come from my impatience to see the Resident undeceived. In his mind M. M. must be nothing but a low hussy until the moment he became convinced that he had been tricked. The idea wrung my heart.

Murray was as impatient as I, but with the difference that he, seeing the thing as a comedy, laughed over it, while I, seeing it as a tragedy, shuddered.

So on Tuesday morning I went to my casino in Murano to order Tonina to set out a cold supper, bottles, and everything necessary in my room and then to withdraw to the room of the old owner of the house, where she was to remain until after the guests had left. She assured me that I would be obeyed, without asking me a single question. After that I went to the visiting room and sent for M. M.

Not expecting my visit, she asks me why I had not gone to accompany the Bucentaur, which, the weather being fair, was to set out that day. After I had made several disconnected remarks, as she was quick to perceive, I finally came to the important matter.

"I must," I say, "ask you to do me a favor, and the peace of my soul demands that you grant it to me blindly without asking me for the reason."

"Command me, dear heart, I will refuse you nothing if only it is within my power."

"I will come this evening at the first hour of night, I will have you called to this grating, and you will come. You will stay with me only a moment. I shall be with someone. You will say two or three words to him, as politeness demands, then you will leave. Now let us try to find a pretext which will justify the unusual hour."

"It shall be done. But you cannot imagine how difficult it is in this convent to come down to the visiting room at night, for at twenty-four o'clock the visiting rooms are closed and the keys are with the Abbess. But since it is only a matter of five minutes I will tell the Abbess that I am expecting a letter from my brother which must be delivered to me this evening so that I can answer it at once. You will give me a letter, and the nun who will be with me will see it."

"You will not come alone?"

"No. I should not even dare to ask it."

"Very well. It makes no difference. Only try to come with some old nun whose sight is dim."

"I will leave the candle behind."

"No, no, my angel. On the contrary, you must set it on the rail of the grating, for it is important that the masker who will be with me sees your face."

"That is strange. But I have promised to obey you blindly. I will come down with two candles. May I hope that you will give me the answer to this enigma the first time we meet again?"

"I give you my word of honor that I will tell you all about it no later than tomorrow."

"I am curious to hear it."

After this agreement the reader will believe that my heart was at rest. Not a bit of it. I went back to Venice tormented by the fear that Murray would come to the door of the cathedral that evening only to tell me that his Mercury had informed him that the nun had been obliged to put it off. If that had happened I should certainly not have thought M. M. guilty; but I should have seen that the Resident had a right to think that I had been the reason why the nun had failed him. In that case I would certainly not have taken him to the visiting room. I would have gone there alone and very sad.

The day seemed extremely long to me. I put in my pocket a sham sealed letter, and at the hour agreed upon I took up my post at the door of the cathedral. Murray did not keep me waiting. I saw him a quarter of an hour later, masked as I was, hurrying toward the door.

"The nun," I said—"is she there?"

"Yes, my friend. Let us go to the visiting room if you wish, but you will see you will be told that she is ill or busy. We will call the wager off if you like."

"What are you saying? I will not call it off."

I go to the convent gate, I ask for M. M., and the portress restores me to life by saying that I was expected and that I had only to go into the visiting room. I go in with my friend, and I see that it is lighted by four candles. Can I recollect those moments without loving my life? It was not the innocence of the generous and noble M. M. which I then acknowledged, but her divine intelligence. Murray was no longer laughing. M. M. enters, dazzling, with a lay sister, each of them carrying a flat candlestick. She addresses a most flattering compliment to me in very good French. I hand her the letter; she looks at the address and the seal, then puts it in her pocket. After thanking me, she says that she will answer at once. She then looks at the Resident and says that perhaps she has made him miss the first act of the opera.

"The honor of seeing you, Signora, is worth all the operas in the world."

"I have the impression that the Signore is English."

"Yes, Signora."

"The English nation is now the first in the world. Signori, I am your very humble servant."

I had never seen M. M. so beautiful as she was at that moment. I left the visiting room on fire with love and feeling a contentment which was entirely new to me. I made my way to the casino, paying no attention to the Resident, who, no longer being in a hurry, followed me slowly. I waited for him at the door.

"Well," I said, "are you convinced now that you were tricked?"

"Be quiet. We shall have time enough to talk. Let us go up."

"You want me to go up?"

"Please do. What do you expect me to do for four hours with the whore who is upstairs? We will tan her hide."

"Better turn her out."

"No, for at two hours after midnight her pimp is to come for her. She would run and tell him, and he would escape my vengeance. We'll throw them both out the window."

"Calm yourself. M. M.'s honor demands that this matter be known to no one. Come, let us go up. We will have some fun. I am curious to see the slut."

Murray enters first. As soon as she sees me she puts a handkerchief over her face and tells the Resident that his behavior is disgraceful. Murray does not answer.

She was standing, she was not as tall as M. M., she had spoken to him in bad French. Her bautta, her cloak, and her mask were on the bed; however, she was dressed as a nun. I could not wait to see her face. I gently ask her to do me the favor.

"Who are you?" she says.

"You are in my house and you do not know who I am?"

"I am here because I have been betrayed. I did not believe I was dealing with a scoundrel."

Murray then tells her to be still, calling her by the name of her honorable trade, and the hussy got up to take her cloak, saying that she wanted to leave; but he pushed her back, telling her she must wait for her pimp and not make a noise if she did not want to go to prison instantly.

"I in prison!"

So saying she raised one hand to the opening of her dress; but I at once seized it and the Resident seized the other. We push her into a chair and we confiscate the pistols which she had in her pockets. Murray tears open the front of her sacred woolen robe and takes a stiletto eight inches long from her. The slut was weeping in torrents.

"Will you stay here quietly," said the Resident, "until Capsucefalo[8] comes, or do you want to go to prison?"

"And when Capsucefalo comes?"

"I promise to let you go."

"With him?"

"Perhaps."

"Well, I will stay here quietly."

"Have you any more weapons?"

At this question the hussy took off her dress and her petticoat and, if we had not stopped her, would have stripped naked, hoping to obtain from our animal nature what she could not hope from our reason.

What greatly astonished me during all this time was that I could see in her only a counterfeit resemblance to M. M. I said so to the Resident and he agreed with me; but, arguing with his usual astuteness, he made me admit that the power of a preconceived idea could have made many other men fall into the same trap.

CHAPTER X

The affair of the sham nun ends amusingly. M. M. learns that I have a mistress. She is avenged on the infamous Capsucefalo. I ruin myself at cards; urged on by M. M., I gradually sell all her diamonds to try my luck, which doggedly runs against me. I surrender Tonina to Murray, who provides for her. Her sister Barberina takes her place.

"SIX MONTHS ago," he said, "I happened to be at the door of the convent with Smith,[1] our Consul; I have forgotten what ceremony provided the occasion. Having seen the nun in question among ten or twelve others, I said to Smith that I would not hesitate an instant to pay five hundred zecchini to have her with me for two or three hours. Count Capsucefalo heard me and said nothing. Smith said that no one could have her except at the grating, like the French Ambassador, who often visited her. Capsucefalo came the next morning to tell me that if I had meant what I said he was sure he could arrange for me to spend a night with the nun wherever I pleased, provided she was sure the secret would be kept. He said that he had just been speaking with her and that when he had named me to her she had answered that she had seen me with Smith and that she would be very glad to sup with me, more from inclination than for the five hundred zecchini. He said that he was the only person she trusted and that it was he who took her to Venice to a casino belonging to the French Ambassador whenever she ordered him to. He ended by saying that I need have no fear of being tricked, for it was to herself alone that I should give the money when I had her with me; after all that, he took from his pocket the portrait you have seen—here it is. I bought it from him two days after I believed I had slept with her. That came about two weeks after we agreed on the terms. Though masked, she arrived in her nun's habit; but I am vexed with myself for not at least suspecting the deceit when I saw her long hair, for I knew that nuns had their hair cut. She said that those who prefer to keep it under their caps are free to do so, and I believed her."

The hussy was speaking the truth; but I did not feel it necessary to tell the Resident so just then. I examined her features with equal attention and surprise, holding the portrait, which was painted with the bosom bare. I said that so far as bosoms were concerned, painters invented them; and the shameless wench seized the occasion to show me that the copy was true to the original. I turned my back on her. The fact is that on that night I laughed at the axiom Quae sunt aequalia uni tertio sunt aequalia inter se ("Things which are equal to a third thing are equal to each other"), for the portrait resembled M. M. and it also resembled the strumpet, and the latter did not resemble M. M. Murray admitted it, and we spent an hour philosophizing. Since she insisted that she was innocent, we became curious to know how the rascal had induced her to consent to such a masquerade, and here is her story, which we saw bore the stamp of truth.

"It was two years ago that I became acquainted with Count Capsucefalo and his acquaintance was useful to me. If he did not give me money himself, he put me in the way of getting plenty of it from the people to whom he introduced me. One day near the end of last autumn he came to my house to tell me that if I was up to disguising myself as a nun in the clothes he would bring me and pretending to be a nun with an Englishman who would spend the night with me alone as my lover, I should have a hundred zecchini. He assured me that I had nothing to fear, that he would himself take me to the casino where the gull would be waiting for me, and that he would come at the end of the night to take me back to my supposed convent. I liked the plot. I laughed with anticipation. I said I was willing. On top of that, I ask you if a woman of my trade can resist the temptation to earn a hundred zecchini. Finding the whole thing very amusing, I begged to be allowed to do it; I assured him that I would play my role perfectly. The bargain was made. The only coaching I needed was in the dialogue. He said that the Englishman was bound to talk to me of nothing but my convent, and, for form's sake, ask me what lovers I had, and that I was to cut him off short and answer that I didn't know what he was talking about and even say lightly that the nearest I came to being a nun was to dress up like one, and, to convince him, I was to laugh and show him my hair. 'That,' he said, 'will not keep him from believing you are the nun he's in love with, since he will have made up his mind that you can't be anyone else.' Seeing all the ingenuity of the scheme, I did not stop to ask either the name of the nun whose part I was to play or to what convent she belonged. The only thing that interested me was the hundred zecchini. And the proof is that, though I slept with you and found you charming and even a man rather to be paid than to pay, I never bothered to find out who you are. Even now I don't know to whom I am talking. You know how we spent the night, I found it delicious, and God knows with what pleasure I was promising myself another like it today. You gave me five hundred zecchini, but I had to be satisfied with a hundred, as Capsucefalo had told me I should and as he told me yesterday you would give me a hundred tonight which I would share with him. You have discovered everything; but I have no fear, for I can mask as I please and I can't stop men who sleep with me from thinking I am a saint if it amuses them. You found weapons on me; but I can't be found guilty for that, because I only brought them to defend my life in case any violence was offered me. I cannot see that I am guilty of anything."

"Do you know me?" I asked.

"No. But I often see you passing under my windows. I live in San Rocco,[2] in the first house on the left after the bridge."

In the light of her story we concluded that Capsucefalo deserved the iron collar and the galleys a hundred times over; but we considered that the woman, being a whore, was innocent. She must have been at least ten years older than M. M., and she was pretty; but she was blonde and my dear mistress was light chestnut and at least three inches taller.

After midnight we sat down at table and ate what Antonina had prepared for us with excellent appetites. We had the firmness to leave the poor devil of a wench where she was without offering her a single glass of wine. We thought it our duty. In our conversation at table the Resident treated me to commentaries both friendly and witty on the eagerness I had shown to convince him that he had not had M. M. He said it was not natural that I should have done all I had done unless I was in love with her. I replied that, being condemned and confined to the visiting room, I was to be pitied; he answered that he would gladly pay a hundred guineas a month merely for the privilege of visiting her at the grating. So saying, he gave me the hundred zecchini he owed me, thanking me for winning them from him. I simply put them in my pocket.

Two hours after midnight we heard a soft knocking at the street door.

"Here is our friend," I said. "Restrain yourself and be sure he will confess everything."

He enters and he sees Murray and the beauty. He does not notice that there is a third person until he hears the anteroom door being locked. He turns and sees me. He knew me. Not losing his self-possession, he says:

"Ah! It's you, is it? Very well. You are aware of the need for secrecy."

Murray laughs and tells him to sit down. Holding the hussy's pistols, he asks him where he will take her before dawn, and he replies that he will take her home.

"It is possible," said the Resident, "that you will both go to prison."

"No," he answered, "because there would be too much talk and you would be laughed at. Come," he said to the wench, "get dressed and we will go."

The Resident pours him a glass of Pontacq[3] and the pimp drinks to his health. Murray praises a fine cluster of white diamonds which he was wearing on his finger, and, pretending to be interested, draws it off. He declares it perfect and asks what it cost him.

"It is worth," said Capsucefalo, decidedly taken aback, "four hundred zecchini."

"I will keep it at that price," answers the Resident.

The other lowered his head. This display of modesty makes Murray laugh. He tells the woman to get dressed and be off with her friend. It took but a moment. They left after making us the lowest of bows and curtsies.

I thereupon embraced Murray, congratulating him and thanking him for having ended the matter so quietly, for making a noise about it could have injured three innocent people. He replied that the guilty parties would be punished and that no one would ever be able to find out the reason. I then sent down for Tonina, to whom the Englishman offered wine, but she excused herself. He looked at her with burning eyes. He left, thanking me most sincerely. After he was gone Tonina was convinced in my arms that I had not been in the least unfaithful to her. After sleeping for six hours and eating dinner with her I went to the visiting room to tell my noble M. M. the whole story.

The account which I gave her, not forgetting the smallest detail, the description of all my uneasiness, to which she listened without once blinking, brought to her face the various shades of feeling which could not but arise from the various sensations of her beautiful soul. Fear, anger, indignation, approval of the measures I had taken to clear everything up, her joy at seeing that everything I had done proved that I still loved her and was worthy of her—all this appeared before my eyes to reproach me with my deceitfulness in making her believe that my only thought was to carry out my plan of taking her to France.

She was delighted to learn that the masker who had been with me was the English Resident; but I saw her stung to noble disdain when I told her that he would give a hundred guineas a month to have the privilege of visiting her at the grating. She thought she had reason to be angry with him because he had enjoyed her in imagination and because he had found the portrait, which I had shown her, a good likeness. She could not recognize herself in it. She said, with a shrewd smile, that she was sure I had not let my little maid see the sham nun, because she might have been taken in.

"Then you know that I have a young maid?"

"And what's more, that she's pretty. She is Laura's daughter. And if you love her I am very glad and so is C. C.; but I hope you will find a way to show her to me; as for C. C., she knows her."

After promising to let her see the girl, I truthfully told her the whole story of my love affair and I saw that she was pleased. Just as I was about to leave she said she thought it was her duty to have Capsucefalo assassinated, for he had dishonored her. I swore that if the Resident did not avenge us within the week I would fulfill her wish myself.

Procurator Bragadin, the elder brother of my kind patron, died about this time. His brother's death made him quite rich. But as the family was on the verge of extinction, a woman who had been his mistress and who had given him a natural son who was still alive, took it into her head to become his wife. The marriage would have legitimatized the son and the family would not have died out. By dint of assembling the Collegio[4] she would have been granted citizenship, and all would have been well. She wrote me a note asking me to come and see her. We did not know each other. Just as I was leaving to go there, Signor Bragadin sent for me. He requested me to ask the oracle if he should follow De La Haye's advice in the matter which he had promised him he would not tell me about but which the oracle could not fail to know. The oracle answers that he should follow no advice except that of his own reason, and I at once go to call on the lady.

She tells me all the circumstances, she introduces her son to me, and she says that if the marriage could take place, a deed would be executed before a notary by virtue of which upon Signor Bragadin's death I would become the proprietor of an estate which yielded five thousand scudi a year.

Instantly understanding that the business must be the same as the one which De La Haye had proposed to Signor Bragadin, I reply without hesitating that since Monsieur de La Haye had already discussed the matter with Signor Bragadin I would have no part in it. After making this brief answer I bowed to them.

I thought it very strange in De La Haye that he should intrigue to marry off my friends without my knowledge. It was only two years earlier that, if I had not opposed it, he would have married off Signor Dandolo. I was not at all concerned over the extinction of the Bragadin family, but I was very much concerned for the life of my dear benefactor, whom the activity of marriage would have killed. He was sixty-three years old and he had had an apoplectic stroke.

I went to dine with Lady Murray. Englishwomen who are daughters of lords keep their title. After dinner the Resident told me that he had communicated the whole story of the sham nun to Signor Cavalli, Secretary to the State Inquisitors, and that the Secretary had informed him the day before that everything he could wish had been done; but here is what he had learned at the coffeehouse. Count Capsucefalo had been sent to Cephalonia,[5] his birthplace, with orders never to return to Venice. The courtesan had vanished.

What is admirable in these economical dispositions by the tribunal is that no one ever knows the reason for them. Secrecy is the soul of that redoubtable magistracy, which, though unconstitutional, is necessary to the preservation of the State. I saw that M. M. was overjoyed when I told her what had happened.

At this same time I was being ruined at cards. Playing by the martingale, I lost very large sums; urged on by M. M. herself, I sold all her diamonds, leaving her in possession of only five hundred zecchini. There was no more question of an elopement. I still played, but for small stakes, dealing at casinos against poor players. Thus I waited for my luck to come back.

The English Resident, after having me to supper at his casino with the celebrated Fanny Murray,[6] asked me to invite him to supper at my little casino in Murano, which I was still keeping only because of Tonina. I did him the favor, but without imitating his generosity; he found my little Tonina gay and polite, but within bounds which were not to his taste. The next morning he wrote me a note, of which this is a copy:

"I am irretrievably in love with your Tonina. If you will surrender her to me, this is the provision I am prepared to make for her. I will take a casino, which I will rent in her name, and I will furnish it for her, immediately making her a present of the furniture, on condition that I shall be free to go to see her whenever I please and shall have all the rights in her to which an accepted lover is entitled. I will give her a chambermaid and a cook, and thirty zecchini a month for a table for two persons, not including the wines, which I will furnish myself. In addition I will give her an annuity of two hundred scudi, which will become her property when we have known each other one year. I give you eight days to answer me."

I wrote him that I needed only three,[7] that Tonina had a mother whom she respected, and that judging by appearances I thought she was pregnant.

I at once saw that if I did not fall in with this proposal I should have cruelly ruined the girl's chances in life. I went to Murano the same day and told her everything.

"Then you want to leave me?" she said, weeping. "You no longer love me."

"I love you with all my heart, and I insist that the proposal I am making to you proves it."

"No, because I can't belong to two men."

"You will belong only to your new lover. Consider that you come into possession of a dowry which can bring you a very good marriage and that I am not in a position to make any such provision for you."

"Come to supper with me tomorrow."

The next day she said that the Englishman was handsome, that when he spoke Venetian he made her laugh, and that she could love him if her mother was willing.

"In case," she said, "our temperaments do not agree, we will separate at the end of a year, and I will be the gainer by an income of two hundred scudi. I am willing. Talk to my mother."

Laura, whom I had not seen since she had given me her daughter, did not need to ask me for time to think it over. She said that Tonina would be in a position to support her and that she would leave Murano, where she was tired of serving. She showed me a hundred and thirty zecchini which Tonina had earned in my service and which she had entrusted to her. Her daughter Barberina, who was a year younger than Tonina, came to kiss my hand. I thought her striking, and I gave her all the silver money I had and told Laura that I would wait for her at her daughter's.

The good mother gave Tonina her maternal blessing, saying that she only asked her for three lire a day so that she could go to live in Venice with her family, and Tonina promised them to her. She had a boy whom she wanted to make a priest, and Barberina, who was to become a good seamstress. Her eldest daughter was already married. After concluding this important business I went to the visiting room, where M. M. made me the present of coming with C. C. I felt unfeigned pleasure in seeing her prettier than ever, though sad and in mourning because of her mother's death. She could stay with me only a quarter of an hour, being afraid that she might be seen and reprimanded, for she was still forbidden to go to the visiting room. I told M. M. the whole story of Tonina, who was going to live in Venice with the Resident, and I saw that the thing displeased her. She said that as long as I had Tonina she was sure of seeing me often, and that she would not see me often after she was gone. But the time of our eternal separation was drawing near.

It was on the same evening that I took Murray the news. He said that I could bring her with me to supper at the casino, which he designated to me, on the next day but one and leave her with him; and I did so.

In my presence the generous Englishman handed

Tonina the contract for an annuity of two hundred Venetian ducati drawn on the Bakers' Guild.[8] This is the equivalent of two hundred and forty florins. By another document he made her a present of everything in the casino except the china after she had lived with him for a year. He told her she would have a zecchino a day for the table and the servants and that if she was pregnant he would see to it that she was delivered with every comfort and that he would give me the child. In addition he told me that she would be free to receive me, and even to give me proofs of her affection until her pregnancy was over, and that she could receive her mother and also go to see her whenever she pleased. Tonina embraced him, expressing the most lively gratitude and assuring him that from that moment she would love no one but him and would only feel friendship for me. During all this scene she was able to hold back her tears; but I could not hold back mine. Murray made her happy; but I was not there to see it for long. The reason will be revealed a quarter of an hour hence.

Three days later Laura appeared in my house and, after telling me that she was already settled in Venice, asked me to take her to see her daughter. I did her the favor at once, and I was delighted to hear her alternately thanking God and me, not knowing to which of the two she was under the greater obligation. Tonina praised her lover to me in the highest terms, and did not complain that I had not come to see her, which greatly pleased me. Tonina's casino was in Cannaregio and her mother had gone to live in Castello.[9] I took her home and when we arrived there she asked me to get out of my gondola to see her little house, where she had a garden. I acceded, without remembering that I should find Barberina there.

The girl, who was as pretty as her sister though of a different type, began by arousing my curiosity. It is curiosity which makes a man who is inured to vice inconstant. If all women had the same looks and the same mental characteristics, a man would not only never become inconstant, he would never even fall in love. He would take some woman by instinct and remain content with her until he died. The economy of our world would be entirely different. Novelty is the tyrant of our soul; we know that what we do not see is more or less the same thing; but what they let us see makes us think the contrary; and that suffices them. Niggards by nature in letting us see what they have in common with other women, they force our imagination to suppose them something entirely different.

Young Barberina, who regarded me as an old acquaintance, whose own mother had taught her to kiss my hand, who had several times undressed down to her shift in my presence never supposing that there was anything about her to excite me, who knew that I had made her sister's fortune and the whole family's, and who of course thought she was the prettier because she had a whiter skin and darker eyes, realized that her only chance of conquering me was to take me by storm. Her good sense told her that, as I never went to her house, I could never fall in love with her unless she convinced me that she would grant me all the favors I could desire without its costing me the slightest effort. This reasoning was innate in her; her mother had not given her the slightest coaching.

After I had been shown her two rooms, her small kitchen, and the cleanliness of the housekeeping, Barberina asked me if I would like to go and see the garden. Her mother told her to give me some green figs if they were ripe.

In the little garden, which was twelve yards square, there was nothing but salad greens and a fig tree. I did not see any figs, but Barberina said that she saw some high up and that she would go for them if I would kindly hold the ladder for her. She climbs up, and to manage to reach some which are at a distance she stretches out one arm, throwing her body out of balance and holding to the ladder with the other hand.

"Ah, my charming Barberina! If you knew what I see!"

"What you've often seen of my sister's."

"True. But you are prettier."

Not troubling to answer me but pretending that she could not reach the figs, she puts one foot on a high branch, presenting me with a picture than which the most consummate experience could not have imagined one more seductive. She sees that I am in ecstasies, she does not hurry, and I am grateful for it. Helping her down, I ask her if the fig I was touching had been picked, and she lets me find out for myself, remaining in my arms with a smile and a sweetness which at once make me her captive. I give her an amorous kiss, which she returns with all the joy of soul which shone in her lovely eyes. I ask her if she will let me pick it, and she answers that her mother had to go to Murano the next morning and would stay there all day, that I would find her alone, and that she would refuse me nothing.

Such is the language which makes a man happy when it comes from the lips of a novice, for desires are really nothing but torments, they are positive pains, and we value enjoyment only because it frees us from them. From this we see that those who prefer a little resistance to a great receptivity are lacking in judgment.

I go upstairs again with the young darling, I embrace her in the presence of her mother, who laughs when she hears me say that she is a jewel beyond price. I give the sweet child ten zecchini, and I go away congratulating myself and at the same time berating Fortune for ill-treating me so that I could not immediately set Barberina up in the same style as her sister.

My dear Tonina had told me that politeness demanded that I should sup with her, and that if I came that day I would find Righelini there.

What amused me at her supper was the perfect accord between Tonina and the Resident. I congratulated him on having lost a certain taste. He answered that he would be sorry to have lost any of his tastes.

"You used," I said, "to enjoy practicing love without veiling its mysteries."

"That was Ancilla's taste, not mine."

The answer pleased me, for I could not have watched him making love to Tonina except with great pain. When I happened to say that I was without a casino, Righelini told me that I could have two rooms on the Fondamenta Nuove[10] cheaply. This is a considerable quarter of Venice with a northern exposure, as pleasant in summer as it is unpleasant in winter. Murano is opposite to it, and I had to go there at least twice a week. So I told Righelini that I would be glad to look at the two rooms.

At midnight I said good-by to the rich and happy Resident, and went off to bed so that I could go early the next morning to San Giuseppe[11] in Castello, where I was to spend the day with Barberina.

"I am sure," she said at once, "that my mother will not be back until this evening, my brother eats dinner at school. Here is a cold fowl, ham, cheese, and two flagons of Scopolo wine.[12] We will dine soldier fashion whenever you please."

"How did you manage to get together such an appetizing dinner?"

"My mother did it all."

"Then you told her what we are going to do?"

"All I told her was that you said you would come to see me; and I gave her the ten zecchini. She said no harm would be done if you became my lover, since my sister was no longer living with you. The news surprised me and pleased me. Why did you leave my sister?"

"We haven't left each other, for I supped with her last night; but we are no longer living together as lovers. I surrendered her to a friend of mine, who has provided for her handsomely."

"Good! Please tell her that I have taken her place and that you found me such that you can swear I have never loved anybody."

"And if the news grieves her?"

"So much the better. Will you do me the favor? It's the first one I've asked of you."

"I promise to tell her everything."

After this preamble we breakfasted, and then in perfect singleness of purpose went to bed, more as if we were going to sacrifice to Hymen than to Love.

The rite being a new experience for Barberina, her transports, her unformed ideas, which she expressed to me with the utmost ingenuousness, and her yieldings seasoned with the charms of inexperience would not have surprised me if I had not found that I was feeling inexperienced myself. I had the impression that I was enjoying a fruit whose sweetness I had never so fully tasted in the past. Barberina was ashamed to let me know that I had hurt her, and the same desire to dissimulate spurred her to do everything to convince me that the pleasure she felt was greater than the pleasure she really did feel. She was not yet a grown girl; the roses of her burgeoning breasts had not yet budded; her attainment of puberty as yet existed only in her young mind.

We got up for dinner, then we went back to bed, where we remained until evening. When Laura returned she found us dressed and happy. After making the beautiful child a present of twenty zecchini I left, assuring her of eternal love and certainly with no intention of deceiving her; but what destiny was preparing for me was incompatible with my plans.

The next day I went with the physician Righelini to see the two rooms; they were to my liking and I took them at once, paying three months in advance. The daughter of the mistress of the house, who was a widow, had been bled. She was a patient whom Righelini had been attending for nine months and whom he could not cure. I went into her room with him, and I thought I saw a statue of wax. I said it was beautiful but that the sculptor should give it some color; at which the statue smiled. Righelini said that I should not be surprised at her pallor, for she had just been bled for the hundred and fourth time. She was eighteen years old,[13] and having never had her menses she felt as if she were dying three or four times a week; and she would die, I was told, if a vein was not opened at once. He was thinking of sending her to the country, hoping much from the change of air. After telling the Signora that I would sleep in her house that night, I left with the physician. Talking to me of the girl's illness, he said that the real remedy to cure her would be a strong lover.

"As her physician," I answered, "you could also be her pharmacist."

"I should be risking too much, for I might be forced into marriage, which I fear more than death."

CHAPTER XI

The beautiful patient. I cure her. Plot hatched to ruin me. Incident at the house of the young Countess Bonafede. The Erberia. House search. My conversation with Signor Bragadin. I am arrested by order of the State Inquisitors.

SO AFTER supping early with Signor Bragadin I go to my new casino to enjoy the cool air from the balcony of my bedroom. On entering the balcony I am surprised to find it occupied. A strikingly well-proportioned young lady rises and asks me to forgive her for the liberty she had taken.

"I am," she said, "she whom you took this morning for a wax statue. We do not have a light as long as the windows are open, because of the gnats; but when you wish to go to bed we will close them and go. This is my younger sister, and my mother is in bed."

I replied that the balcony should be at her service, that it was early, and that I only asked her permission to put on a dressing gown and remain in her company. She entertained me for two hours with remarks as intelligent as they were amusing, and at midnight she left. Her young sister lit a candle for me, then went away, wishing me a good sleep.

Getting into bed and thinking of the girl, it seemed to me impossible that she was ill. She spoke with energy, she was gay, cultivated, and very witty. I could not understand by what fatal mischance, if her illness required no remedy but what Righelini had said was the only one, she could still not be cured of it in a city like Venice, for despite her pallor she seemed to me perfectly deserving of an active lover and intelligent enough to make up her mind that, in one way or another, she would take a remedy than which nothing could be sweeter.

In the morning I ring to be got up, and it is the younger sister who enters; there were no servants in the house, and I did not want one of my own. I ask her for hot water to shave with and I ask her how her sister is feeling, and she says she is not ill, that her pallor is not a disease, but that she only needed to be bled every time her breath failed her.

"That does not keep her," she said, "from eating well and sleeping even better."

While the little girl was telling me all this I hear a violin.

"It's my sister," she said, "learning to dance the minuet."

I quickly dress to go and watch her, and I see a very pretty young lady whom an old dancing master was teaching to dance, though he let her turn in her toes. All that the girl lacked was the hue of the living soul. Her whiteness was too much like snow, it had no flush of rose.

The dancing master invites me to dance a minuet with his pupil, and I accept but I ask him to play larghissimo. He replies that it would tire the Signorina too much, but she tells him that she is not weak. After the minuet I saw her, with a touch of color in her cheeks, obliged to sink into a chair. However, she told the dancer that in future she wanted to dance only in that way. I said to her when we were alone that the lesson the man gave her was too short and that he did not correct her mistakes. I taught her to toe out, to offer her hand gracefully, to bend her knees in time, and when at the end of an hour I saw that she was a little overtired I asked her to forgive me and went to Murano to call on M. M.

I found her very sad. C. C.'s father having died,[1] she had been removed from the convent to marry an advocate.[2] She had left her a letter for me, in which she said that if I would again promise to marry her when I thought the time had come she would wait and persist in refusing the hand of any suitor who might appear. I answer her frankly that having no adequate income and there being no likelihood that I could expect to have one very soon, I left her at liberty, and I even advised her not to refuse anyone who asked for her hand and if she thought he could make her happy. Despite this sort of dismissal, C. C. did not marry XXX until after my escape from the Leads, when no one expected to see me back in Venice. I did not see her again until nineteen years later. For the past ten years she has been a widow and unhappy. If I were in Venice now I would not marry her, because marriage at my age is only a farce; but it is certain that I would unite her destiny with mine.

I laugh when I hear certain women calling men whom they accuse of inconstancy "perfidious." They would be right if they could prove that when we swear to be true to them we intend to fail them. Alas! We love without consulting our reason, and our reason has no more to do with it when we stop loving.

At this same time I received a letter from the Ambassador, who wrote another of the same purport to M. M. He told me that I should devote the powers of my mind to nothing but bringing M. M. to reason. He said that I could not be guilty of a greater imprudence than carrying her off to Paris, where despite all his influence she would not be safe. Charming even in her unhappiness, she infected me with her grief.

A small event caused us to reflect.

"We have just buried," she said, "a nun who died yesterday of consumption in the odor of sanctity at the age of twenty-eight. Her name was Maria Concetta. She knew you and she told C. C. your name when you used to come here to mass every feast day. C. C. could not help asking her to be discreet. The nun said you were a dangerous man of whom a girl should beware. C. C. told me all this after your masquerading as Pierrot disclosed your identity."

"What was her name when she was in the world?"

"Marta S."[3]

"Now I understand it all."

I then told M. M. the whole story of my love affair with Nanetta and Marta, ending with the letter she had written me in which she said that, though indirectly, she owed me her eternal salvation.

Within a week or ten days the conversations in which I engaged my hostess's daughter on my balcony until midnight and the lesson I gave her every morning had produced two very natural effects. The first was that she no longer lost her breath, and the second that I had fallen in love with her. Her menses had not come, but she had not needed to send for the surgeon. Righelini came to examine her, and finding that she was better he prognosticated that before autumn she would have the relief of nature, without which she could only be kept alive by art. Her mother considered me an angel whom God had sent her to cure her daughter, and the latter felt a gratitude which, in a woman, is distant from love by only the smallest of steps. I had persuaded her to dismiss her dancing master.

But at the end of ten or twelve days I thought I saw her dying before my eyes just as I was about to give her her dancing lesson. Her breath completely failed her; it was far worse than an attack of asthma. She dropped into my arms as if she were dead. Her mother, who was used to seeing her in this condition, at once sent for the surgeon, and her young sister fell to unlacing her dress and petticoat. The firmness of her bosom, which needed no color to be the perfection of beauty, surprised me. I covered it, telling her that the surgeon would bungle the bleeding if he saw it; but looking at me with expiring eyes she pushed my hand away with the greatest gentleness as soon as she realized that it was giving me pleasure to hold it there.

The surgeon arrived, quickly drew blood from her arm, and in an instant I saw her pass from death to life. He at once applied a compress, and it was over. Since he had drawn only a scant four ounces of blood and I learned from her mother that she never needed to have more drawn, I saw that the thing was not such a wonder as Righelini made it out to be. If he bled her in the same fashion twice a week he drew three pounds of blood from her in a month; it was what her menses ought to have given, and her vessels being obstructed in that direction, nature, always intent upon its own preservation, threatened her with death if she did not relieve it of the superfluity which denied it freedom of motion.

With the surgeon scarcely gone, she rather astonished me by saying that if I would wait a moment in the drawing room she would come and dance; and she came, feeling as well as if nothing had happened.

Her bosom, on which two of my senses could give a good report, had captivated my soul; she interested me so much that I returned at nightfall. I found her in her room with her sister. She said that she would come to enjoy the fresh air on my balcony at two o'clock[4] because she was expecting her godfather, who, having been an intimate friend of her father's, had come every evening to spend an hour and a half with her for the past eight years.

"How old is he?"

"Between fifty and sixty. He is married. He is Count S.[5] He is very fond of me, but like a father. He loves me today as he loved me in my earliest childhood. His wife even comes to see me sometimes and invites me to dinner. In the autumn I shall go to the country with her. He knows that you are lodging with us, and he has no objection to it. He does not know you, but if you wish you may make his acquaintance tonight."

This whole discourse, which told me everything there was to know without my having to ask indiscreet questions, delighted me. The Greek's[6] affection could only be of the flesh. He was the husband of the Countess with whom I had first seen M. M., two years earlier.

I found the Count most polite. He thanked me, adopting a fatherly tone, for the friendship I showed his goddaughter and asked me to come the next day and dine with her at his house, where he would have the pleasure of introducing me to his wife. I have always liked theatrical effects; and my meeting with the Countess should prove to be a quite interesting one. His invitation was most courteous, and I saw that the young lady was delighted when, after he left, I praised him. She said that he was in possession of all the documents necessary to obtain from the house of Persico[7] her family's entire inheritance, amounting to forty thousand scudi, one quarter of which belonged to her, not counting her mother's dowry, which she would make over to her daughters, so that she would bring the man she would marry a dowry of fifteen thousand ducati correnti, as would her sister.

The young lady was trying to make me fall in love with her and to ensure my constancy by being chary of her favors, for when I tried to gain any she checked me by remonstrances to which I dared not reply; but I was about to make her change her game.

The next day I accompanied her to the Count's house, not informing her that I knew the Countess. I believed she would pretend not to know me; but not a bit of it. She gave me the warm greeting which is commonly bestowed on old acquaintances. When her husband, in some surprise, asked her where we had met she answered that we had seen each other at Mira[8] two years before. We spent the day very gaily.

Taking the young lady home in my gondola toward nightfall, I demanded some favors; but in their stead I received only reproaches which annoyed me so much that, after leaving her at her house, I went to sup with Tonina, where, the Resident coming in very late, I spent almost the entire night. So the next morning, having slept until noon, I did not give her a lesson. When I asked her to excuse me, she said that I must not put myself to any trouble. That evening she did not come to the balcony, and I was annoyed. The next morning I go out early, and no lesson; and that evening on the balcony I talk to her only of indifferent things; but in the morning a loud noise wakes me, I leave my room to see what it is, and my hostess tells me that her daughter cannot breathe. Quick, the surgeon!

I enter her room, and my heart bleeds to see her expiring. It was the beginning of July, she was in bed, covered with nothing but a sheet. She could speak to me only with her eyes. I ask her if she has palpitations, I put my hand on the place, I kiss the center, and she has not the strength to resist me. I kiss her lips, which are cold as ice, and my hand quickly moves a foot and a half lower and takes hold of what it finds. She pushed it weakly away, but with a great deal of strength in her eyes, which tell me enough to convince me that I am affronting her. At that moment the surgeon arrives, he opens her vein, and she immediately breathes. She wants to get up; I advise her to stay in bed and persuade her by saying that I will send for my dinner and eat it beside her. Her mother says that bed cannot but do her good. She puts on a corset and tells her sister to put a light coverlet over the sheet, for everyone could see her as if she were naked.

Burning with love because of what I had done, resolved to seize the moment of my good fortune if it came, I ask my hostess to send word to Signor Bragadin's kitchen to send me a dinner, and I sit down by the beautiful patient's bedside, assuring her that she would be cured if she could love.

"I am sure that I should be cured; but whom can I love when I am not sure that I am loved?"

The conversation becoming more animated, I slip my hand onto the thigh which is nearest to me and I beg her to let me stay there; instead, continuing to beg, I move upward and I arrive where I believe I am causing her a very pleasant sensation by tickling her. But she draws away, saying in a voice full of feeling that what I am about to do to her perhaps is the cause of her illness. I answer that it may be so, and from her confessing it I foresee that I shall arrive at what I desire and I feel inspired with the hope of curing her if what everyone says is true. I take care not to offend her modesty, by sparing her any indiscreet questions, and I declare myself her lover, promising to demand nothing from her except what she may see fit to bestow as food for my affection. She ate half of my dinner with a good appetite, she got up when I dressed to go out, and when I came back at two o'clock I found her sitting on my balcony.

On the balcony, where I sat down facing her, after a quarter of an hour of amorous talk she allowed my eyes to enjoy all her charms, which the starlight made even more interesting and which she let me cover with kisses. In the tumult which her overmastering passion raised in her soul, clinging to me in the closest of embraces, giving herself up to instinct, the enemy of every artifice, she made me happy with such fervor that I knew beyond doubt that she thought she was receiving more pleasure than she was giving me. I immolated the victim without steeping the altar in blood.

When her sister came to say that it was late and she was sleepy, she told her to go to bed; and as soon as we were alone we went to bed without the slightest preliminaries. We spent the whole night, I animated by love and the desire to cure her, she by gratitude and the most extraordinary degree of pleasure. Toward daybreak she went away to sleep in her room, leaving me very tired but not exhausted. The fear of making her pregnant had kept me from dying yet without ceasing to live. She slept with me for three whole weeks, and her breath never failed her and her menses came. I would have married her were it not that, toward the end of this same month, the catastrophe which will soon come out descended on me.

My reader may remember that I had reason to bear a grudge against the Abate Chiari on account of a satirical novel which Murray had given me to read and of which he was the author. A month before the time to which I have now come, I had expressed myself in terms from which it might well be believed that I would have my revenge, and the Abate was on his guard. About the same time I received an anonymous letter which said that, instead of thinking of having the Abate cudgeled, I would do better to think of myself, since the greatest of misfortunes was hanging over me. All people who write anonymous letters should be scorned, for they can only be traitors or fools; but one should never scorn the advice they give. That was my mistake.

About this same time a certain Manuzzi,[9] originally a jeweler by trade and then a spy for the State Inquisition, who was unknown to me, made my acquaintance, leading me to believe that he could get me diamonds on credit upon certain conditions which made it necessary for me to receive him where I was living. Looking at a number of books I had lying about, he paused over some manuscripts which dealt with magic. Enjoying his astonishment, I showed him those which taught the art of becoming acquainted with all the elemental spirits.[10]

The reader can well imagine that I scoffed at these books, but I had them. Five or six days later the traitor came to my house and said that a collector whom he could not name was ready to give me a thousand zecchini for my five books; but that he wanted to see them beforehand to determine if they were genuine. Since he undertook to return them to me twenty-four hours later, and I really set no value on them, I entrusted them to him. He did not fail to return them to me the next day, saying that the person had found that they were forgeries; but I learned some years later that he took them to the Secretary to the State Inquisitors, who thus learned that I was an arch-magician.

During the same fatal month Signora Memmo,[11] mother of the Signori Andrea, Bernardo, and Lorenzo, having taken it into her head that I was leading her sons toward atheism, approached the old Cavaliere Antonio Mocenigo,[12] Signor Bragadin's uncle, who bore me a grudge because he said that I had led his nephew astray by my cabala. Matters of this nature were under the jurisdiction of the Holy Office,[13] but since it was difficult to have me locked up in the prisons of the ecclesiastical Inquisition, they decided to take the matter to the State Inquisitors, who undertook to investigate my behavior. It was the very thing to ruin me.

Signor Antonio Condulmer, the red[14] State Inquisitor and my enemy because he was a friend of the Abate Chiari, seized the opportunity to cast me in the role of disturber of the public peace. An embassy secretary told me some years later that an informer, with two witnesses, had accused me of believing only in the devil. They testified that when I lost my money at cards, a time at which all true believers blasphemed God, no one heard me curse anyone but the devil. I was accused of eating meat every day, of going only to showy masses, and there were strong reasons for believing that I was a Freemason. To all this they added that I frequented foreign embassies and that since I lived with three patricians it was certain that, knowing everything that was done in the Senate, I revealed it for the large sums of money which I was seen to lose.

All these charges decided the all-powerful tribunal to treat me as an enemy of my country, a conspirator, and an arch-criminal. For two or three weeks several people in whom I could believe told me to take a journey abroad because the tribunal was looking into my affairs. No more was necessary; for the only people who can live happily in Venice are those whose existence is unknown to the formidable tribunal; but I made light of all their advice. Heeding them would have made me uneasy, and I detested uneasiness. I said that since I felt no remorse I could not be guilty, and that not being guilty I had nothing to fear. I was a fool. I reasoned like a free man. What also kept me from thinking seriously about an uncertain misfortune was the real misfortune which weighed on me day and night. I lost every day, I had debts everywhere, I had pawned all my jewels, even my portrait boxes,[15] though I had set those aside, putting them in the care of Signora Manzoni, with whom I had left all my important papers and my love letters. I saw that people were avoiding me. An old Senator told me that the tribunal knew that the young Countess Bonafede had gone insane from the drugs and love philters I had given her. She was still in the hospital and in her fits of madness she never failed to name me and heap curses on me. I must tell my reader this brief story. The young Countess, to whom I had given a few zecchini some days after my return to Venice, thought she could induce me to continue visits which could not but be profitable to her. Pestered by her letters, I had gone to see her a few more times, and I had always left her money; but except for the first time she had never found me willing to give her any proofs of love. At the end of a year she resolved upon a crime of which I could never convict her but of which I had very good reason to believe her guilty.

She wrote me a letter so couched as to persuade me to see her at such-and-such an hour on a matter of great importance. Curiosity took me there at the appointed hour. She at once fell on my neck, saying that the important matter was love. I laughed. I found her prettier than usual and cleaner. She talked of the Fortress of Sant'Andrea,[16] and she stimulated me to such effect that I was ready to satisfy her. I take off my cloak and I ask her if her father is at home; she answers that he has gone out. Needing to visit the privy I go out and, trying to return to her room, I lose my way and enter the room next to it, where I am surprised to see the Count with two villainous-looking men.

"My dear Count," I said, "your daughter the Countess just told me that you were not at home."

"I instructed her to say so myself, because I had business with these people, which I will finish some other day."

I make to leave; but he stops me; he sends away the two men and says he is delighted to see me. He tells me the story of his misfortunes. The State Inquisitors had suspended his pension, he was on the verge of being turned out into the street with his whole family and reduced to begging for charity. He was living in this house, managing by one device or another not to have paid the rent for three years; but that was all over, he was to be evicted. He said that if he only had enough to pay the first three months he would move at night and go into another house. As it is merely a matter of twenty ducati correnti, I take six zecchini from my pocket and give them to him. He embraces me, he weeps for joy, he calls his daughter, he tells her to keep me company, he takes his cloak, and he leaves.

I notice the door between the room I am in and the one I had been in with the girl, and I see that it is ajar.

"Your father," I say, "would have caught me in the act, and it is not hard to guess what he would have done with the two sbirri who were with him. The plot is obvious; it is God who saved me."

She denies it, she weeps, she falls on her knees, I do not look at her, I take my cloak, and I flee. I answered no more of her notes and I did not see her again. It was in the summer. The season, passion, hunger, and poverty addled her brains. She went mad to the point that one day at noon she went out stark naked, running about the Campo San Pietro[17] and asking whoever she met and the men who arrested her to take her to my house. This wretched story made the rounds of the city and was a great annoyance to me. The mad girl was locked up and did not recover her reason until five years later; but she only came out of the hospital to go begging for charity through the streets of Venice like all her brothers, except the eldest, whom twelve years later I found serving as a garzón[18] at Madrid in the bodyguard of His Catholic Majesty.

It was a year since the thing had happened, but it was dragged up again in the fatal month of July in this year 1755. All these black, heavy clouds gathered above my head to strike me with a thunderbolt. The tribunal ordered Messer Grande[19] to secure my person "alive or dead." This is the formula used in all the warrants for arrest issued by the redoubtable triumvirate. Its slightest order is never promulgated except on pain of death to him who infringes it.

Three or four days before the feast of St. James,[20] whose name I bear, M. M. presented me with several ells of silver lace which I was to wear on the eve of my name day. I went to see her, dressed in my fine coat, and said that I would come again the next day to ask her to lend me some money, since I was at my wits' end where to turn to find any more. She had set aside five hundred zecchini when I had sold her diamonds.

Certain that I would receive the amount on the morrow, I spent the day playing and losing, and that night I lost five hundred zecchini on my word. At daybreak, needing to calm myself, I went to the Erberia.[21] The place called the Erberia is on a quay on the Grand Canal, which crosses the city; and it is so named because it is in fact the market for herbs, fruits, and flowers.

The people who go to walk there so early say that they go for the innocent pleasure of seeing two or three hundred boats arriving with all sorts of greenstuff, fruits of all kinds, and flowers of the season, which the inhabitants of the small islands which surround the capital bring there and sell cheaply to the wholesalers, who sell them at a profit to middlemen, who sell them at a high price to retailers, who distribute them at a still higher price all over the city. But it is not true that the youth of Venice go to the Erberia before sunrise to enjoy that pleasure; it is only their pretext.

Those who go there are men and light women who have spent the night at casinos or inns or gardens, devoting themselves to the pleasures of the table or to the furies of gaming. The fashion of going to walk there proves that a nation can change its character.

The Venetians of an earlier age, as secretive in their love affairs as they were in their politics, are blotted from memory by the moderns, whose style is to make a secret of nothing. The men who go there with women want to arouse the envy of their fellows by advertising their conquests. The men who go alone try to make discoveries or to occasion jealousies; and the women go there more to be seen than to see. They are perfectly content to let everyone know that they are no prudes. Smartness is excluded by the havoc which has been wreaked upon dress. On the contrary, it seems that the women wish to display themselves as votaries of disorder, and that they want whoever sees them to draw conclusions from it. The men who escort them are expected to advertise the boredom inspired in them by a willingness too often repeated and to appear indifferent to anyone's guessing that the wrecks of an earlier smartness which their beauties flaunt are the proofs of their success. Everyone who walks there is expected to look tired out and to show every sign of needing to go to bed.

After strolling for half an hour I go to my casino, where everyone should still be in bed. I take the key from my pocket; but I did not need it. I see that the door stands open and, what is more, the lock has been broken. I go upstairs and I find all the family up and I hear my hostess lamenting. She tells me that Messer Grande with a band of sbirri had entered her house by force and turned everything upside down, saying that he was looking for a trunk full of salt, which was strictly contraband. He knew that the trunk had been brought in the evening before. She said that a trunk had in fact been unloaded from a gondola but that it belonged to Count S., who had nothing in it but his clothes. Messer Grande had seen it and had left without saying anything. He had also searched my room. She demanded reparation, and seeing that she was justified I promised to speak to Signor Bragadin about it that day; and I went to bed; but the insult which had been offered the house stuck in my gorge and I could sleep only three or four hours.

I go to Signor Bragadin's, I tell him the whole story, and I demand revenge. I forcibly put to him all the reasons my honest hostess had for insisting on a reparation proportionate to the offense, since the laws guaranteed the peace of every family whose conduct was irreproachable. After thus delivering myself to him, my two other friends being present, I saw all three of them sunk in thought. The wise old man said that he would answer me after dinner.

At dinner, during which De La Haye never said a word to me, I saw that they were all sad. I could only attribute the reason for it to their friendship for me. The intimacy between these three respectable and prominent persons and myself had always been the talk of the whole city. It was concluded that the thing could not be natural; hence it could only be the result of sorcery. They were pious in the highest degree, and there was not a greater libertine in Venice than I. Virtue, people said, could be indulgent to vice, but could not love it.

After dinner Signor Bragadin took me to his study with my two other friends, whose presence was never unwelcome. He said with the greatest calmness that instead of thinking of obtaining revenge for the insult Messer Grande had offered the house in which I lived, I should be thinking of escaping to a place of safety.

"The trunk filled with salt," he said, "is only a pretext. It was you whom they wanted and whom they thought they would find. Your angel made them miss you; run! I was a State Inquisitor for eight months,[22] and I know the kind of arrests the tribunal orders made. Doors are not broken down to seize a box of salt. It is also possible that they missed you on purpose. Believe me, my dear son—leave at once for Fusina and from there post day and night to Florence and stay there until I write you that you can come back. Have four rowers put to my gondola and go. If you have no money I will give you a hundred zecchini for the present. Prudence demands that you go."

I answer that since I know I am not guilty of anything I could not fear the tribunal and that consequently I could not follow his advice, though I saw that it was very prudent. He answers that the tribunal of the State

Inquisitors could find me guilty of crimes of which I had no knowledge. He urged me to ask my oracle whether I should follow his advice or not, and I declined, saying that I asked only when I was in doubt. As my final argument I put it to him that if I fled I should be showing a fear which would declare me guilty, for an innocent person, having no remorse, can have no fears either.

"If silence," I said, "is the soul of that great tribunal, you can never know after I leave whether I was right or wrong to go. The same prudence which, according to Your Excellency, orders me to go will also prevent me from returning. Must I then take an eternal leave of my country?"

He then tried to persuade me to sleep, at least that night, in my apartment in the palace, and I am still ashamed that I refused him the favor.

Constables cannot enter the palace of a patrician without a formal order from the tribunal; but such an order is never given.

I said that the precaution of sleeping in his palace would safeguard me only during the night and that I could be found anywhere during the day if the order was out to arrest me.

"They have the power if they want to use it," I said; "but it is not my part to be afraid."

The good old man then touched me by saying that perhaps we should not see each other again; and I begged him not to make me sad. In answer he thought for a moment, then smiled and embraced me, quoting the Stoic maxim, Fata viam inveniunt ("Destiny finds the way").[23]

I embraced him in tears, and I left. But his prediction was fulfilled. I did not see him again. He died eleven years later. I set out from the palace without the least shadow of fear in my soul, but in great distress because of my debts. I did not have the heart to go to Murano to ask M. M. for the five hundred zecchini I should have paid immediately to the man who had won them from me the evening before; I preferred to go and ask him to wait for a week. After that I went home and, after consoling my hostess as well as I could and embracing her daughter, I went to bed. It was nightfall on the 25th of July 1755.

The next morning at daybreak Messer Grande entered my room. To wake, to see him, and to hear him ask if I was Giacomo Casanova took no more than the first moment. As soon as I answered that I was the person he had named, he ordered me to give him whatever papers I had, whether written by me or by anyone else, to dress, and to go with him. I having asked him by whose authority he gave me the order, he answered that it was by the authority of the tribunal.

CHAPTER XII

Under the Leads. Earthquake.

THE WORD "tribunal" petrified my soul, leaving me only the physical ability to obey him. My desk was open; all my papers were on the table at which I wrote, I told him he could take them; he filled a bag which one of his men brought him, and he said I must also surrender certain bound manuscripts which there was reason to suppose I possessed; I showed him where they were, and then I saw it: the jeweler Manuzzi had been the infamous spy who had accused me of having these books when he had gained entrance to my house, leading me to believe that he could arrange for me to buy diamonds and, as I said, that he could get me a purchaser for the books; they were the Key of Solomon,[1] the Zecorben,[2] a Picatrix,[3] a complete treatise on the planetary hours[4] favorable to making the necessary perfumes and conjurations for conversing with demons of all classes. Those who knew that I had these books thought I was a magician, and it rather pleased me. Messer Grande also took the books I had on my night table: Ariosto, Horace, Petrarch, the Philosophe militaire[5] in manuscript, which Mathilde[6] had given me, the Portier des Chartreux, and the little book of lubricious postures by Aretino which Manuzzi had also reported, for Messer Grande asked me for it too. The spy Manuzzi looked like an honest man, a necessary quality in his trade; his son made a fortune in Poland by marrying an Opeska[7] whom he did away with, or so they say, for I know nothing about it and even do not believe it, though I do know that he was capable of it.

While Messer Grande thus made a harvest of my manuscripts, my books, and my letters, I automatically got dressed, neither rapidly nor slowly; I made my toilet, I shaved, C. D.[8] dressed my hair, I put on a shirt with a lace ruff and my fine coat, all without thinking what I was doing and without saying a word, even as Messer Grande, who never took his eyes off me, did not dare to object to my dressing as though I were going to a wedding.

When I left my room I was surprised to find thirty or forty constables in the drawing room. They had done me the honor to think so many were needed to secure my person, whereas according to the axiom ne Hercules quidem contra duos ("not even Hercules against two"),[9] only two were necessary. It is strange that in London, where everyone is brave, only one man is used to arrest another, and that in my dear country, where people are cowards, thirty are sent. The reason may be that the coward who is forced to become an assailant must be more afraid than the man assailed, and the latter for that very reason may become brave; and in fact in Venice one often sees one man defend himself against twenty sbirri and get away after giving them a beating. In Paris I helped a friend of mine escape from forty bumbailiffs, whom we put to flight.

Messer Grande ordered me into a gondola, where he sat down beside me, keeping only four men and sending the rest away. Arrived at his headquarters, he locked me into a room after offering me coffee, which I refused. I spent four hours there during all of which I slept, waking every quarter of an hour to make water—a very strange phenomenon, for I had never suffered from strangury, the heat was excessive, and I had not supped; nevertheless I filled two large chamber pots with urine. It had been my experience on other occasions that surprise caused by an act of oppression produced the effect of a strong narcotic on me, but it was only now that I learned that it is highly diuretic. I leave it to the physicians. I had a good laugh in Prague, where I published my Flight from the Leads[10] six years ago, when I learned that the fine ladies considered my account of the phenomenon a piece of swinishness which I might well have omitted. I would perhaps have omitted it in talking to a lady; but the public is not a lady, and I like to be instructive. Furthermore it is not swinishness; there is nothing dirty or foul-smelling about it despite the fact that we have it in common with swine, just as we have eating and drinking, which no one has ever dubbed swinishness.

It is likely that at the same time that my terrified mind was reduced to displaying its weakness by the collapse of its thinking faculty, my body, too, as if it were in a wine press, had to expel a good part of the fluids which, in their continual circulation, activate our power to think; and that is how a terrifying surprise can bring on sudden death and—God preserve us!—send us to Paradise, for it can drive our soul from our blood.

When the Terza[11] bell rang, the chief constable entered and said he had orders to put me "under the Leads."[12] I followed him. We got into another gondola and, after taking a long way around through small canals, we entered the Grand Canal and disembarked at the Quay of the Prisons.[13] After going up several flights of stairs we crossed a high enclosed bridge[14] which provides the communication between the prisons and the Doge's Palace over the canal called the Rio del Palazzo.[15] Beyond this bridge we walked the length of a gallery, entered a room, then another, where he presented me to a man dressed in the robe of a patrician, who, after looking at me, said:

"È quello; mettetelo in deposito." ("That is he; put him away.")

This personage was the Secretary to Their Excellencies the Inquisitors, the Circospetto[16] Domenico Cavalli, who apparently felt ashamed to speak Venetian in my presence, for he pronounced judgment on me in Tuscan. Messer Grande then turned me over to the warden of the Leads, who was there holding a bunch of keys and who, followed by two constables, made me go up two small flights of stairs, proceed through a gallery, then another separated from it by a locked door, then still another, at the end of which he used another key to open a door through which I entered a large, ugly, dirty garret, twelve yards long by two wide, badly lighted by a high dormer. I supposed this garret was my prison, but I was mistaken. The man, who was the jailer, took a thick key, he opened a heavy door lined with iron, three and a half feet high and with a round hole eight inches in diameter in the center of it, and ordered me to enter just as I was looking attentively at an iron mechanism which was fastened to the strong wall with nails and had the shape of a horseshoe; it was an inch thick and had a diameter of five inches from one of its parallel ends to the other. I was wondering what it could be when he said with a smile:

"I see, Signore, that you are trying to guess what this machine is for, and I can tell you. When Their Eminences order someone strangled, he is made to sit on a stool with his back to this collar and his head is placed so that the collar goes round half of his neck. The two ends of a skein of silk which goes round the other half of it pass through this hole leading to a winch to which they are fastened and a man turns it until the patient has rendered up his soul to Our Lord, for his confessor never leaves him—praise be to God!—until he is dead."

"It is most ingenious, and I imagine, Signore, that it is you who have the honor of turning the winch."

He did not answer. My height being five feet nine inches, I stooped low to enter; and he locked me in. Hearing him ask me through the grating what I wanted to eat, I answered that I had not yet thought about it. He went away, locking all his doors again.

Overwhelmed and bewildered, I put my elbows on the sill of the grating. It was two feet in all directions, crossed by six iron bars an inch thick which formed sixteen openings five inches square. It would have lighted my cell well enough if one of the main roof timbers, a square beam a foot and a half thick and entering the wall below the dormer, which was diagonally across from me, had not cut off what light came into the garret. Having made the round of this terrible prison, keeping my head down for it was only five and a half feet high, I found, chiefly by groping, that it formed three quarters of a square twelve feet by twelve. The quarter next to the missing one was to all intents and purposes an alcove large enough to contain a bed, but I found neither a bed nor a chair nor a table nor any kind of furniture except a bucket for the needs of nature and a board fastened to the wall, one foot wide and four feet above the floor. On it I put my beautiful floss-silk cloak, my fine coat which had started its life so badly, and my hat trimmed with Spanish point lace and a white feather. The heat was extreme. In my astonishment nature led me to the grating, the only place where I could rest leaning on my elbows; I could not see the dormer, but I saw the light which illuminated the garret and rats as big as rabbits which were walking about. These hideous animals, whose sight I loathed, came directly under my grating without showing the least sign of fear. I quickly drew the inner blind over the round hole in the center of the door, for a visit from them would have frozen my blood. Sunk in the deepest reverie, my arms still crossed on the sill, I spent eight hours there motionless, silent, and never leaving my post.

When twenty-one o'clock[17] struck, I began to feel uneasy because I saw no one appearing, not even to find out if I wanted to eat, not even to bring me a bed, a chair, or at least bread and water. I had no appetite, but I thought my jailers should not know it; never in my life had I had such a bitter taste in my mouth; yet I felt certain that before the day ended someone would appear; but when I heard twenty-four o'clock strike I succumbed to something very like madness, howling, stamping my feet, cursing, and accompanying all this useless noise which my strange situation drove me to make with loud cries. After half an hour of this exercise in fury, seeing no one come, with not the slightest sign to make me imagine that anyone could have heard my ravings, and shrouded in darkness, I closed the grating, fearing that the rats would jump into the cell. I threw myself at full length on the floor after wrapping my hair in a handkerchief. Such a pitiless desertion seemed to me unthinkable, even if I had been sentenced to death. My consideration of what I could have done to deserve treatment so cruel could continue no longer than a minute, for I found no cause for arresting me. As a great libertine, a bold talker, a man who thought of nothing but enjoying life I could not find myself guilty, but seeing that I was nevertheless treated as such, I spare my reader all that rage and indignation and despair made me say and think against the horrible despotism which was oppressing me. Yet my anger and the grief which preyed on me and the hard floor on which I lay did not keep me from falling asleep; my constitution needed sleep; and when a person is young and healthy his constitution can satisfy its need without his giving it any thought.

The midnight bell woke me. That is a terrible awakening which brings regret for the nothingness or the illusions of sleep. I could not believe that I had spent three hours insensible of any discomfort. Not changing my position but still lying as I was on my left side, I put out my right arm to get my handkerchief, which my memory assured me I had placed there. As I groped along with my hand—God! what a surprise when I find another hand as cold as ice! Terror electrified me from head to foot and every one of my hairs stood on end. Never in my life was I seized with such fear, and I had never thought I was subject to it. I certainly spent three or four minutes not only motionless but unable to think. Recovering a little, I allowed myself the relief of believing that what I had touched was only a figment of my imagination; in this conviction I again stretch out my arm to the same spot and I find the same hand, which, frozen with horror and giving a piercing shriek, I grasp and drop, drawing back my arm. I shudder; but regaining control over my mind, I decide that while I was asleep a corpse had been placed near me; for I was certain that when I lay down on the floor nothing had been there. I immediately imagine the body of some innocent wretch, perhaps one of my friends, who had been strangled and laid beside me so that when I woke I should find an example of the fate which I must expect. The thought infuriates me; for the third time I extend my arm to the hand, I grasp it, and at the same moment get up, intending to pull the corpse toward me and so ascertain the fact in all its atrocity; but as I try to raise myself on my left elbow the same cold hand which I am holding comes to life, draws away, and, to my great surprise, I instantly realize that the hand in my right hand is none other than my left, which, numbed and stiffened, had lost motion, feeling, and warmth, the effect of the soft, yielding, cozy bed on which my poor self was lying.

The incident, though comic, did not cheer me. On the contrary it gave me cause to make the darkest reflections. I realized that I was in a place where if the false seemed true, realities must seem dreams; where the understanding must lose half of its privileges; where a distorted imagination must make reason the victim either of chimerical hopes or terrible despair. I at once put myself on guard against anything of that nature; and at the age of thirty years I for the first time in my life turned for help to philosophy, all the germs of which were in my soul and which I had never before had occasion either to value or to employ. I believe that the great majority of men die without ever having thought. I continued to sit where I was until eight o'clock;[18] the half-light of the new day appeared; the sun should rise at quarter past nine; I longed to see the day begin; a presentiment which I thought infallible assured me that I should be sent home; I was burning with desires for revenge which I did not conceal from myself. I seemed to be leading the people to exterminate the government and massacre the aristocrats; everything was to be brought to dust; I was not satisfied to leave the slaughter of my oppressors to executioners, it was I myself who should massacre them. Such is man: he does not suspect that what speaks such words in him is not his reason but his greatest enemy, anger.

I waited less time than I was prepared to wait; and that went some way toward calming my fury. At half past eight the profound silence of the place, the Hell of living humanity, was broken by the squeak of the bolts in the vestibules of the corridors which had to be traversed to reach my cell. I saw the jailer in front of my grating asking me if I had had "time to think about what I wanted to eat." One is lucky when the insolence of a villain assumes the mask of raillery. I answered that I wanted a rice soup, boiled beef, a roast, bread, water, and wine. I saw that the churl was surprised not to hear the lamentations he expected. He went away; but a quarter of an hour later he came back to say that he was astonished that I did not ask for a bed and whatever I needed because, said he,

"If you flatter yourself that you have been put here only for one night, you are mistaken."

"Then bring me everything you think I shall need."

"Where am I to go for it? Here is a pencil and paper. Write it all down."

I wrote him instructions where to go to get me a bed, shirts, stockings, dressing gown, slippers, nightcaps, an armchair, a table, combs, mirrors, razors, handkerchiefs, the books which Messer Grande had taken from me, ink and pens and paper. When I read him the list, for the rascal could not read, he told me to cross out books, ink, paper, mirror, razor, for they were all forbidden under the Leads by the regulations, and he asked me for money to buy my dinner. I had three zecchini and I gave him one of them. He left the garret and I heard him set off an hour later. During the hour, as I learned afterward, he waited on seven other prisoners who were confined up there in cells at a distance from one another to prevent any communication.

Toward noon the jailer appeared, followed by five constables appointed to serve the state prisoners. He opened my cell to bring in the furniture I had ordered and my dinner. The bed was put in the alcove, my dinner was set out on a small table. My table service consisted of an ivory spoon which he had bought with my money, knife and fork being forbidden as were all metal implements.

"Order what you want to eat tomorrow," he said, "for I can only come here once a day at dawn. The most illustrious Secretary ordered me to tell you that he will send you suitable books, since those you want are forbidden."

"Thank him for his kindness in putting me in a cell by myself."

"I will give him your message, but you would do well not to make such jokes."

"I am not joking, for it is better, I think, to be alone than with the criminals who must be here."

"What, Signore? Criminals? I should resent that very much. There are only respectable people here, who, however, have to be sequestered from society for reasons which only Their Excellencies know. You have been put in a cell alone to increase your punishment, and you want me to convey your thanks for it?"

"I did not know that."

The ignoramus was right, as I had learned only too well a few days later. I discovered that a man shut up in solitude and deprived of any possibility of occupying himself, alone in an almost dark place, where he does not and cannot see anything except, once a day, the person who brings him food, and in which he cannot walk upright, is the most wretched of mortals. He longs for Hell, if he believes in it, only to have companionship. Confined there, I reached the point of longing for the company of a murderer, a maniac, a man with some stinking disease, a bear. Solitude under the Leads drives one to despair; but to know it one must have experienced it. If the prisoner is a man of letters, give him a writing desk and paper and his wretchedness will decrease by nine tenths.

After the jailer left I put the table near the hole to get a little light, and I sat down to dine by the glimmer which came from the skylight; but I could swallow only a little soup. Having had nothing to eat for forty-five hours, it is no wonder if I was ill. I spent the day in my armchair, without accesses of fury, longing for the morrow and preparing my mind to read the books which had been so graciously promised me. I passed a sleepless night to the disagreeable noise the rats made in the garret and in company with the clock of San Marco, which, when it struck the hours, seemed to be in the room with me. A kind of torture of which few of my readers will have any knowledge caused me intolerable pain: it was a million fleas romping all over my body, avid for my blood and my skin, and piercing them with a voracity of which I had no conception; the accursed insects gave me convulsions, made my muscles contract spasmodically, and poisoned my blood.

At the first light of dawn Lorenzo[19] (for such was the jailer's name) had my bed made and the place swept and dusted, and one of his sbirri brought me water to wash in. I wanted to go out into the garret, but Lorenzo told me it was not allowed. He gave me two thick books, which I refrained from opening, not being certain that I could control a first burst of indignation which they might arouse in me and which the spy would have reported. After leaving me my victuals and cutting two lemons for me, he went away.

After quickly eating my soup to eat it hot, I put one book under the light which reached the hole from the dormer, and I saw that I could easily read it. I look at the title, and I see La Cité mystique de Soeur Marie de Jésus appelée d'Agreda.[20] I had never heard of it. The second book was by a Jesuit whose name I have forgotten.[21] He instituted a new special adoration directed to the heart of Our Lord Jesus Christ. Of all the human parts of our divine mediator, it was the heart which, according to the author, should be especially adored—the strange idea of an ignorant fool, reading the first page of whose book was enough to revolt me, for I thought that the heart was an organ no worthier than the lungs. The Cité mystique interested me a little.

I read everything that the extravagance of the heated imagination of an extremely devout Spanish virgin, given to melancholy, shut up in a convent, and guided by ignorant and flattering confessors, could bring forth. All these chimerical and monstrous visions were adorned with the name of revelations; in love with the Holy Virgin and admitted to her intimate friendship, she had received a command from God himself to write the life of his divine mother; the information which she needed and which no one could have read anywhere had been supplied her by the Holy Spirit.

So she began the history of the mother of God not at her birth but at the moment of her most immaculate conception in the womb of St. Anne. This Sister María of Agreda was the Superior of a convent of Franciscan nuns[22] which she founded in her own house. After narrating in detail all that her great heroine did during the nine months before her birth, she said that at the age of three years she was sweeping her house, aided by nine hundred servants, all angels, whom God had bestowed on her, under the personal command of their own prince, Michael, who came and went between her and God and God and her on their reciprocal embassies. What is striking in this book is the certainty which is borne in upon the judicious reader that there is nothing in it which the more than fanatical author could think she had invented; invention cannot go so far; everything is told in perfect good faith; they are the visions of a sublimated cerebellum which, without a trace of pride, drunk with God, believes that it reveals nothing but what the Holy Spirit dictates to it. The book was printed with the permission of the Inquisition. I could not get over my astonishment. Far from increasing or exciting in my mind a fervor or a zeal for religion, the work tempted me to regard as fabulous all that we have in the way of mysticism and of dogma as well.

The nature of the book entails certain consequences.

A reader with a mind more susceptible to the miraculous and fonder of it than mine is in danger, when he reads it, of becoming a visionary and a maniacal scribbler like the virgin herself. The need to occupy myself with something led me to spend a week over this masterpiece of hyperexalted invention; I said nothing about it to the stupid jailer; but I could bear no more. As soon as I fell asleep I was aware of the plague with which Sister d'Agreda had infected my mind, weakened by melancholy and bad food. My extravagant dreams made me laugh when I recalled them in my waking hours, for I wanted to write them down, and if I had had writing materials I should perhaps have produced a work up there even madder than the one Signor Cavalli had sent me. From that time on I saw how mistaken they are who attribute a certain strength to the human mind; its strength is only relative, and a man who studied himself thoroughly would find nothing in him but weakness. I saw that though men do not often go mad, it is nevertheless true that the thing is easy. Our reason is like gunpowder, which, though very easy to ignite, nevertheless never catches fire unless fire is applied to it; or like a drinking glass, which never breaks unless it is broken. The Spanish woman's book is just what is needed to drive a man mad; but for the poison to take effect, he must be confined under the Leads alone and deprived of any other occupation.

In the month of November 1767, when I was traveling from Pamplona to Madrid, my driver Andrea Capello stopped for dinner in a town in Old Castille which was so gloomy and ugly that I felt curious to know its name. Oh, how I laughed when I was told that it was Agreda![23] "So it was here," I said to myself, "that the brain of that holy madwoman gave birth to her masterpiece, which, if I had never had anything to do with Signor Cavalli, I should never have known!" An old priest, who conceived the highest esteem for me as soon as I questioned him about the life of that fortunate friend of the mother of her Creator, showed me the very place where she had written, assuring me that the father, mother, and sister of the divine biographer had all been saints. He told me, and it was true, that Spain had solicited Rome for her canonization together with that of the Venerable Palafox.[24] It was perhaps this mystical city[25] which gave Father Malagrida[26] the desire to write the life of St. Anne, which the Holy Spirit also dictated to him; but the poor Jesuit had to suffer martyrdom for it—all the more reason for securing his canonization when the Society revives and recovers its ancient splendor.[27]

At the end of nine or ten days I had no more money. Lorenzo asked me where he should go for some, and I laconically answered: "Nowhere." What offended this ignorant, curious, and talkative man was my silence. The next morning he told me that the tribunal granted me fifty soldi[28] a day, which he was to disburse and of which he would render me an account each month, and that he would use what I had left over as I instructed him. I told him to bring me the Gazette de Leyde[29] twice a week and he answered that it was not allowed. Seventy-five lire a month were more than I needed, since I could no longer eat. The extreme heat and the inanition brought on by lack of food had enervated me. It was the season of the pestilential dog days; the power of the sun's rays striking on the lead plates which covered the roof of my prison kept me as it were in a sweating room; the perspiration which oozed from my epidermis streamed onto the floor to left and right of my armchair, in which I sat stark naked.

Not having once gone to stool during the two weeks I had been there, I went and I thought I should die from pains of which I had no conception. They came from internal hemorrhoids. It was there that I acquired that tormenting malady, from which I have never recovered; this keepsake, which now and again reminds me of its source, does nothing to make me cherish it. If natural philosophy does not teach us remedies to cure a number of diseases, it at least provides us with infallible means of acquiring them. However, my malady gained me compliments in Russia; it is so greatly esteemed that I did not dare to complain of it when I was there ten years later. The same thing happened to me in Constantinople, when I had a cold in the head and complained of it in the presence of a Turk; he said nothing, but he thought to himself that such a dog as I was unworthy of it.

On the same day violent chills showed me that I was attacked by fever. I stayed in bed and the next morning I said nothing about it; but on the day after, when Lorenzo found all my food still untouched, he asked me how I was.

"Perfectly well."

"No, Signore, for you do not eat. You are ill, and you will see the magnanimity of the tribunal, which will supply you with a physician, medicines, medicaments, and a surgeon, all for nothing."

Three hours later I saw him without any of his henchmen, carrying a candle, and preceding a grave personage whose imposing physiognomy informed me that he was a physician.[30] I was at the height of the fever which had been burning my blood for three days. He questioned me, and I answered that to my confessor and my physician I never spoke except without a witness. He told Lorenzo to leave. Lorenzo refused, and the learned doctor left, saying that I was in danger of death. It was what I wanted. I also felt some satisfaction in doing something which would show the pitiless tyrants who had confined me there the inhumanity of their proceedings.

Four hours later I heard the noise of bolts. The physician came in, holding a branched candlestick, and Lorenzo remained outside. I was in an extreme languor, which I found truly restful. A person who is really ill is free from the torment of boredom. I was delighted to see the villain left outside, for I could not bear him since he had explained the iron collar to me.

In a short quarter of an hour I told the learned doctor everything.

"If you want to recover your health," he said, "you must banish grief."

"Write me a prescription for that and take it to the only apothecary who can fill it. Signor Cavalli is the bad physician who gave me the Heart of Jesus and the Mystical City."

"Those two drugs may well have given you your fever and hemorrhoids; I will not abandon you."

He left after himself making me a large quantity of lemonade, which he asked me to drink frequently. I spent the night in exhaustion, dreaming of mystical extravagances.

The next morning, two hours later than usual, I saw him with Lorenzo and a surgeon who bled me. He left me a medicine which he told me to take in the evening and a bottle of broth.

"I have obtained permission," he said, "to have you moved to the garret, where it is not as hot as it is here, where the atmosphere is stifling."

"I decline the favor, for I loathe the rats, of whose existence you are not aware, and which will certainly get into my bed."

"How distressing! I told Signor Cavalli that he came very near to killing you with his books, and he said to return them to him and he would give you Boethius[31] instead. Here it is."

"He is an author who is superior to Seneca, and I thank you."

"I leave you a syringe and barley water; keep yourself amused with enemas."

He made me four visits and he pulled me through; my appetite came back. By the beginning of September I was in good health. My only real afflictions were the extreme heat, the fleas, and the boredom, for I could not always read Boethius. Lorenzo told me that I had permission to leave my cell to bathe while I was waiting for my bed to be made and the place to be swept, the only way to reduce the number of the fleas which were eating me alive. It was a respite. I took advantage of the eight or ten minutes to walk energetically; the terrified rats did not dare to show themselves. The same day on which Lorenzo allowed me this relief, he gave me an accounting of my money. He was left owing me twenty-five or thirty lire, which I was not allowed to put in my purse. I let him keep them, telling him to have masses said for me. He thanked me as fulsomely as if he himself were the priest who was to celebrate them. I did the same every month, and I never saw any receipts from a priest; it is certain that the least injustice Lorenzo could do me was to appropriate my money and say my masses himself in some tavern.

I went on in this way, persuading myself every day that I should be sent home; I never went to bed without a sort of certainty that the next day someone would come to tell me that I was free; but when, always frustrated in my hope, I began thinking that a fixed term of imprisonment might have been meted out to me, I decided that it could not end later than October 1st, the day on which the reign of the new Inquisitors[32] began. I accordingly concluded that my imprisonment would continue as long as the present Inquisitors remained in office, and that was why I had never seen the Secretary, who, if the matter had not been decided, would come to examine me, convict me of my crimes, and pronounce my sentence:[33] I thought it could not fail to be so because it was only natural—a poor argument under the Leads, where nothing is done according to nature. I imagined that the Inquisitors must have recognized their injustice in my innocence and hence were keeping me there only as a matter of form and for the sake of their reputation, but that they would certainly have to set me free when their reign ended. I even felt that I could forgive them and forget the wrong they had done me. "How," I said to myself, "could they leave me here at the disposition of their successors, to whom they could have given no sufficient grounds for condemning me?" I thought it impossible that they could condemn me and write my sentence without communicating it to me and telling me the reason for it. That the right was on my side seemed to me incontestable, and I argued accordingly; but my argument had no currency in respect to the rules of a tribunal which differs from the legal tribunals of every government on earth. When this tribunal proceeds against a delinquent, it is already sure that he is such; so what need has it to talk with him? And when it has condemned him, what need is there to give him the bad news of his sentence? His consent is not necessary; it is better, they say, to let him hope; if he is told, that will not shorten his stay in prison by one hour; the wise man tells his business to no one; and the only business of the Venetian tribunal is to judge and to sentence; the guilty person is a machine which does not need to take any part in the business in order to co-operate in it; he is a nail which, to go into a plank, needs only to be hammered.

I knew something about these practices of the colossus under whose feet I lay; but there are things on earth which no one can ever say he knows well until he has experienced them. If among my readers there is one to whom these rules appear unjust, I forgive him because, to tell the truth, they certainly appear to be so; but he should know that, once established, they become necessary, for a tribunal of this sort could not continue to exist except by virtue of them. They who keep them in force are Senators chosen from among those who are best qualified and are known as the most virtuous.[34]

On September 30th I spent the night unable to sleep; I was impatient to see the new day appear, for I felt sure that I should be set free The pitiless men who had put me there had ended their reign. But day appeared, Lorenzo came with my food, and announced nothing new. I spent five or six days in rage and despair. I believed it was possible that, for reasons which I could not guess, it had been decided to keep me there the rest of my life. This terrible idea made me laugh, for I knew that I had the power to remain there only a very short time, once I had made up my mind to gain freedom at the risk of my life. Either they would kill me or I would succeed in it.

Deliberata morte ferocior ("Become more implacable by resolving to die"),[35] at the beginning of November I formed the plan of escaping by force from a place where I was being kept by force; it became my only thought. I began looking for, inventing, studying a hundred ways to succeed in an enterprise which many might have attempted before me but in which no one had succeeded.

During these same days a strange event showed me the pitiable state of mind to which I was reduced. I was standing in the garret looking up at the dormer; I also saw the very thick beam. Lorenzo was coming out of my cell with two of his men when I saw the enormous beam not quiver but turn toward its right side and then at once resume its original position by a slow, uninterrupted movement in the opposite direction; feeling at the same time that I had lost my balance, I was convinced that it was an earthquake shock, and the astonished constables said the same; delighted by the phenomenon, I did not say a word. Four or five seconds later the movement occurred again, and I could not keep from uttering these words: "Un altra, un altra, gran

Dio, ma più forte" ("Another, another, great God, but stronger"). The constables, terrified by what they considered the impiousness of a desperate and blaspheming madman, fled in horror. Examining myself afterward, I saw that I had counted it among possible events that the Doge's Palace could collapse and at the same time I could regain my freedom: the falling palace was to deposit me safe, sound, and free on the beautiful pavement of the Piazza San Marco. It was thus that I began to go mad. The shock came from the same earthquake which flattened Lisbon about the same time.[36]

CHAPTER XIII

Various occurrences. Companions. I prepare my escape. Change of cell.

TO PREPARE my reader to understand my escape from such a place I must describe the premises to him. These prison cells, intended to hold state criminals, are actually in what is known as the garret of the Doge's Palace. The fact that its roof is covered not with tiles or bricks but with lead plates three feet square and a line[1] thick gives the name of the Leads to the prisons themselves. The only entrance to them is through the palace doors or through the prison building, by which I was brought in, crossing the Bridge of Sighs which I have already mentioned. One can go up to the prisons only by passing through the room in which the State Inquisitors meet; their secretary alone has the key to it, which the warden of the Leads has to return to him as soon as he has finished attending to the prisoners early in the morning. This is done at daybreak, because later the constables coming and going would be too much seen in a place filled with all the people who have business with the heads of the Council of Ten, who meet every day in the adjoining room known as the Bussola,[2] through which the constables must necessarily pass.

The prison cells are under the roof, and on opposite sides of the palace. Three are to the west, one of which was mine, and four are to the east. The gutter along the roof over those to the west gives onto the palace courtyard; the gutter to the east is perpendicularly above the canal called the Rio del Palazzo. On that side the cells are very light and one can stand upright in them, advantages lacking to the prison in which I was and which was called il trave.[*] The floor of my cell was directly above the ceiling of the Inquisitors' room, in which they usually assemble only at night after the daily session of the Council of Ten, of which all three of them are members.

Knowing all this as I did and having a perfect conception of the topography of the premises, the only way I could think of to escape which had any chance of succeeding was to make a hole in the floor of my prison; but I should need to have instruments, a difficult matter in a place where all outside communication was forbidden and neither visits nor corresponding with anyone were allowed. Having no money to bribe a constable, I could not count on any of them. Supposing that the jailer and the two underlings who accompanied him were obliging enough to let me strangle them, for I had no arms, another constable was stationed at the door of the locked gallery, which he opened only when one of his fellows who wanted to go out gave him the password. The one thought in my mind was to escape, and not finding the way in Boethius I stopped reading him. I thought of it constantly because I was certain that I should find it only by thinking of it. I have always believed that when a man takes it into his head to accomplish some project and pursues it to the exclusion of anything else, he must succeed in it despite all difficulties; such a man will become the Grand Vizier, he will become Pope, he will overthrow a monarchy, provided that he begins early; for the man who has reached the age which Fortune disdains no longer succeeds in any undertaking, and without her help one can hope for nothing. The thing is to count on her and at the same time to defy her reverses. But this is one of the most difficult of political calculations.

[*] The word means beam. It was the enormous beam which deprived my cell of light. (C.'s note.)

In the middle of November Lorenzo told me that Messer Grande had taken a prisoner and that Secretary Businello,[3] the new Circospetto, had ordered him to put him in the worst of all the cells, so he was going to put him with me; he assured me that when he had explained to him that I had regarded having been put by myself as a favor he had answered that I must have become wiser in the four months I had been there. The news did not trouble me nor was I displeased to learn of the change of Secretary. This Signor Pietro Businello was a worthy man whom I had known in Paris when he was there on his way to London as Resident for the Republic.

An hour after the Terza bell I heard the screech of the bolts and I saw Lorenzo followed by two constables holding a handcuffed young man who was weeping. They locked him into my "home" and went off without even a word. I was on my bed, where he could not see me. His surprise amused me. Having the luck to be five feet tall, he stood upright, looking closely at my armchair, which he thought was for his own use. He sees the Boethius on the sill of the grating. He dries his tears, opens it, and disdainfully throws it down, perhaps disgusted by seeing it was in Latin. He goes to the left side of the cell and is amazed to find clothes; he approaches the alcove; he thinks he sees a bed; he puts out his hand, he touches me, and he begs my pardon; I tell him to sit down; and our acquaintance is made.

"Who are you?" I ask him.

"I am from Vicenza, my name is Maggiorin,[4] my father is coachman to the Poggiana[5] family, he kept me in school until I was eleven, where I learned to read and write, then I went to work in a wigmaker's shop, where I learned to dress hair very well. I became valet to Count XX. Two years later his only daughter came home from the convent and, dressing her hair, I fell in love with her as she did with me. After exchanging promises of marriage we surrendered to nature, and the Countess, who is eighteen as I am, became pregnant. A very devout maid discovered our relationship and the Countess's pregnancy and told her that her conscience obliged her to reveal all to her father; but my wife was able to make her keep quiet by assuring her that within a week she would have her confessor tell him the whole story. But instead of going to confession she warned me and we resolved to leave. She took a good sum of money and some diamonds which had belonged to her late mother, and we were to set off that night for Milan; but after dinner the Count sent for me, and, handing me a letter, ordered me to leave at once to deliver it directly to the person here in Venice to whom it was addressed. He spoke so kindly and calmly that I could never have suspected what happened to me. I went to fetch my cloak and in passing I said good-by to my wife, assuring her that there was nothing to fear and that she would see me back the next day. She fainted. As soon as I arrived here I took the letter to the person, who made me wait while he wrote the answer, after receiving which I went to a tavern to eat a bite and set off at once for Vicenza. But as I left the tavern the constables seized me and took me to the guardroom; I was there until the time they brought me here. I believe, Signore, that I can consider the young Countess my wife."

"You are mistaken."

"But nature—"

"Listening to nature leads a man from one folly to another until he is imprisoned under the Leads."

"Then I am under the Leads?"

"Even as I am."

He began to weep hot tears. He was a very good-looking young man, sincere, honest, and terribly in love, and I forgave the Countess, at the same time condemning the impudence of the Count, who could have had her hair dressed by a woman. In his tears and lamentations he talked of nothing but his poor Countess; he inspired me with the greatest pity. He thought someone would come back to bring him a bed and food, but I undeceived him, and I was right. I gave him some food, but he could swallow nothing. He spent the whole day complaining of his fate but only because he could not comfort his mistress and could not imagine what would become of her. She was already more than justified in my eyes, and I was sure that if the Inquisitors had been invisibly present in my cell, hearing everything the poor youth said to me, they would not only have sent him back but have married him to his mistress despite law or custom; and they might have locked up the Count her father, who had put the straw near the fire. I gave him my pallet, for though he was clean I could not but fear the dreams of a young man in love. He understood neither the magnitude of his crime nor the Count's need to have him punished in secret to save the family honor.

The next day he was brought a pallet and such a dinner as is to be had for fifteen soldi, which the tribunal allowed him "out of charity." I told the jailer that my dinner was enough for us both and that he could use what the tribunal allowed the young man to have three masses a week said for him. He gladly undertook the commission, congratulated him on being with me, and said we could walk in the garret for half an hour. I found the walking very good for my health and for my plan of escaping, which did not come to maturity until eleven months later. At the end of the rat-infested garret I saw a quantity of old household furniture lying on the floor to left and right of two chests and in front of a great pile of notebooks. I took ten or twelve of them to read for diversion. They were all criminal cases, which I found most entertaining reading, for I was free to read what in its time must have been highly secret. I saw strange answers to suggestive interrogations regarding seductions of virgins, attentions carried too far by men employed in girls' orphanages, facts about confessors who had abused their female penitents, schoolmasters convicted of pederasty, and guardians who had cheated their wards; some of them dated back two or three centuries, the style and the customs of which gave me a few hours of pleasure. Among the household implements lying about I saw a warming pan, a kitchen boiler, a fire shovel, tongs, old candelabra, earthenware pots, and a pewter syringe. I thought that some illustrious prisoner had been granted the privilege of using these implements. I also saw a sort of perfectly straight bolt as thick as my thumb and a foot and a half long. I did not touch them. The time had not yet come to look for a use for anything.

One fine day toward the end of the month my companion was taken away. Lorenzo told me he had been sentenced to the prisons known as "the Four."[6] They are within the precincts of the prison building.[7] They belong to the State Inquisitors. The prisoners who are there enjoy the privilege of calling the jailers whenever they need to; the cells are dark; but their inhabitants are provided with an oil lamp; everything is made of marble, and there is no fear of fire. I learned long afterward that poor Maggiorin remained there for five years and was afterward sent to Cerigo[8] for ten. I do not know if he died there. He was good company for me, and I realized it when, left alone again, I relapsed into melancholy. However, the privilege of walking in the garret for half an hour every day was still allowed me. I examined everything in it. One of the big chests was filled with fine paper, pieces of cardboard, untrimmed goose quills, and balls of string; the other was nailed shut. A piece of black polished marble an inch thick, six inches long, and three wide caught my eye; I took it with no particular purpose and put it under my shirts in my cell.

A week after Maggiorin left, Lorenzo told me I was likely to have a new companion. The fellow, who was by nature nothing but a gossip, began to be annoyed because I never asked him a question. His duty was not to gossip, and, having no chance to display his discretion to me, he imagined that I never interrogated him because I supposed he knew nothing; his self-esteem was hurt, and to show me that I was wrong he began to chatter without being questioned.

He told me he believed I should often have new visitors, for the six other cells each held two people who were not of a sort to be sent to "the Four." After a long time, seeing that I did not ask him what the distinction was, he said that in "the Four" there was a hodgepodge of all sorts of people whose sentences, though they did not know them, were recorded in writing; he added that those who, like myself, were in his charge "under the Leads" were all people of the greatest distinction and guilty of crimes which inquisitive persons could not guess.

"If you knew, Signore, what sort of people they are who share your fate! You would be astonished, for it's true they tell me you are intelligent; but, begging your pardon— You know there's no use your being intelligent only to be entertained here . . . You understand me . . . fifty soldi a day is something . . . they give a citizen three lire,[9] a gentleman four, and a foreign Count eight—I ought to know, for it all goes through my hands.''

At this point he pronounced his own eulogy, made up entirely of negative qualities:

''I am neither a thief nor a traitor nor a miser nor cantankerous nor cruel like all my predecessors, and when I've drunk an extra pint I grow kinder; if my father had sent me to school I'd have learned to read and write and perhaps I'd be Messer Grande; but it's not my fault. Signor Andrea Diedo[10] thinks highly of me, and my wife, who's only twenty-four and who prepares your food every day, goes to speak with him whenever she likes and he has her shown right in even when he's in bed, a favor he doesn't do to any Senator. I promise you you'll have all the new arrivals with you, though not for long, for as soon as the Secretary has learned from their own lips what he needs to know he sends them on to their destination, either to ''the Four'' or to some fort or to the Levant or, if they're foreigners, to the frontiers of the State, for the government doesn't consider itself free to deal with the subjects of other princes unless they're in its service. The clemency of the tribunal, Signore, has no equal; and there's not another in the world which makes life so easy for its prisoners; people say it is cruel because it won't let them write or have visitors, but that's nonsense, because writing and seeing people is a waste of time; you'll tell me you have nothing to do, but we who work here can't say as much.''

Such, or very nearly such, was the first harangue with which the scoundrel honored me and which, to tell the truth, I found amusing. I saw that if the man had been a little less stupid he would have been more malicious. I decided to profit by his stupidity.

The next morning they brought my new cell-mate, who was treated the first day as Maggiorin had been. I learned that I needed a second ivory spoon, for the first day the newcomer was left with nothing to eat; it was up to me to treat him.

The man, to whom I showed myself at once, made me a deep bow. My beard, which was already four inches long, was even more imposing than my figure. Lorenzo often lent me his scissors to cut my toenails; but I was forbidden to cut my beard under threat of severe penalties. One gets used to everything.

My new companion was a man of fifty, of the same height as myself, slightly stooped, gaunt, with a big mouth and long dirty teeth; he had small hazel eyes and long red lashes, a round black wig which stank with oil, and a coat of coarse gray cloth. Despite accepting my dinner he was deliberately distant; he did not say a word to me all day and I did likewise; but he changed his tactics the next day. Early in the morning he was brought a bed which belonged to him and some linen in a bag. But for me, Maggiorin could not have changed his shirt. The jailer asked him what he wanted for dinner and for money to buy it with.

"I have no money."

"A rich man like you has no money?"

"I haven't a soldo."

"Very well. I will go at once and bring you a pound and a half of ration biscuits[11] and a jug of excellent water. Those are the regulations."

He brought them before he went away, leaving me with the scarecrow.

I hear him sigh, I feel sorry for him, and I break the silence.

"Do not sigh, Signore, you shall dine with me; but it seems to me you made a great mistake in coming here without money."

"I have some; but it's not the thing to tell these harpies."

"Most sagacious—if it didn't condemn you to bread and water! May I ask you if you know the reason for your being in prison?"

"Yes, Signore, I know it; and to show you how pitiful it is I will tell you my story in a few words.

"My name is Sgualdo Nobili.[12] I am the son of a peasant, who had me taught to write and who at his death left me his little house and the patch of ground belonging to it. My birthplace is in Friuli, a day's journey from Udine. A swift stream called the Corno, which too often damaged my little property, determined me to sell it ten years ago and settle in Venice. I was paid eight thousand lire for it in fine gold zecchini. I had been told that in the capital of this glorious Republic everyone enjoyed an honorable freedom and that an industrious man with a capital such as mine could live there very comfortably by lending against pledges. Sure of my thrift, my judgment, and my knowledge of the world, I determined to practice that trade. I rented a small house in the Cannaregio quarter, I furnished it, and, living by myself, I spent two untroubled years which made me richer by ten thousand lire, for, wanting to live well, I spent a thousand on my household expenses. I was sure that I should soon be ten times as rich. About that time I lent a Jew two zecchini on a number of handsomely bound books, among which I found Charron's Wisdom.[13] I have never been fond of reading, I had never read anything but Christian doctrine; but Charron's Wisdom showed me how fortunate one is who can read. This book, Signore, which perhaps you do not know, is excellent. When one has read it one finds that one does not have to read any others; for it contains everything that a human being needs to know; it rids him of all the prejudices with which he was infected in childhood; it delivers him from the terrors of a future life; it opens his eyes, it shows him the road to happiness, it makes him wise. Find a way to read it and disregard the fools who will tell you that it is forbidden."

From this discourse I knew my man, for I knew Charron, though I was not aware that he had been translated. But what books are not translated in Venice? Charron, a great admirer of Montaigne,[14] thought that he was outdoing his model, but he did not. He gave a methodical form to a number of things which Montaigne puts down without order and which, dropped here and there by that great man, did not seem liable to censure; but Charron, a priest and a theologian, was justly condemned. He has not been much read. The stupid Italian who translated him did not even know that the translation of the word sagesse is sapienza. Charron had the impertinence to give his book the title of Solomon's. My cell-mate continued:

"Freed by Charron from my scruples and all my old false impressions, I worked at my business to such effect that in six years I had nine thousand zecchini. You must not be surprised, for in this rich city gambling, debauchery, and idleness have everyone disorganized and needing money, and the wise profit by what the fools throw away.

"Three years ago a certain Count Seriman[15] made my acquaintance and, seeing what my thrift had made me, asked me to take five hundred zecchini from him, invest them in my business, and give him half the profits. He only asked a receipt, in which I undertook to return the amount to him on demand. At the end of the year I gave him seventy-five zecchini, which amounted to fifteen per cent, and he gave me a receipt, but he showed his dissatisfaction. He was wrong, for, having money enough, I did not use his in my transactions. The second year I did the same, out of pure generosity; but we went on to quarrel, so that he demanded the return of his money. I answered that I would deduct the hundred and fifty zecchini he had received; but that made him furious and he immediately served me with an extrajudiciary[16] demanding the return of the entire amount. A clever lawyer undertook my defense and gained me two years; three months ago I was offered a compromise, and I refused; but fearing violence I turned to the Abate Giustiniani, confidential agent of the Marchese di Montealegre,[17] the Spanish Ambassador, who rented me a small house on the Lista,[18] where one is safe from surprises. I was perfectly willing to give Count Seriman back his money, but I claimed the right to deduct the hundred zecchini I had paid in legal costs for the suit he had brought against me. My lawyer came to see me a week ago with the Count's, and I showed them the two hundred and fifty zecchini in a purse, which I was prepared to give them and not a soldo more. They left, both dissatisfied. Three days ago the Abate Giustiniani sent me word that the Ambassador had seen fit to permit the State Inquisitors to send their men to my house to serve a warrant. I did not know that it could be done. I awaited their visit courageously, after putting all my money in a safe place. I would never have believed that the Ambassador would have let them arrest me as they did. At daybreak Messer Grande came to my house, demanded three hundred and fifty zecchini, and, upon my answering that I did not have a soldo, he carried me off; and here I am."

After this narrative I made my own reflections on the infamous scoundrel who had been put in my company and on the honor he had done me to think that I was a scoundrel like himself, for otherwise he would not have told me the whole story, supposing that I was one to applaud it. In all the stupid remarks he made to me for three days on end, always quoting Charron, I saw the truth of the proverb, Guardati da colui che non ha letto che un libro solo ("Beware of the man who has read only one book"). Charron had made him an atheist, and he openly boasted of it. An hour after the Terza on the fourth day Lorenzo came and told him to accompany him downstairs to talk with the Secretary. He dressed quickly, and instead of his own shoes he put on mine without my noticing it. He went down with Lorenzo; a half hour later he came upstairs again crying and took from his shoes two purses in which he had three hundred and fifty zecchini and which, preceded by Lorenzo, he carried to the Secretary. He came up again afterward, took his cloak, and left; Lorenzo told me later that he had been released. The next morning his clothes were sent for. I have always believed that the Secretary made him confess that he had the money by threatening him with torture—which, as a threat, may still be good for something.

On the first day of the year 1756 I received my New Year's gifts. Lorenzo brought me a dressing gown lined with fox fur, a silk coverlet stuffed with cotton, and a bearskin bag to put my legs into during the cold weather, which was as extreme as the heat I had endured in August. As he gave them to me he said that, by order of the Secretary, I could have the use of six zecchini a month to buy all the books I wanted and the Gazette as well, and that it was a present from Signor Bragadin. I asked Lorenzo for a pencil and wrote on a scrap of paper: "I am grateful to the mercy of the tribunal and the virtue of Signor Bragadin."

One must have been in my situation to understand the sentiments which this bounty aroused in my soul; in the intensity of my gratitude I forgave my oppressors and I almost abandoned my plan of escaping; so pliable is man when misfortune degrades him. Lorenzo told me that Signor Bragadin had come before the three Inquisitors and had gone down on his knees and wept as he begged them for the favor of allowing me to receive this proof of his constant affection if I was still among the living; and that they had been so touched that they could not refuse him. I immediately wrote down the titles of all the books I wanted.

One fine morning as I was walking in the garret my eyes lingered over the long bolt which was there on the floor and I considered its possibilities as a weapon of attack and defense; I picked it up and took it into my cell, putting it under my coat with the piece of black marble; as soon as I was alone I found that the latter made a perfect whetstone, for, after rubbing the end of the bolt against the marble for a long time I saw that it showed a flat edge.

Interested in this strange kind of work, in which I was a novice, and to which I was inspired by the hope of possessing a tool which must be strictly forbidden up there, and further urged on by pride in managing to produce a weapon without the necessary instruments to make it with, even exasperated by the very difficulties—for I had to rub the bolt almost in darkness, working on the sill, only able to keep the stone from slipping with my left hand, and having no oil with which to wet and soften the iron on which I wanted to put a point—I used nothing but my saliva and I toiled for two weeks filing down eight triangular facets which at their apexes formed a perfect point; the facets were an inch and a half long. The result was an octagonal stiletto as well proportioned as one could have expected from a good cutler. It is impossible to imagine the pain and boredom I suffered and the patience I needed to accomplish this distasteful piece of work with not a tool except a loose piece of stone; for me it was torture of a kind quam siculi non invenere tyranni (''which even the Sicilian tyrants did not invent'').[19] I could no longer move my right arm and my shoulder seemed to be out of joint. The palm of my hand had become one great sore after the vessels broke; despite my pain I did not stop my work; I was determined to see it perfected.

Proud of my production and not yet having decided how and for what I might use it, I thought about hiding it in some place where it would escape even a search; I hit upon the idea of putting it in the stuffing of my armchair, not on top, however, where, by taking up the cushion, anyone could see the unevenness it would cause in the surface, but by turning the chair upside down; I then pushed the bolt into it all the way, so that for anyone to find it he would have to know it was there. Thus did God provide me with what I needed for an escape which was to be a wonder if not a miracle. I admit that I am proud of it; but my pride does not come from my having succeeded, for luck had a good deal to do with that; it comes from my having concluded that the thing could be done and having had the courage to undertake it.

After three or four days spent in reflecting on the use to which I should put the bolt which I had transformed into a pike as thick as a walking stick and twenty inches[20] long, whose excellent sharp point showed me that it was not necessary to turn iron into steel in order to give it one, I saw that I had only to make a hole in the floor under my bed.

I was sure that the room below could only be the one in which I had seen Signor Cavalli; I was sure that it was opened every morning; and I was sure that I could easily let myself down, once the hole was made, by using my bedclothes, of which I would make a sort of rope and fasten the upper end of it to a trestle of my bed. Once in the room I would remain concealed under the tribunal's great table, and in the morning, as soon as I saw the door opened, I would go out by it and be in a place of safety before I could be pursued. I thought it probable that Lorenzo left one of his constables in the room as a guard, and if that were the case I would have killed the man at once by plunging my pike into his throat. Everything was well thought out; but since the floor might be double or even triple the work could have taken me one or two months; I thought it would be very difficult to keep the constables from sweeping my cell for so long. If I had forbidden them to do it I should have made them suspicious, and the more so since, to rid myself of the fleas, I had insisted that they sweep every day, so that the broom itself would have revealed the hole to them; I had to be absolutely certain that this misfortune would not befall me.

In the meanwhile I forbade them to sweep, at the same time not saying why I forbade it. A week or ten days later Lorenzo asked me why; I said that it was because the dust rising from the floor went into my lungs and might bring on tubercles.

"We will sprinkle water on the floor," he said.

"Certainly not, for the dampness can cause a plethora."

But a week later he ordered his men to sweep; he had them carry the bed out of my cell and, on the excuse of getting the place thoroughly cleaned, he lit a candle. I saw that it was suspicion which prompted this performance; but I showed indifference. I then hit on the way to advance my plan. The next morning I bloodied my handkerchief by pricking my finger and I waited for Lorenzo in bed.

"I had such a fit of coughing," I said, "that a vein in my chest broke and made me throw up all the blood you see; have the physician sent to me."

The learned physician came, he ordered me bled and wrote me a prescription. I told him that Lorenzo had brought on my trouble by insisting on sweeping. He reproached him and said that a young wigmaker[21] had just died of consumption from the same cause, for, according to him, dust once inhaled was never exhaled. Lorenzo swore he thought he was rendering me a service and that he would never have any sweeping done again as long as he lived. I laughed to myself, because the physician could not have spoken to better purpose if he had been my confederate. The constables who heard his doctrine were delighted to learn it and counted it among their acts of charity that henceforth they only swept the cells of those who were surly to them.

After the physician left, Lorenzo asked me to forgive him and assured me that all his other prisoners were in good health despite his having their rooms swept every day. He called them "rooms."

"But it is an important matter," he said, "and I will explain it to them, for I regard you all as my children."

I really needed the bleeding; it ended my sleepnessness and cured me of the spasmodic contractions which terrified me.

I had gained a great point; but the time to begin working had not yet come. The cold was intense and my hands could not hold the pike without freezing. My undertaking demanded a man foresighted enough to avoid anything which could easily be foreseen and a spirit bold and intrepid enough to resign itself to chance in case anything foreseen did not occur. The man who must act thus is most unfortunate; but a sound political calculation teaches that for the sake of all it is expedient[22] to risk all.

The overlong nights of winter distressed me. I had to spend nineteen mortal hours in absolute darkness; and on foggy days, which are not uncommon in Venice, the light which came in through the window and the hole in the door was not enough for me to read my book by. Since I could not read I went back to thinking of my escape, and a mind always fixed on one idea can go mad. Having an oil lamp would have made me happy; I thought about it, and I rejoiced when I believed I had found a way to obtain one by a ruse. To make the lamp I had to have the ingredients which would compose it. I needed a vessel, linen or cotton wicks, oil, a flint and steel, matches, and punk. The vessel could be a small earthenware pot, and I had the one in which my eggs were cooked in butter. I managed to get Lucca oil bought for me on the excuse that salad dressed with ordinary oil made me ill. From my quilt I pulled out enough cotton to make some wicks. I pretended to be tormented by a bad toothache, and I told Lorenzo I needed some pumice stone; he did not know what it was, and I substituted a gun flint, saying that it would produce the same effect if it was soaked in strong vinegar for a day and then applied to my tooth, when it would relieve the pain. Lorenzo said that my vinegar was of the best and that I could put a flint in it myself, and he threw me three or four. A buckle on the belt of my breeches would serve me as a steel; all I still needed was sulphur and tinder, but I had no idea how to go about getting them. But here is the way I found by dint of thinking about it, and the way Fortune took a hand in it.

I had a sort of measles which, after drying up, had left scabs on my arm that made me itch uncomfortably; and I told Lorenzo to ask the physician for a remedy. The next morning he brought me a note, which the Secretary had read, in which the physician had written: "One day of dieting and four ounces of oil of sweet almonds, and the skin will be cured; or application of an ointment of flowers of sulphur; but this topical remedy is dangerous."

"I don't care about the danger," I said to Lorenzo; "buy some of the ointment and bring it to me tomorrow; or give me some sulphur, I have butter and I will make the ointment myself; have you any matches? Give me some."

He took out all the matches he had in his pocket and gave them to me. How easily one is comforted when one is in distress!

I spent two or three hours considering what I could substitute for the punk, the only ingredient I did not have and which I could not imagine an excuse for obtaining, when I suddenly remembered that I had ordered my tailor to line my taffeta coat with punk under the arms and cover it with oilcloth, to prevent the stain from sweat which, chiefly in summer, spoils all coats at that particular place. My coat was there before me, it was brand-new, and my heart pounded; my tailor might have forgotten my order, and I was between hope and dread. I had to take only two steps to make sure, and I did not dare. I was afraid I should not find the punk and would have to give up so dear a hope. I finally make up my mind, I approach the board on which I had put my coat, and, suddenly feeling that I am unworthy of such a grace, I go down on my knees praying God that the tailor had not forgotten my order. After this fervent prayer I unfold my coat, I unsew the oilcloth, and I find the punk. My joy was great. It was natural that I should thank God, since I had looked for the punk confiding in his goodness; and I did so with an overflowing heart.

Examining my act of thanksgiving, I did not consider that I had been a fool, as I did when I reflected on the prayer I had offered to the master of all when I went to look for the punk. I would not have done it before I was put under the Leads, nor would I do it today; but being deprived of physical freedom stupefies the faculties of the soul. One should pray to God to grant graces, not to reverse the course of nature by miracles. If the tailor had not put the punk under the arms of my coat, I ought to have been sure that I should not find it; and if he had, I ought to have been sure that I should find it. So why was I troubling the master of nature? The meaning of my first prayer could only be: "Lord, let me find the punk even if the tailor forgot it, and if he put it in do not make it disappear." Some theologian might find my prayer pious, holy, and perfectly reasonable, for he would say it was based on the power of faith; and he would be right, just as I, who am not a theologian, am right to consider it absurd. In any case I do not need to be a great theologian to consider my act of thanksgiving praiseworthy. I thanked God that the tailor's memory had not failed him, and my gratitude was justified by the principles of a sound philosophy.

No sooner was I in possession of the punk I needed than I put oil into a pot, then a wick, and I saw a lamp. What a satisfaction it was to owe the boon only to myself and to break a most cruel regulation! For me, there were no more nights. Farewell salad! I was very fond of it, but I did not regret it; I thought that oil was created only to give us light. I decided to begin breaking the floor on the first Monday in Lent, for during the license of the Carnival I feared visitors from day to day; and I was right. On Quinquagesima Sunday at noon I heard the noise of the bolts, and I saw Lorenzo followed by a very fat man whom I at once recognized as the Jew Gabriel Schalon,[23] celebrated for his ability to raise money for young men by ruinous deals; we knew each other, so we exchanged the usual greetings the occasion demanded. The company of this man was not of a sort to please me, but I had to be patient; he was locked in. He told Lorenzo to go to his house to fetch his dinner, a bed, and everything he needed; and he answered that they would talk about it the next day.

This Jew, who was brainless, ignorant, talkative, and stupid except in his trade, began by congratulating me on my having been chosen above all others to share his company. My only answer was to offer him half of my dinner, which he refused, saying that he ate only food which was pure and that he had every expectation of eating his supper at home.

"When?"

"Tonight. You remember that when I asked him for my bed he said that we would talk about it tomorrow. That obviously means I do not need it. Can you suppose that they would leave a man like me without anything to eat?"

"That is how I was treated."

"No doubt; but there is some difference between you and me; and, strictly between ourselves, the State Inquisitors made a blunder when they had me arrested and they must now be wondering how to set their mistake right."

"They may give you a pension, for you are a man to be treated with consideration."

"Your conclusion is very sound; for there is not a broker on the Exchange more useful than myself to domestic trade, and the Five Savi[24] have profited greatly by the advice I have often given them. My imprisonment is a strange mistake, which may well be a lucky one for you."

"Lucky? How?"

"A month will not pass before I will have you out of here. I know to whom I must speak and what to say."

"Then I count on you."

The idiotic scoundrel thought he amounted to something. He insisted on telling me what people were saying about me; and since he only reported what the greatest fools in the city could find to say he bored me. I took up a book, and he had the impertinence to ask me not to read. His passion was talking, and always about himself.

I did not dare to light my lamp, and, when night drew on, he made up his mind to accept some bread and Cyprus wine and my pallet, which had become the bed for all new arrivals. The next morning he was brought food from his house and a bed. I had this stone around my neck for eight or nine weeks,[25] for before sentencing him to "the Four" the Secretary had to talk with him several times to bring to light his shady deals and to make him cancel some illegal contracts he had made. He confessed to me himself that he had bought certain revenues from Signor Domenico Micheli[26] which could not belong to the buyer until after the death of the Cavaliere Antonio, his father.

"It is true," he said, "that the seller lost a hundred per cent on the transaction, but it must be considered that the buyer would have lost everything if the son had died before the father."

When I saw that my unwelcome companion was not leaving, I resolved to light my lamp; he promised secrecy, but he kept quiet only as long as he remained with me; for, though there were no consequences, Lorenzo learned of it. In short the man was a burden to me and prevented me from working at my escape.

He also prevented me from the reading which kept me amused; demanding, ignorant, superstitious, blustering, timid, sometimes giving in to tears and despair, he tried to make me join in his noisy remonstrances by showing me that his imprisonment was ruining his reputation; I assured him that, so far as his reputation went, he had nothing to fear, and he took my gibe for a compliment. He refused to admit that he was avaricious, and to convince him that he was I demonstrated to him that if the State Inquisitors gave him a hundred zecchini a day and at the same time opened the gate of the prison for him, he would not leave in order not to lose the hundred zecchini. He had to agree, and he laughed over it.

He was a Talmudist, as all Jews are today; and he tried to make me believe that he was very much attached to his religion because of its wisdom. Being the son of a rabbi, he was learned in its ceremonies; but in my subsequent study of the human race I have seen that the majority of men believe that the most essential part of religion is discipline.

The Jew was excessively fat and, never leaving his bed and sleeping by day, he soon could not sleep at night, while he heard me sleeping quite well. Once he took it into his head to wake me when I was in my deepest sleep.

"In God's name," I said, "what do you want? Why did you wake me? If you die, I'll forgive you."

"Alas, my dear friend, I cannot sleep, have pity on me and let us talk a little."

"And you call me your dear friend? Hateful man! I believe that your insomnia is a real torture, and I am sorry for you; but if ever you dare again to relieve your misery by depriving me of the greatest good Nature allows me to enjoy in the misfortune which overwhelms me, I will get out of my bed and come and strangle you."

"Forgive me, I beg you, and be sure that I will never wake you in future."

It is possible that I would not have strangled him, but it is certain that he put the temptation in my way. A man in prison who is in the arms of sweet slumber is not in prison, and the sleeping slave does not feel the chains of slavery, just as kings do not reign in sleep. Hence the prisoner must regard the man thoughtless enough to wake him as an executioner come to deprive him of his freedom and plunge him back into wretchedness; add that the prisoner who sleeps usually dreams that he is free and that the illusion replaces the reality for him. I heartily congratulated myself on not having begun my work before the man arrived. He demanded that the place be swept, the constables whose task it was made me laugh when they told him that it brought me to death's door; he insisted. I pretended to be ill from it, and the constables would not have carried out his order if I had objected; but my interests demanded that I should be obliging.

On the Wednesday in Holy Week Lorenzo told us that after the Terza the Signor Circospetto would come up to pay us the customary Easter visit, which serves both to bring peace to the souls of those who wish to receive the Holy Sacrament and for him to learn if they have any complaint concerning the jailer's performance of his duties.

"And so, Signori," he said, "if you wish to complain of me, complain; dress yourselves fully, for that is the rule."

I ordered Lorenzo to have a confessor sent to me the next day.

So I dressed up, and the Jew did likewise, at the same time taking his leave of me because he felt sure that the Circospetto would set him free as soon as he had talked with him; he said that his presentiment was of a kind which had never deceived him. I congratulated him. The Secretary arrived, the cell was opened, the Jew emerged and fell on his knees; I heard nothing but tears and cries, which continued for four or five minutes without a word from the Secretary. He came back, and Lorenzo told me to go out. With my eight-months beard and wearing a coat designed by love and intended for the heat of July on that very cold day, I was a figure fit to inspire laughter and not to arouse pity. The terrible cold made me shake like the edge of the shadow cast by the darkness which the setting sun brings on—which annoyed me only because the Secretary might think I was shaking with fear. Since I came out of the cell stooped over, my bow was already made; I drew myself up, I looked at him neither proudly nor cringingly, without speaking or moving; the Circospetto, equally motionless, remained silent too; the mute scene between us continued for two minutes. Seeing that I said nothing, he bent his head half an inch and left. I returned to my cell, undressed, and got into bed to revive my natural heat. The Jew was astonished that I had not spoken to the Secretary, whereas my silence had said much more than he had thought he was telling him with his cowardly cries. A prisoner of my sort in the presence of his judge should never open his mouth except to answer questions.

The next day a Jesuit came to confess me, and on Holy Saturday a priest from San Marco came to give me the Holy Eucharist. Since my confession appeared too laconic to the missionary priest who heard it he saw fit to remonstrate with me before he absolved me.

"Do you pray to God?" he asked.

"I pray to him from morning to night and from night to morning, even when I am eating and sleeping, for in the situation in which I am, everything that takes place in me, even my moments of agitation or impatience or folly, can only be prayer before the divine wisdom, which alone sees my heart."

The Jesuit heard my specious sermon on prayer with a slight smile and repaid it by a metaphysical discourse of a nature quite incompatible with mine. I would have refuted it completely if, wise in his profession, he had not had the skill to astonish me and reduce me to less than the size of a flea by a sort of prophecy which awed me.

"Since it was from us," he said, "that you learned the religion you profess, practice it as we practice it, and pray to God as we taught you to do, and know that you will never leave here except on the day dedicated to the saint who is your patron."

After speaking these words he gave me absolution and left. The impression they made on me was incredible; try as I would, I could not get them out of my head. I considered all the saints I found in the calendar.

The Jesuit was the spiritual director of Signor Flaminio Corner,[27] the old Senator, then a State Inquisitor. The Senator was a famous man of letters, a great politician, very devout, and the author of works all of which were pious, extraordinary, and written in Latin.[28] His reputation was spotless.

Informed that I was to leave the place on my patron saint's day by a man who might well know, I rejoiced to have learned that I had a patron saint and to understand that he was concerned for me; but since I had to pray to him, I had to know him. Who was he? The Jesuit himself could not have told me if he knew, for he would have betrayed the secret; but "Come," I said to myself, "let's see if I can guess." It could not be St. James of Compostela,[29] whose name I bore; for it was precisely on his feast day that my door had been broken down by Messer Grande. I took the calendar and, looking for the nearest saint's day, I came to St. George,[30] a saint of some renown, but of whom I had never thought. So I settled on St. Mark, whose day came on the twenty-fifth of the month, and to whose protection I, as a Venetian, could lay some claim; so I addressed my prayers to him, but in vain. His feast day went by, and I was still there. I took the other St. James,[31] the brother of Jesus Christ, who comes with St. Philip, but I was wrong again; so I settled on St. Anthony,[32] who, or so they say in Padua, performs thirteen miracles a day; but no less in vain. In this way I passed from one to another and insensibly became accustomed to hoping in vain for protection from the saints. I was convinced that the saint in whom I should trust was my pointed bolt. Nevertheless, the Jesuit's prophecy came true. I got out of there on All Saints' Day, as my reader will see, and it is certain that, if I had one, my protector must be honored on that day, for they are all included.

Two or three weeks after Easter I was delivered from the Jew; but the poor man was not sent home; he was sentenced to "the Four," where he remained for two years, and afterwards went and finished his days in Trieste.

As soon as I was alone I went to work with the greatest eagerness. I needed to hurry before the arrival of some new guest who would insist that the place be swept. I pulled out my bed, lighted my lamp, and flung myself on the floor pike in hand, after spreading out a napkin beside me to receive the bits of wood which I excavated with the point of the bolt; the thing was to break away the board by driving the iron into it; at the beginning of my labors the fragments were no bigger than a grain of wheat, but later they became good-sized pieces. The board was of larch and sixteen inches wide; I began to dig into it where it joined the next one; there was neither a nail nor an iron clamp, and my job was perfectly straightforward. After working six hours I tied my napkin up and set it aside so that I could go and empty it the next morning behind the pile of notebooks at the end of the garret. The fragments I had broken off were four or five times bigger in bulk than the hole from which I had taken them; its circumference was roughly thirty degrees of a circle, its diameter[33] about ten inches. I put my bed back in place, and in the morning when I emptied my napkin I had no reasons to fear that my fragments would be seen.

On the second day I found under the first board, which was two inches thick, a second board which I supposed was of the same size. Never having suffered the misfortune of visitors, and always tormented by fear of it, in three weeks I succeeded in breaking completely through three boards, under which I found the kind of flooring incrusted with small bits of marble which is known in Venice as terrazzo marmorin.[34] It is the usual flooring of rooms in all houses in Venice which do not belong to poor people. The great noblemen even prefer terrazzo to parquetry. I was appalled when I saw that my bolt was not biting into it; it was in vain that I bore down and pushed; my point slipped. It discouraged me completely. Then I remembered Hannibal, who, according to Livy,[35] had opened a passage through the Alps by chopping away the rock which he had softened through the action of vinegar—a thing I had considered incredible, not so much because of the power of the acid but because of the prodigious quantity of vinegar he must have had. I thought Hannibal had succeeded in it not aceto ("by vinegar") but asceta, which in the Latin of Padua might be the same as ascia[36] ("ax"), and that the error might stem from the copyists. Nevertheless I poured into my excavation a bottle of strong vinegar which I had; and the next morning, whether as the result of the vinegar or of greater patience, I saw that I should succeed, for it was not a matter of breaking the small pieces of marble but of pulverizing the cement between them with the point of my implement; and I was greatly relieved when I found that the great difficulty occurred only at the surface; in four days I destroyed the entire piece of paving without damaging the point of my pike. Its facets shone even more brightly.

Under the marmorin flooring I found another board, as I expected; it must be the last, that is, the first counting up in the roofing of any room whose beams support its ceiling. I began my work on this board with somewhat greater difficulty because my hole had become ten inches deep. I constantly commended myself to the mercy of God. Those freethinkers who say that prayer is of no use do not know what they are talking about. I know that after praying to God I always felt stronger; and that is enough to prove its usefulness, whether the increase in strength comes directly from God or is a physical result of one's confidence in him.

On June 25th, the day on which only the Republic of Venice celebrates the prodigy of the Evangelist St. Mark's appearing in the emblematic form of a winged lion in the ducal church toward the end of the eleventh century, an event which showed the Senate in its wisdom that it was time to dismiss St. Theodore,[37] whose credit was no longer powerful enough to aid it in its plans of aggrandizement, and to take for its patron the sainted disciple of St. Paul (or, according to Eusebius,[38] St. Peter) whom God now sent it—at three hours past noon on that day, when, stark naked, running with sweat, and lying flat on my stomach, I was working at the hole, in which, in order to see, I had set my lighted lamp, I was mortally terrified to hear the shrill grating of the bolt in the door to the first corridor. What a moment! I blow out my lamp, I leave my pike in the hole, throw my napkin into it, I rise, I hastily put the trestles and the boards of my bed in the alcove, I throw the pallet and the mattresses on top of it; and not having time to put on the sheets, I fall on it as if dead just as Lorenzo is opening my cell. One minute earlier, and he would have caught me in the act. Lorenzo would have stepped on me if a cry I gave had not made him crouch back into the doorway, saying emphatically:

"My God, I pity you, Signore, for it is as hot here as in an oven. Get up and thank God, who sends you excellent company. Come in, come in, Illustrissimo Signore," he said to the unfortunate who was following him. The churl pays no attention to my nakedness, and the Illustrissimo enters, making his way around me, while, not knowing what I was doing, I gather up my bedclothes, throw them on the bed, and can nowhere find the shirt which decency demands that I put on. The newcomer thought he was entering Hell. He exclaimed:

"Where am I? Where are they putting me? What heat! What a stench! With whom am I?"

At that Lorenzo called him out, asking me to put on a shirt and come into the garret; he told him that he had orders to bring him a bed from his house and everything he asked for, and that until his return he could walk in the garret and that meanwhile the cell would be purged of the stench, which was only the smell of oil. What a surprise for me to hear him say that the stench was only oil! As a matter of fact it came from the lamp, which I had extinguished without snuffing it. Lorenzo did not ask me a single question about it; so he knew everything; the Jew had told him. How lucky I was that he could not have told him more! At that moment I began to feel somewhat kindly toward Lorenzo.

After quickly putting on a fresh shirt and a dressing gown, I came out. The new prisoner was writing in pencil a list of what he wanted. He was the first to speak when he saw me:

"It's Casanova!"

I at once recognized the Abate Count Fenaroli,[39] of Brescia, a man of fifty years, amiable, rich, and a favorite in the choicest society. He came and embraced me, and when I said I would have expected to see anyone else on earth up there except himself, he could not hold back his tears, which provoked mine.

As soon as we were alone I said to him that when his bed arrived I would offer him the alcove but that he should do me the favor of refusing it and that he should not ask for the cell to be swept, adding that I would tell him the reasons when there was more time. I explained the reason for the stench of oil, and after assuring me that he would keep everything secret he said that he considered himself fortunate to have been put with me. He said that no one knew what my crime was, so everyone was trying to guess it. Some said I was the head of a new religion; others said Signora Memmo had convinced the tribunal that I was teaching her sons atheism. Still others said that Signor Antonio Condulmer, one of the State Inquisitors, had had me imprisoned as a disturber of the public peace because I hissed the Abate Chiari's comedies and was planning to go to Padua on purpose to kill him.

All these accusations had some basis which gave them an air of probability, but they were all fabrications. I did not care enough about religion to be interested in founding a new one. Signora Memmo's three sons, all of them highly intelligent, were more the sort to lead others astray than to be led astray themselves, and Signor Condulmer would have been kept too busy if he had tried to lock up everyone who hissed the Abate Chiari. As for the Abate, who had been a Jesuit, I had forgiven him. The celebrated Father Origo,[40] likewise a Jesuit, had taught me how to avenge myself on him by speaking well of him at large gatherings. My praises provoked my hearers to satires, and I was avenged without any trouble to myself.

Toward evening a bed was brought, together with an armchair, linen, scented waters, a good dinner, and good wines. The Abate could eat nothing; but I did not imitate him. His bed was set up without moving mine and we were locked in.

I began by taking from the hole my lamp and my napkin, which, having fallen into the lamp, had become soaked with oil. I laughed heartily. An accident which has no consequences and which is occasioned by causes which could have tragic ones is a good reason for laughter. I put everything in order; and I lit my lamp, the story of which made the Abate laugh. We spent a sleepless night, not so much because of the million fleas which were devouring us as because our talk was so interesting that we could not bring ourselves to end it. Here is the story of his arrest, as he himself told it to me:

"Yesterday at twenty o'clock[41] a party consisting of Signora Alessandri,[42] Count Paolo Martinengo,[43] and myself boarded a gondola; we reached Fusina at twenty-one and Padua at twenty-four, intending to see the opera and return here immediately afterward. During the second act my evil genius sent me to the gaming room, where I saw Count Rosenberg, the Ambassador from Vienna, with his mask off, and ten paces from him Signora Ruzzini,[44] whose husband is about to leave for the same court as Ambassador of the Republic. I bowed to them both and I was going to leave when the Ambassador said to me loudly: 'You are very fortunate to be able to pay your court to so charming a lady; it is only at moments like this that the part I play in the most beautiful country in the world becomes my torment. Tell her, I beg you, that the laws which prevent me from speaking to her here have no power in Vienna, where I shall see her next year and where I shall make war on her.' Signora Ruzzini, who saw that we were speaking of her, asked me what the Count had said and I repeated it to her word for word. 'Answer him,' she said, 'that I accept his declaration of war and that we shall see which of us two is the better warrior.' I did not think I was committing a crime by repeating her answer, which was merely a compliment. After the opera we ate a fowl and we were back here at fourteen o'clock. I was going to bed to sleep until twenty, when a fante brought me a note which ordered me to be at the Bussola at nineteen o'clock to hear what the Circospetto Businello, Secretary to the Council of Ten, had to say to me. Astonished by the order, which is always an ill omen, and much troubled that I had to obey it, at the appointed hour I appeared before the minister, who, without saying even a word to me, ordered me put here."

Nothing was more innocent than his offense; but there are laws in the world which one can break innocently and the transgressors of which are no less guilty for that. I congratulated him on knowing what his crime was, on his crime itself, and on the manner of his arrest, and since his offense was a very slight one I told him that he would remain with me only a week and then be ordered to go and live on his estate in Brescia for six months. He answered sincerely that he did not believe he would be left there a week—a perfect example of the man who, feeling no guilt, cannot conceive that he will be punished. I let him keep his illusion; but what I told him proved to be the case.[45] I made up my mind to be a good companion to him in order to give him as much comfort as I could in the great distress his imprisonment caused him. I sympathized in his misfortune to such a point that I entirely forgot my own during all the time he was with me.

The next morning at daybreak Lorenzo brought coffee and a big basket containing dinner for the Count-Abate, who did not understand how anyone could suppose a man would want to eat at such an hour. We were allowed to walk for an hour and then were locked in. The fleas which tormented us made him ask me why I did not have the place swept. I could not bear to have him either think me a swine or believe that my skin was thicker than his; I told him, and even showed him, everything. I saw that he was surprised, and indeed mortified because he had in a sense forced me to entrust him with so weighty a secret. He encouraged me to work and to finish the hole that day if possible, so that he could himself let me down and afterward pull up my rope; for his part, he did not wish to make his crime more serious by flight. I showed him the model of a device by which I was sure that when I had got down I could pull the sheet I had used as a rope down after me; it was a bit of stick fastened at one end to a long string. My sheet was to be secured to the trestle of my bed only by this stick, which would go into the two halves of a loop in the rope under the trestle; the string which operated the stick was to go to the floor of the Inquisitors' room, where, as soon as I found myself on my feet, I would pull on it. He had no doubt of its working, and he congratulated me on it, the more so since the precaution was absolutely necessary, since if the sheet had stayed there it would be the first thing to catch the eyes of Lorenzo, who could not come up to where we were except by passing through that room; he would look for me at once, find me, and arrest me. My noble companion was convinced that I should give up my work, since there was great danger of my being caught at it and the more so as it would take me several more days to finish the hole, which was to cost Lorenzo his life. But could the thought of purchasing freedom at the price of his life lessen my eagerness to obtain my freedom? I should have done what I did if the consequence of my escape would have been the death of all the constables in the Republic and even of the State itself. Love of country becomes nothing but a phantasm in the mind of the man whom his country is oppressing.

But my good humor did not prevent my dear companion from succumbing to moments of melancholy. He was in love with Signora Alessandri, who had been a singer and who was the mistress or the wife of his friend Martinengo, and he must have had her favors; but the more a lover is in favor, the more miserable he becomes if he is torn from the arms of the woman he loves. He sighed, tears flowed from his eyes, and he admitted that he loved a woman who combined all the virtues. I sincerely condoled with him, taking care not to comfort him by saying that love is only a trifle, a distressing sort of consolation which only fools offer to lovers; it is not even true that love is nothing but a trifle.

The week which I had predicted passed very quickly; I lost his precious companionship; but I did not give myself time to regret it. I took good care never to ask this honorable man to keep my secret; the least doubt on my part would have been an insult to his noble soul.

On July 3rd Lorenzo told him to be ready to leave at the Terza, which during that month rings at twelve o'clock. For this reason he did not bring him his dinner. During the whole week the only nourishment he took was soup, fruits, and Canary wine.[46] It was I who ate well, to the great satisfaction of my friend, who admired my cheerful temperament. We spent the last three hours vowing the tenderest friendship. Lorenzo appeared, went down with him, and reappeared a quarter of an hour later to take away all of this most amiable man's possessions.

On the next day Lorenzo gave me an accounting of his expenditures during the month of June, and I saw that he was touched when, finding that I had a balance of four zecchini, I told him that I made his wife a present of them. I did not tell him that it was the recompense for my lamp; but he may have thought so.

Devoting myself entirely to my work, I saw it reach perfection on August 23rd. The delay was caused by a very natural mishap. When, digging into the last board, always with the greatest care to make it only extremely thin, I got very close to its opposite surface, I put my eye to a small hole through which I ought to see the Inquisitors' room, as in fact I did see it; but at the same time I saw, at a very short distance from the same hole, which was no bigger than a fly, a perpendicular surface about eight inches across. This was what I had always feared: it was one of the beams supporting the ceiling. I saw that I should have to make the hole bigger in the direction away from the beam; for the latter made the space so narrow that my rather portly person could never have got through it. I had to enlarge the opening by a fourth, still always fearing that the space between the two beams would not be enough. After the enlargement a second little hole of the same size showed me that God had blessed my work. I stopped up the little holes, both to prevent the small fragments from dropping into the room and to make it impossible for a ray from my lamp to pass through and so reveal my operation to anyone who might have seen it.

I set the night before St. Augustine's Day[47] as the time for my escape, because I knew that the Great Council met on that feast and hence there would be no one in the Bussola, which was next door to the room through which I must necessarily pass on my way out. I therefore decided to leave on the night of the 27th.

At noon on the 25th something happened to me which makes me tremble even now as I record it. At noon precisely, I heard the screech of the bolts; I thought I should die. A violent palpitation of my heart, which was beating three or four inches below its proper place, made me fear that my last hour had come. I dropped into my armchair in panic. Coming into the garret, Lorenzo put his head to the grating and said in joyous tones:

"I congratulate you, Signore, on the good news I bring you."

Instantly supposing that he meant my freedom, for I knew of no other news which could be good, I saw that I was lost. The discovery of the hole would have led to my pardon being revoked.

Lorenzo enters and tells me to come with him.

"Wait till I get dressed."

"It doesn't matter, for you are only going from this vile cell to another which is light and brand-new, where you will see half of Venice from two windows, where you can stand upright, where—"

But I could bear no more, I felt that I was dying.

"Give me some vinegar," I said. "Go and tell the Signor Secretary that I thank the tribunal for this kindness and that I beg him in God's name to leave me here."

"You make me laugh. Have you gone mad? You are to be taken out of Hell and put in Paradise, and you refuse? Come, come, you must obey; stand up. I will give you my arm and I will have your clothes and your books brought you."

Astonished and in no position to say another word, I rose, I left the cell, and I instantly felt a slight relief when I heard him order one of his men to follow him with my armchair. As always, my pike was hidden in its stuffing, and that was at least something. I wished I were also being followed by the fine hole I had made with such effort, and which I had to abandon; but it was impossible. My body moved on; but my soul remained behind.

Supporting myself on Lorenzo's shoulder, while the fellow supposed he was giving me courage with his jokes, I passed through two narrow corridors and, after going down three steps, entered a large and very light room, at the far left-hand corner of which I went through a small door into a corridor which was two feet wide and twelve long and had two grated windows to my right, through which I clearly saw the upper part of the whole section of the great city which lay on that side, as far as the Lido. But I was in no state to be consoled by a fine view.

The door of the cell was in the corner of this corridor; I saw a grated window which was opposite one of the two which lighted the corridor, so that the prisoner, though shut in, could enjoy much of the pleasant prospect. Most important of all, since the window was open, it let in a gentle, cool wind which tempered the unbearable heat and which was veritably balm to the poor creature who had to breathe in the cell, especially during this season.

I did not make these observations at the time, as the reader can well imagine. As soon as Lorenzo saw me in the cell, he had my armchair brought, and I instantly flung myself into it; then he left, saying that he would have my bed and all my belongings fetched at once. The stoicism of Zeno,[48] the ataraxia of the Pyrrhonists,[49] present our judgment with most extraordinary images. They are praised, they are derided, they are admired, they are laughed at, and the wise admit their possibility only with restrictions. Any man who is called upon to judge of a moral possibility or impossibility has every reason to start only from himself, for if he is honest he cannot admit an inner power in anyone unless he feels the seed of it in himself. What I find in myself on this subject is that, through a power gained by great application, a man can succeed in keeping from crying out in his sufferings and can resist being swept away by his first impulses. That is all. Abstine (''abstain'') and sustine[50] (''bear'') are the tokens of a good philosopher, but the material sufferings which afflict the Stoic will not be less than those which torment the Epicurean, and grief will be more painful for him who conceals it than for him who obtains a real relief by complaining.

The man who tries to seem indifferent to an event which determines his condition only appears to be so, unless he is an idiot or in a frenzy. He who boasts of perfect tranquillity lies, and I beg Socrates' pardon a thousand times. I will believe in Zeno completely if he will tell me that he has found the secret of preventing nature from turning pale, blushing, laughing, and crying.

I sat in my armchair like a man in a stupor; motionless as a statue, I saw that I had wasted all the efforts I had made, and I could not repent of them. I felt that I had nothing to hope for, and the only relief left to me was not to think of the future.

My thoughts rising up to God, the state in which I was seemed to me a punishment visited on me directly by him because, though he had left me time to finish my whole task, I had abused his mercy by putting off my escape for three days. It was true that I could have gone down three days earlier, but I did not think I deserved so severe a punishment for having delayed in consequence of the most prudent consideration possible, or for exercising a caution enforced on me by a forethought which, on the contrary, deserved to be rewarded, since if I had obeyed only my natural impatience I would have defied every danger.

To fly in the face of the reasoning which had made me put off my escape until August 27th, I should have had to receive a revelation; and reading Maria de Agreda had not turned me into an idiot.

CHAPTER XIV

Underground prisons called "the Wells." Lorenzo's revenge. I enter into a correspondence with another prisoner, Father Balbi; his character. I plan my escape with him. The method. My stratagem for sending him my pike. Success. I am given an infamous companion; portrait of him.

A MINUTE later two sbirri brought me my bed and left, only to return at once with all my clothes; but two hours passed during which I saw no one, though the doors to my cell were open. The delay caused me much thought but I could reach no conclusion. Having everything to fear, I tried to attain a state of tranquillity such that I could resist whatever tribulation might come.

Besides "the Leads" and "the Four," the State Inquisitors had nineteen other terrible prison cells underground in the Doge's Palace; to these they sentenced criminals who had deserved death. All the highest judges on earth have always believed that by sparing the life of him who has deserved death they have shown him mercy, no matter how horrible a punishment they mete out to him instead. In my opinion it can only be mercy if it seems so to the criminal; but they do it without consulting him. It becomes injustice.

These nineteen underground prisons have every resemblance to tombs but they are called "wells"[1] because they are always flooded by two feet of sea water, which comes in through the same grated hole by which they receive a little light; these holes are only a square foot in size. The prisoner, unless he enjoys being in a salt bath up to his knees all day, has to sit on a platform where he also has his pallet and on which at dawn a jailer puts his water, his soup, and his ration biscuit, which he has to eat at once, for if he delays enormous sea rats would tear it from his hands. In this horrible prison, to which the prisoners are usually condemned for the remainder of their days, and with such food, a number of them live to extreme old age. A criminal who died about that time had been sent there at the age of forty-four. Convinced that he had deserved death, he may have thought his prison a merciful reprieve. There are those who fear nothing but death. The man's name was Beguelin;[2] he was French. He had served with the rank of captain in the troops of the Republic during her last war with the Turks in the year 1716, and in Corfu under Field Marshal Count Schulenburg,[3] who forced the Grand Vizier to raise the siege. Beguelin served the Marshal as a spy, disguising himself as a Turk and boldly entering the enemy army; but at the same time he was spying for the Grand Vizier. Found guilty of his double espionage, he deserved death, and it was certain that the judges who sent him to die in "the Wells" showed him mercy; and the fact is that he lived for thirty-seven years. He can only have been bored and always hungry. He may have said: Dum vita superest bene est ("So long as life remains, it is well").[4] But the prisons I saw at Spielberg[5] in Moravia, to which clemency consigned prisoners sentenced to death and which the criminal never managed to survive for a year, are such that the death they bring siculi non invenere tyranni ("even Sicilian tyrants did not invent").[6]

During the two hours I waited I did not fail to imagine that I was perhaps to be taken to "the Wells." In a place where the poor wretch who is condemned to it feeds on chimerical hopes he must also feel unreasonable panic terrors. The tribunal, master of the garrets and the cellars of the great palace, might well have decreed Hell for anyone who had tried to run away from Purgatory.

I finally heard furious steps approaching. I saw Lorenzo, his face distorted by anger. Frothing with rage, blaspheming God and all the saints, he began by ordering me to give him the ax and the tools I had used to make a hole in the floor and to tell him which of his sbirri had brought them to me. Not stirring even a finger, I replied that I did not know what he was talking about. He orders me searched. But at that I quickly get up, I threaten the scoundrels, and, stripping naked, I told them to do their duty. He had my mattresses searched and my pallet emptied, he even made his men search the stinking chamber pot. He picked up the cushion of my armchair, and finding nothing hard in it, he threw it angrily on the floor.

"You refuse," he said, "to tell me where the tools with which you made the hole are, but someone will make you talk."

"If it is true that I made a hole in the floor, I will say that I received the tools from you and have given them back to you."

At this answer, which his men, whom he seemed to have angered, received with approbation, he shouted, he banged his head against the wall, he stamped his feet; I thought he was going mad. He went out, and his men brought my clothes, my books, my bottles, and everything except my lamp and my stone. That done, before leaving the corridor he closed the two windows through which I got a little air. I was now shut up in a small space with no opening by which the air could enter. I confess that after he left I thought I had got off cheaply. Despite his training in his trade he did not think of turning my armchair upside down. Finding that I was still in possession of my bolt, I adored Providence and I saw that I could still count on making it the means of my escape.

The intense heat and the shock of the day's events kept me from sleeping. Early the next morning he brought me wine which had turned to vinegar, stinking water, rotting salad, spoiled meat, and very hard bread; he did not have the place swept, and when I asked him to open the windows he did not even answer. An extraordinary ceremony which was begun that day consisted in a constable making the round of my cell carrying an iron bar with which he pounded the entire floor and the walls and especially under the bed. I noticed that the constable who was doing the pounding never struck the ceiling. This observation gave me the idea that I could get out by way of the roof; but to succeed in such a project demanded a combination of circumstances which did not depend upon me; for I could do nothing which was not visible. The cell was brand-new; the least scratch would have been instantly seen by all the constables when they came in.

I spent a terrible day. The intense heat began toward noon. I really believed I should be stifled. I was in nothing short of a sweating room. I could neither eat nor drink, for everything was spoiled. The weakness caused by the heat and by the sweat which came out in great drops all over my body made it impossible for me either to walk or to read. My dinner the next day was the same; the stench of the veal he brought me reached my nose at once. I asked him if he had been ordered to kill me off by hunger and heat, and he went away without answering. He did the same thing the next day. I told him to give me a pencil because I wanted to write something to the Secretary, and again he did not answer and left. I ate the soup out of spite and dipped some bread in Cyprus wine to preserve my strength and kill him the next day by plunging my pike into his throat; things had become so bad that I thought I had no other course; but the next day instead of carrying out my plan I satisfied myself with swearing to him that I would kill him when I was set free; he laughed, and left without answering. I began to believe he was acting as he did by order of the Secretary, to whom he had perhaps reported the hole. I did not know what to do; my patience struggled against despair; I felt that I was dying of inanition.

It was on the eighth day that, in the presence of his constables, I demanded in a voice of thunder that he give me an accounting of my money, calling him an infamous hangman. He answered that I should have it the next day; but before he locked my cell I grabbed up the bucket of filth and showed him by my posture that I meant to throw it into the corridor; at that he told a constable to take it and, the air having become foul, he opened a window; but after the constable gave me a clean bucket he shut the window again and left, paying no attention to my outcries. Such was my situation; but seeing that what I had obtained had been the result of the insults to which I had treated him, I prepared to talk to him even more roughly the next day.

The next day my rage cooled. Before giving me my account he presented me with a basket of lemons which Signor Bragadin had sent me and I saw a large bottle of water which I thought was fit to drink and in my dinner a chicken which looked promising; moreover, a constable opened the two windows. When he handed me my account I merely glanced at the total and told him to give the balance to his wife, except for a zecchino which I ordered him to distribute among his men, who were there and who thanked me. Left alone with me, he proceeded to deliver the following discourse calmly enough:

"You have already told me, Signore, that it was from me you obtained what you needed to make the enormous hole you made in the other cell, so I am no longer in doubt about it. But would you be so good as to tell me who gave you what you needed to make the lamp?"

"You did."

"What, again? I did not believe that intelligence consisted in audacity."

"I am not lying. It is you, and with your own hands, who gave me everything I needed: oil, gun flint, and matches—all the rest I had."

"You are right. Can you as easily convince me that I also gave you what you needed to make the hole?"

"Yes, just as easily. I received nothing except from you."

"God have mercy on me! What are you saying? Please tell me how I gave you an ax?"

"I will tell you everything if you like, but in the Secretary's presence."

"I do not wish to hear more, and I believe you. Say nothing, and remember that I am a poor man and have children."

He went away, holding his head in his hands.

I was very glad I had found the way to instill fear into the rascal, for whom it was decreed that I should cost him his life. I now realized that his own interest forbade his telling the minister anything that I had done.

I had ordered Lorenzo to buy me the complete works of the Marchese Maffei;[7] he did not want to spend the money, and he did not dare tell me so. He asked me what I could need with books when I had so many.

"I have read them all and I need new ones."

"I will arrange to have someone who is here lend you books if you will lend him yours, and so you will save your money."

"They are novels, which I do not like."

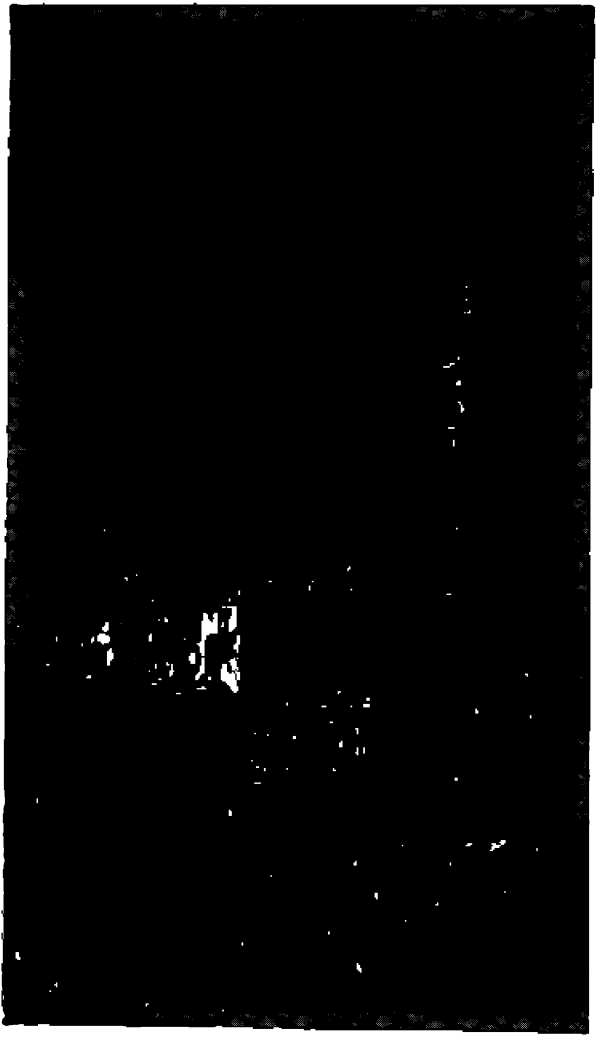
"They are learned books; and if you think you are the only one with brains here, you are wrong."

"Very well. We shall see. Here is a book I will lend to the man with brains. Bring me one too."

I gave him Pétau's Rationarium[8] and four minutes later he brought me the first volume of Wolff.[9] Pleased, I canceled my order to buy me Maffei; and even more pleased that he had made me listen to reason on such an important subject, he left.

Less tempted by the prospect of reading the learned work than by seizing the opportunity to begin a correspondence with someone who could perhaps help me in the plan for escaping which I had already sketched out in my mind, upon opening the book I found a piece of paper on which I read, in six well-turned verses, a paraphrase of Seneca's saying: Calamitosus est animus futuri anxius ("It is misery for the mind to be anxious about the future").[10] I immediately made six more verses. I had let the nail of the little finger of my right hand grow in order to clean my ears with it, I cut it to a point and made a pen of it, in place of ink I used the juice of black mulberries, and I wrote my six verses on the same piece of paper. In addition I wrote a list of the books I had, and I put it behind the spine of the same book. All books bound in boards in Italy have a sort of pocket under the binding at the back. On the spine of the same book, where the title is put, I wrote latet[11] ("something is hidden"). Impatient to receive an answer, the next morning I at once told Lorenzo that I had read the book through and that the person would do me a favor if he would send me another. He immediately brought me the second volume.

A loose note between the pages of the book ran as follows: "We who are together in this prison are both greatly pleased that the ignorance of a miser procures us an unparalleled privilege. I who write am Marin Balbi,[12] a Venetian nobleman and a monk of the Somaschian Order. My companion is Count Andrea Asquin,[13] of Udine, the capital of Friuli. He commands



The Rio Side of the Doge's Palace, Venice me to tell you that you are at liberty to make use of all his books, a catalogue of which you will find in the hollow of the binding. We must, Signore, employ every precaution to keep our little correspondence from Lorenzo."

That we had both hit upon the idea of sending each other catalogues and the idea of concealing a written message in the aperture at the back of the book did not surprise me, for it seemed to me to require nothing but common sense; but I thought his warning to exercise caution very strange when the letter which told all was a loose sheet. Lorenzo not only might open the book, it was his duty to do so, and, seeing the letter and unable to read, he would have put it in his pocket to get it read to him in Italian by the first priest he came upon in the street, and everything would have been discovered at its very beginning. I at once decided that this Father Balbi must be a blockhead.

I read the catalogue and on the other half of the sheet I wrote them who I was, how I had been arrested, my ignorance of my crime, and my hope that I would soon be sent home. On receiving another book, Father Balbi wrote me a letter which covered sixteen pages. Count Asquin never wrote to me. The monk entertained himself by writing me the whole story of his misfortunes. He had been under the Leads for four years[14] because, having had three bastards by three indigent girls, all of them virgins, he had had them baptized under his own name. His Father Superior[15] had admonished him the first time, threatened him the second, and the third time had lodged a complaint with the tribunal, which had imprisoned him; and the Father Superior sent him his dinner every day. His defense took up half of his letter, in which he amply displayed the poverty of his intelligence. Both his Superior, he said, and the tribunal were nothing short of tyrants, for they had no jurisdiction over his conscience. He said that, since he was sure that the bastards were his, he could not deprive them of the advantages they could derive from his name; and that their mothers were respectable though poor, for before him they had had commerce with no man. He ended by saying that his conscience obliged him to recognize publicly that the children these honest young women had given him were his, thus forestalling the slander that they were the children of others, and that in any case he could not deny nature or the fatherly love which he felt for the poor innocents. "There is no danger," he said, "that my Superior will fall into the same fault, since his pious affection is shown only to his boy pupils."

I needed no more to know my man: eccentric, sensual, a poor reasoner, malicious, imprudent, and ungrateful. After saying in his letter that he would be very unfortunate without the company of Count Asquin, who was seventy years of age and had books and money, he used up two pages abusing him to me and describing his faults and absurdities. Out of prison I would not have answered a man of his character; but up there I had to make use of everything. In the back of the book I found pencil, pens, and paper, which made it possible for me to write at my ease.

All the rest of his long letter contained the histories of all the prisoners who were under the Leads and who had been there during the four years he had spent there himself. He told me that Niccolò was the constable who secretly bought him whatever he wanted and who told him the names of all the prisoners and everything that went on in the other cells, and to convince me of it he told me all he knew about the hole I had made. "You were taken from there," he said, "to make room for the patrician Priuli Gran Can,[16] and Lorenzo spent two hours having the hole you made stopped up by a carpenter and an ironsmith, on whom he enjoined silence upon pain of their lives, as he did on all his constables. Niccolò assured me that only one day later you would have left by a method which would have caused a great scandal, and that Lorenzo could have been strangled because it was perfectly clear that, though he tried to show surprise when he saw the hole and pretended to be furious with you, it could only be he who had given you the tools to break open the floor, which you must have given back to him. Niccolò also told me that Signor Bragadin promised him a thousand zecchini if he can make it possible for you to leave and that Lorenzo is confident that he can earn them without losing his post through the protection of Signor Diedo, who is his wife's lover. He also said that none of the constables dared tell the Secretary what had happened for fear that Lorenzo would get out of it with clean hands and would then avenge himself on the informer by having him discharged. I beg you to have confidence in me and to tell me all the particulars of this business and especially how you managed to procure the necessary tools. I promise you that my discretion will be equal to my curiosity."

I had no doubt of his curiosity but much doubt of his discretion, since his very question proved him to be the most indiscreet of men. However, I saw that I had to humor him, for I thought that a creature of his sort would be just the one to do everything I told him to do and to help me regain my freedom. I spent the whole day answering him; but a strong feeling of suspicion made me put off sending him my answer; I saw that our exchange of letters might be a trick of Lorenzo's to find out who had given me the tools to break the floor and where I was keeping them. I wrote him in a few words that a big knife with which I had made the hole was under the sill of the window in the corridor leading to the cell where I now was, I having myself put it there when I came in. This spurious confidence set my mind at rest in less than three days, for Lorenzo did not search the sill and he would have searched it if he had intercepted my letter.

Father Balbi wrote me that he knew I could have the big knife, for Niccolò had told him I had not been searched before I was locked in; Lorenzo had known this, and the circumstance might have saved him if I had succeeded in escaping, for he claimed that when he received a man from the hands of Messer Grande he could not but suppose that he had already been searched. Messer Grande would have said that, having seen me get out of my bed, he was sure that I had no weapons about me. He ended his letter by asking me to send him my knife by Niccolò, whom I could trust.

The monk's rashness surprised me. When I felt sure that my letters were not being intercepted I wrote him that I was not able to repose any confidence in his Niccolò and that I could not even entrust my secret to paper. Meanwhile his letters amused me. In one of them he told me the reason why Count Asquin was confined under the Leads even though he could not move, since, in addition to his being seventy years of age, he was hampered by a big belly and by a leg he had broken long ago and which had been badly set. He said that, not being rich, the Count practiced law as an advocate at Udine and that in the city council he defended the peasantry against the nobility, who were seeking to deprive them of the right to vote in the provincial assemblies. Because the demands of the peasants disturbed the public peace the nobles had recourse to the tribunal of the State Inquisitors, which ordered Count Asquin to abandon his clients. Count Asquin replied that the municipal code authorized him to defend the constitution, and he disobeyed; but the Inquisitors had him carried off, despite the code, and confined him under the Leads, where he had been for five years.[17] Like me, he had fifty soldi a day, but he had the privilege of handling his money himself. In this connection the monk, who never had a soldo, freely denigrated his companion to me, especially on the score of avarice. He said that in the cell on the other side of the hall there were two gentlemen[18] from the Sette Comuni, also in prison for disobedience, the elder of whom had gone mad and was kept tied up. In another cell there were two notaries.[19]

About this time a Veronese Marchese,[20] of the Pindemonte family, had been imprisoned for disobeying a summons to appear. This nobleman had enjoyed great privileges, perhaps the most important of them being that his servants were allowed to deliver his letters into his own hands. He was there only a week.

When my suspicions were set at rest, my state of mind led me to reason as follows. I wanted my freedom. The pike I had was excellent; but I could not use it because each morning every corner of my cell was sounded with an iron bar, except the ceiling. So I could only hope to escape through the ceiling by having it broken from outside. Whoever was to break it could escape with me by helping me to make a hole in the great roof of the palace the same night. Once on the roof I would see what needed to be done; so the thing was to resolve and begin. I could see no resource except the monk, who, at the age of thirty-eight, though he was lacking in judgment, could carry out my instructions. So I must make up my mind to confide everything to him and think of some way to send him my bolt. I began by asking him if he wanted his freedom and if he was prepared to do everything to gain it by escaping with me. He replied that both he and his companion would be ready to do everything to break their chains; but that there was no use thinking about what was impossible; here he made me a long list of the difficulties, with which he filled four pages and which would have kept me occupied for the rest of my life if I had tried to circumvent them. I answered that I was not concerned about the general difficulties and that, having made my plan, I had thought only of solving the particular ones, which I could not entrust to paper. I promised him freedom if he would give me his word of honor to carry out my orders blindly. He promised me he would do everything.

I then wrote him that I had a pointed iron bar twenty inches long, which he was to use to break open the ceiling of his cell so that he could get out of it; and that once out, he was to break through the wall which separated us, pass through the opening he had made to a point above my cell, break it open above, and pull me out. "Once you have done all this," I said, "you will have nothing more to do, for I will do all the rest. I will get you both out, you and Count Asquin."

He answered that when he had got me out of my cell I would at best be in a prison which would differ from the first only in size. "We shall be in the garrets," he wrote, "still confined behind three locked doors." "I know that, Reverend Father," I replied, "and it is not by way of the doors that I intend we shall escape. My plan is made and I am sure of it, and all that I ask from you is carrying it out to the letter, and no objections. Think only of some way by which my twenty-inch bar can reach your hands without whoever is to bring it to you knowing that he is bringing it; and send me your ideas on the subject. In the meanwhile have Lorenzo buy you forty or fifty images of saints big enough to paper the whole inside of your cell. All these prints of religious subjects will give Lorenzo no occasion for suspecting that their only use will be to cover the hole which you will make in the ceiling and by which you will get out. It will take you several days to make the hole; and in the morning Lorenzo will see nothing of what you have accomplished the day before, for you will put the print back where it was and your work will pass unnoticed. I cannot do this, for I am under suspicion and no one would believe that I have any great reverence for prints. Do this, and think of some way to get my bar."

Thinking about it too, I ordered Lorenzo to buy me a folio Bible which had recently been printed and which contained the Vulgate[21] and the Septuagint.[22] I thought of this book, the size of which led me to hope that I could put my pike in the back of the binding and so send it to the monk; but when I received it I found that the bolt was two inches longer than the Bible, which measured exactly a foot and a half. The monk had written me that his cell was already papered with prints; and I had written him my idea about the Bible and the great difficulty due to the length of my bar, which I could not shorten except with a forge. He answered, deriding the poverty of my imagination, that I had only to send him the bolt in my fox-skin cloak. He said Lorenzo had told him that I had this fine cloak, and it would give no cause for suspicion if Count Asquin asked to see it in order to have one like it bought for him. I had only, he said, to send it to them folded up; but I was sure that Lorenzo would unfold it on the way, for a folded cloak was more awkward to carry than if it were unfolded; but in order not to discourage him and at the same time to convince him that I was less stupid than himself, I wrote him that he need only send for the cloak. The next morning Lorenzo asked me for it, and I gave it to him folded up but without the bolt. A quarter of an hour later he brought it back to me, saying that they had admired it.

The next day the monk wrote me a letter in which he admitted that he had been guilty of giving me bad advice; but he added that I had been wrong to take it. According to him, the pike was lost, for Lorenzo had brought the cloak unfolded and he must have put the bar in his pocket. So all hope was lost. I consoled him by telling him the truth, at the same time asking him to give his advice less rashly in the future. I then decided to send the monk my bolt in the Bible, but taking a precaution which would infallibly prevent Lorenzo from looking at the ends of the big volume. So I told him that I wanted to celebrate St. Michael's Day[23] with two big dishes of macaroni[24] with butter and Parmesan cheese; I wanted two dishes of it because I wanted to make a present of one to the worthy personage who lent me books. Lorenzo said that the same worthy personage wished to read the big book which had cost three zecchini. I answered that I would send it to him with a dish of macaroni; but I said that I needed the largest dish he had in his house and that I wanted to season it myself; he promised to do everything to the letter. In the meanwhile I wrapped the bolt in paper and I put it in the back of the binding of the Bible. I divided the two inches; each end of the bolt protruded from the Bible by one inch. By placing a big dish of macaroni filled with butter on the Bible, I was sure that Lorenzo's eyes would remain fixed on the butter for fear of spilling it on the Bible, and that thus he would not have time to look at the two ends of the back of the volume. I informed Father Balbi of all this beforehand, urging him to be deft when he received the macaroni from Lorenzo and to be careful not to take first the dish and then the Bible but both together, for taking the dish would expose the Bible and then Lorenzo could easily see the two protruding ends.

On St. Michael's Day Lorenzo appeared very early in the morning with a great kettle in which the macaroni were boiling; I at once put the butter on a portable stove to melt it and I got my two dishes ready, sprinkling them with Parmesan cheese, which he had brought me all grated. I took the pierced spoon and I began to fill them, adding butter and cheese with each spoonful and not stopping until the big dish meant for the monk could hold no more. The macaroni were swimming in butter, which came up to the very edge of the dish. Its diameter was almost twice the width of the Bible.[25] I picked it up and set it on the big book, which I had put beside the door of my cell, and holding it on the palms of my hands with the spine toward Lorenzo I told him to put out his arms and spread his fingers, and I admonished him to carry it with the greatest care and slowly so that the butter would not spill out of the dish and run over the Bible. As I admonished him to be careful of this most important burden, I kept my eyes fixed on his, which I was most happy to see never moved from the butter, which he was afraid of spilling. He wanted to take the macaroni and come back for the Bible afterward; but I laughed and said that if he did that, my present would lose all its beauty. He finally took it, complaining that I had put in too much butter and protesting that if it spilled on my Bible it would not be his fault. I knew that I was certain of victory as soon as I saw the Bible on his arms, for the two ends of the pike, which were now at a distance from my eyes equal to the width of the book, had become invisible for him now that he was holding it; they were next to his shoulders and there was no reason for him to raise his eyes to look at either of the ends, which had not the slightest interest for him. He could only be concerned to keep his dish horizontal. I followed him with my eyes until I saw him go down three steps to enter the corridor in front of the monk's cell, who, by blowing his nose three times, gave me the prearranged signal that everything had reached his hands in good order. Lorenzo came back and said that everything had been delivered according to my instructions. Father Balbi took a week to make a big enough opening in his ceiling, easily hiding it each day with a print which he removed and pasted up again with bread.

On October 8th he wrote me that he had spent the whole night working at the wall which separated us and that he had only managed to remove one brick; he exaggerated the difficulty of breaking out bricks held together by mortar which was too solid; he promised to continue, and in all his letters he repeated that we should make our situation worse, for we could not succeed. I answered that I was certain of the contrary.

Alas! I was certain of nothing; but I had to do as I was doing or give up my whole plan. How could I have told him that I did not know? I wanted to be out of there—that was all I knew; and the only thing in my mind was to take what steps I could to forward my escape, and not to stop until I was confronted with something insurmountable. I had read the great book of experience and I had learned from it that great enterprises were not to be talked about but executed, though with due regard for the power which Fortune exercises over all the undertakings of men. If I had imparted these lofty mysteries of moral philosophy to Father Balbi he would have said that I was mad.

His work proved to be difficult only on the first night; during those which followed, the more bricks he took out the easier it was to get out more. At the end of his work he found that he had removed thirty-six bricks from the wall.

On October 16th at eighteen o'clock,[26] just as I was amusing myself translating one of Horace's odes, I heard footsteps above my cell and then three knocks; I at once replied with another three; it was the signal we had arranged to inform each other that we had not been mistaken. He worked until evening, and the next day he wrote me that if my ceiling was only two boards thick his work would be completed that day, for each board was only an inch thick. He assured me that he would make the small circular entrance-way as I had told him to do, and that he would take great care never to go completely through the last board; this I had strongly urged on him because the least sign of a break in my cell would have raised the suspicion that it originated outside of it. He assured me that he would carry his excavation to the point at which it could be completed in a quarter of an hour. I had already settled on the next day but one as the time when I would leave my cell by night and not return to it, for with a companion I felt sure that in three or four hours I could make an opening in the great roof of the Doge's Palace and get up onto it, and then take the best means which chance offered me of getting down.

Two hours after noon on that day, which was a Monday,[27] while Father Balbi was still at work, I heard the sound of the door to the room next to my cell being opened; my blood froze; but I had strength enough left to knock twice, the alarm signal we had agreed to use, on hearing which Father Balbi was to hurry back through the hole in the wall and regain his cell. A moment later I saw Lorenzo, who asked my pardon for giving me the company of a "beggarly scoundrel." I saw a man between forty and fifty years of age, short, thin, badly dressed, with a round black wig, whom two constables proceeded to unbind. I had no doubt that he was a rogue, since Lorenzo had so characterized him in my presence and he had taken no offense at the title. I answered Lorenzo that the tribunal was lord and master; after having a pallet brought for him, he left, telling him that the tribunal allowed him ten soldi a day. My new cellmate replied:

"May God repay them!"

Overwhelmed by this fatal obstacle, I looked at the scoundrel, whose face betrayed him. I was thinking of getting him to talk, when he began himself by thanking me for the pallet which I had had brought for him. I told him that he would eat with me, and he kissed my hand, asking me if even so he could have the ten soldi the tribunal allowed him, and I said that he could. He then went down on his knees, took a rosary from his pocket, and began peering all around the cell.

"What are you looking for, my friend?"

"I am looking, if you will forgive me, for some image dell'immacolata Vergine Maria, since I am a Christian, or at least for some poor crucifix, for I was never in such need of commending myself to St. Francis of Assisi, whose name I unworthily bear, as I am at this moment."

I could hardly keep from bursting into laughter, not at his Christian piety, which I revered, but at the way in which he had defended himself; his asking my pardon made me think he took me for a Jew; I hastened to give him the Office of the Holy Virgin,[28] whose image he kissed, then handed it back to me, modestly saying that his father, warden of a galley, had failed to have him taught to read. He said that he was a devotee of the most holy Rosary and told me a quantity of its miracles, to which I listened with the patience of an angel, and he asked my permission to recite it looking at the holy image which was the frontispiece to my Book of Hours. After the Rosary, which I recited with him, I asked him if he had dined and he said he was dying of hunger. I gave him everything I had; he devoured it all ravenously, drank all the wine I had, and when he was tipsy he began first crying and then babbling without rhyme or reason. I asked him the cause of his misfortune, and here is his story:

"My one and only passion in this world, dear master, has always been the glory of this sacred Republic and strict obedience to its laws; always attentive to the evil practices of the wicked, whose sole occupation is to deceive their prince and cheat him out of his dues and to keep their own activities concealed, and I have tried to discover their secrets and I have always faithfully reported to Messer Grande whatever I have been able to discover; it is true that I have always been paid; but the money I have received has never given me as much pleasure as the satisfaction I have felt in seeing that I was useful to the glorious Evangelist St. Mark. I have always scorned the prejudice of those who attach an evil meaning to the designation 'spy'; that name is ill-sounding only in the ears of those who do not love the government, for a spy is nothing but one who fosters the good of the State, the scourge of criminals, and the loyal subject of his prince. When I have been called upon to put my zeal into action, the feeling of friendship, which may have some weight with others, has never had any with me, still less what is called gratitude, and I have often vowed silence to wrest from someone an important secret which, as soon as I learned it, I punctually reported, assured by my confessor that I could reveal it not only because I had had no intention of keeping my oath of silence when I took it but because, where the public welfare is concerned, no oath is binding. I feel that, the slave of my zeal, I would have betrayed my father and I would have stilled the promptings of nature.

"Three weeks ago, then, I observed at Isola,[29] a small island where I was living, a great intimacy among four or five notable personages of the city whom I knew to be dissatisfied with the government because of the discovery and confiscation of a certain contraband shipment, which the principals had been obliged to expiate by imprisonment. The First Chaplain[30] of the parish, born a subject of the Empress-Queen, was in the plot, whose secret I determined to unravel. The plotters met in the evening at an inn, in a room where there was a bed; and after drinking and talking together they left. I boldly determined to hide under the bed one day when, sure that I was unobserved, I found the room open and empty. Toward evening my plotters arrived and talked about the city of Isola which they said was not under the jurisdiction of St. Mark but under that of the principality of Trieste, for it could not be regarded as a part of Venetian Istria. The Chaplain said to the leader of the plot, whose name was Pietro Paolo, that if he would sign a document and the others would do the same, he would himself wait on the Imperial Ambassador[31] and that the Empress would not only seize the city but would reward them. They all told the Chaplain they were ready, and he promised to bring the document the next day and leave at once and come here to bring it to the Ambassador. I decided to make their infamous project miscarry, despite the fact that one of the conspirators was my godfather, a spiritual relationship which gave him a claim on me more sacred and inviolable than if he had been my brother.

"After they left I had plenty of time to get away, thinking it useless to run a second risk by hiding myself the next day under the same bed. I had discovered enough. I left at midnight in a boat, and the next day before noon I was here, where I had someone write down the names of the six rebels for me, then took them to the Secretary to the State Inquisitors, telling him the facts. He ordered me to go early the next morning to Messer, who would give me a man with whom I should go to Isola to point out the Chaplain to him, for it seemed that the Chaplain would not have left by then, and after that I was to let the matter alone. I carried out his order. Messer gave me the man, I took him to Isola, I showed him the Chaplain, and I went about my business.

"After dinner my godfather sent for me to come and shave him, for I am a barber. After I had shaved him he gave me an excellent glass of refosco[32] and some slices of garlic sausage and he ate with me in good fellowship. My love for him as my godfather then filled my soul, I took his hand and, with heartfelt tears, advised him to end his acquaintance with the Chaplain and above all not to sign the document of which he knew; upon this he said to me that he was no more friendly with the Chaplain than with anyone else and he swore he had no idea what document I was referring to. I then began to laugh, I said I had been joking, and I left him, repenting that I had listened to the voice of my heart.

"The next day I saw neither the man nor the Chaplain, and a week later I left Isola and came here. I went to see Messer Grande, who instantly had me locked up; and here I am with you, dear master. I thank St. Francis that I am in the company of a good Christian who is here for reasons which I do not seek to know, for I am not curious. My name is Soradaci,[33] and my wife is a Legrenzi, daughter of a Secretary to the Council of Ten, who trampled on prejudice in order to marry me. She will be in despair not to know what has become of me; but I hope I shall stay here only a few days; I can be here only for the convenience of the Secretary, who presumably will need to question me."

After this brazen narrative, which showed me what kind of monster he was, I pretended to condole with him and, lauding his patriotism, predicted that he would be free in a few days. A half hour later he went to sleep, and I wrote the whole story to Father Balbi, urging upon him the necessity of suspending our work to await a favorable opportunity. The next day I ordered Lorenzo to buy me a wooden crucifix and a print of the Holy Virgin, and to bring me a flask of holy water. Soradaci asked him for his ten soldi, and Lorenzo scornfully gave him twenty. I ordered him to bring me four times as much wine and some garlic, for my cell-mate delighted in it. After he left I deftly took Father Balbi's letter from the book; he described his fright to me. He had returned to his cell more dead than alive and had quickly put the print back over the hole. He reflected that all would have been lost if Lorenzo had taken it into his head to put Soradaci in his garret instead of putting him with me. Lorenzo would not have seen him in the cell and he would have seen the hole.

The account Soradaci gave me of his activities led me to conclude that he would certainly have to undergo questioning, for the Secretary could not have had him locked up except on suspicion of slander or because his report was not clear. I therefore decided to entrust him with two letters which, if he had taken them to those to whom they were addressed, would have done me neither good nor harm, and which would have done me good if the traitor gave them to the Secretary in proof of his fidelity. I spent two hours writing the letters in pencil. The next morning Lorenzo brought me the image of the Virgin, the bottle of holy water, and all that I had ordered.

After feeding the scoundrel well I told him that I was under the necessity of asking him to do me a favor upon which my happiness depended.

"I count, my dear Soradaci, on your friendship and your courage. Here are two letters which I beg you to take to their addresses as soon as you regain your freedom. My happiness depends on your fidelity; but you must hide them, for if they are found on you when you leave here we are both lost. You must swear to me by this crucifix and by this Holy Virgin that you will not betray me."

"I am ready, master, to swear whatever you ask; I am under too great an obligation to you to betray you."

He began crying and protesting that he was wretched enough without my supposing him capable of treachery. After giving him a shirt and a nightcap, I took my nightcap off, I sprinkled the cell with holy water, and in the presence of the two sacred images I intoned an oath accompanied by imprecations which had no sense but were horrifying, and after several signs of the cross I made him get down on his knees and swear with imprecations which set him trembling that he would deliver the letters. After that I gave them to him, and it was he who insisted on sewing them into the back of his vest between the cloth and the lining.

I was morally certain that he would give them to the Secretary; so I used every art to write in such a style that no one would ever discover my ruse. My letters were of a nature to gain me the indulgence of the tribunal and even its esteem. I wrote to Signor Bragadin and to the Abate Grimani and I told them to set their minds at rest and not to repine over my fate, for I had reason to hope that I would soon be released. I told them that when I came out they would find that my punishment had done me more good than harm, because no one in Venice had stood in greater need of reformation than I. I asked Signor Bragadin to send me a pair of lined boots for the winter, since my cell was high enough for me to stand upright and walk about in. I did not want Soradaci to know that my letters were so innocent, for he might have taken it into his head to act like an honest man and deliver them.

CHAPTER XV

Soradaci turns traitor. How I overawe him. Father Balbi successfully completes his work. I leave my cell. Count Asquin's untimely observations. The moment of departure.

TWO OR three days later Lorenzo came up at the Terza and took Soradaci down with him. Not seeing him return, I thought I should see no more of him; but he was brought back toward the end of the day, which rather surprised me. After Lorenzo left he told me that the Secretary suspected him of having warned the Chaplain, since the priest had never gone to see the Ambassador and no document had been found on him. He said that after a long interrogation he had been put all alone in a very small cell where he had been left for seven hours and that afterward he had been fettered again and taken to the Secretary, who tried to make him confess that he had told someone in Isola that the priest would not return there; this he could not confess, for he had never said it to anyone. The Secretary had finally rung and he had been brought back to my cell.[1]

In bitterness of soul I realized that he might well be left with me for a long time. During the night I wrote all this to Father Balbi. It was under the Leads that I learned to write in the dark.

The next morning after swallowing my broth, I wanted to make sure of what I already suspected.

"I wish," I said to the spy, "to add something to the letter I wrote Signor Bragadin; give it to me; you can sew it back in afterward."

"It is dangerous," he answered, "for someone might come in just at that moment and catch us at it."

"Let them come. Give me back my letters."

The monster then fell on his knees before me and swore that when he appeared before the terrible Secretary for the second time he was seized with a violent shaking and felt an intolerable pressure on his back just where the letters were, and the Secretary asking him what it was, he could not keep from telling him the truth, and Lorenzo having taken off his fetters and then his vest, he had unsewn the letters, which the Secretary had put in a drawer after reading them. He added that the Secretary had said that if he had delivered the letters it would have been known and his crime would have cost him his life.

I then pretended to feel ill. I covered my face with my hands and flung myself on the bed on my knees before the crucifix and the Virgin demanding vengeance upon the monster who had betrayed me by violating the most solemn of all oaths. After that I lay down on my side with my face to the wall, and I had the firmness to remain there all that day without uttering a word, pretending not to hear the villain's tears and cries and protestations of repentance. I played my role wonderfully well in a comedy of which I already had the whole plot sketched out in my head. During the night I wrote Father Balbi to come at exactly nineteen o'clock,[2] and not one minute earlier or later, to finish his work, and to work for only four hours, so that he should leave without fail exactly when he heard twenty-three o'clock strike. I told him that our freedom depended on this absolute precision on his part and that he had nothing to fear.

It was the 25th of October, and the days were nearing when I must either carry out my project or abandon it forever. The State Inquisitors and even the Secretary went every year to spend the first three days of November[3] in some village on the mainland. During these three days when his masters were on vacation Lorenzo got drunk in the evening, slept until the Terza, and did not appear under the Leads until very late. It was a year earlier that I had learned all this. Prudence demanded that, if I was to escape, I must choose one of these three nights, in order to be certain that my flight would not be discovered until fairly late in the morning. Another reason for my eagerness, and one which led me to take the resolve at a time when I could no longer doubt that my companion was a scoundrel, was extremely powerful, and I think it deserves to be recorded.

The greatest relief a man in misfortune can have is the hope of soon escaping from it; he thinks of the happy moment when he will see the end of his misery, he persuades himself that it will not be long in coming, and he would do anything on earth to know exactly when it will come; but no one can know at what time something which depends on the will of another will happen, unless that other has announced it. However, in his impatience and weakness, the man comes to believe that by some occult means he can discover the time. "God," he says, "must know it, and God may permit it to be revealed to me by some omen." As soon as his curiosity has led him to this reasoning he does not hesitate to consult the omens, whether he is ready or not to believe all that they may tell him. Such was the state of mind of those who in past ages consulted oracles; such is the state of mind of those who today still question cabalas and who seek revelations in a verse of the Bible or a verse of Vergil, which has brought such fame to the sortes virgilianae[4] of which so many writers tell us.

Not knowing what method to use to make Destiny reveal to me through the Bible the moment at which I was to regain my freedom, I decided to consult the divine poem of Orlando furioso by Messer Lodovico Ariosto, which I had read countless times and which was still my delight up there. I worshiped his genius and I thought him far better suited than Vergil to foretell my good fortune.

With this idea in mind, I composed a short question in which I asked the supposed Intelligence which canto of Ariosto contained the prediction of my day of deliverance. After that I constructed an inverted pyramid made up of the numbers which resulted from the words of my question, and by subtracting nine from each pair of digits I finally came out with the number nine. I therefore concluded that the prediction I sought was in the ninth canto. I used the same method to discover in which stanza the prediction occurred and the resulting number was seven. Now eager to learn which verse of the stanza contained the oracle, the same method gave me the number one. So having the numbers 9, 7, 1 I took up the poem and, with my heart palpitating, found canto nine, stanza seven, first verse:

> Tra il fin d'Ottobre, e il capo di Novembre

The clarity of the verse and its appropriateness struck me as so amazing that I will not say I had complete faith in it, but my reader will forgive me if, for my part, I prepared to do all that I could to help verify the oracle. The strange thing is that "between the end of October and the beginning of November" there is only midnight, and it was in fact at the stroke of midnight on October 31st that I left there, as the reader will see. I beg him, after this faithful account, not to dismiss me as more superstitious than anyone else, for he would be wrong. I recount the thing because it is true and extraordinary, and because if I had disregarded it I should perhaps not have escaped. The incident will teach all those who have not yet attained wisdom that but for predictions many things that have happened would never have happened. The event does the prediction the service of verifying it. If the event does not occur the prediction becomes nul and void; but I refer my kind reader to universal history, where he will find many events which would never have occurred if they had not been predicted. Forgive the digression.

And now for the way I spent the day until nineteen o'clock, meaning to strike awe into the soul of the stupid, vicious brute who was my companion, to confuse his feeble mind by astonishing images, and so make him powerless to harm me. When Lorenzo left us that morning I told Soradaci to come and eat his soup. The villain was in bed and he had told Lorenzo that he was ill. He would not have dared to come to me if I had not summoned him. He got up and, groveling on his belly at my feet, kissed them and, bursting into tears, said that unless I forgave him he would be a dead man that same day and that he already felt the beginning of the curse laid on him by the vengeance of the Holy Virgin, whom I had invoked against him; he felt griping pains tormenting his entrails and his tongue was covered with ulcers; he showed it to me and I saw that it was really covered with aphtha; I do not know if he had them the day before. I was not interested in examining him to see if he was telling me the truth; my interest was to pretend that I believed him and even to make him hope for forgiveness. I had next to make him eat and drink. The traitor might be intending to deceive me; but determined as I was to deceive him, it was a matter of finding out which of us was the cleverer. I had prepared an attack against which I was certain he could not defend himself.

I instantly assumed the countenance of a man inspired and I ordered him to sit down.

"Let us eat this soup," I said, "and afterward I will declare your good fortune to you. Know that the Holy Virgin of the Rosary appeared to me at daybreak and commanded me to forgive you. You will not die and you will leave this place with me."

Lost in wonder, he ate the soup with me, kneeling on the floor because there were no stools, then he sat on his pallet to hear me out. This is what I said:

"The grief which your treachery caused me kept me awake all night, because my letters, which you gave to the Secretary, would have been read by the State Inquisitors and have led to my being sentenced to stay here the rest of my life. My only consolation, I confess to you, was my certainty that you would die before my eyes within three days. With my mind full of this thought unworthy of a Christian, for God commands us to forgive, a slumber at daybreak brought me a vision. I saw this Holy Virgin, whose image you see, come to life, move, stand before me, open her mouth, and speak to me in these words: 'Soradaci is a devotee of my holy Rosary, I protect him, it is my will that you forgive him; and the curse he drew upon himself will now cease to operate. As the reward of your generous act I will command one of my angels to put on human form and at once come down from Heaven to break open the roof of this cell and take you from it in five or six days. The angel will set to work today at nineteen o'clock and he will work until half an hour before sunset, for he must return to Heaven by daylight. When you leave here with my angel you will take Soradaci with you, and you will look after him on condition that he gives up his trade of spy. You will tell him all this.' After saying these words the Holy Virgin vanished, and I found that I was awake."

Maintaining all the gravity I could muster, I studied the countenance of the traitor, who appeared to be petrified. I then took my Book of Hours, I sprinkled the cell with holy water, and I began pretending to pray to God, from time to time kissing the image of the Virgin. An hour later the beast, who had never said a word, asked me point-blank at what hour the angel was to come down from Heaven and if he would hear him breaking open the cell.

"I am certain that he will come at nineteen o'clock, that we will hear him working, and that he will leave at twenty-three; and it seems to me that four hours of work is enough for an angel."

"You may have been dreaming."

"I am sure I was not. Are you prepared to swear to me that you will renounce being a spy?"

Instead of answering he went to sleep and did not wake until two hours later, when he asked me if he could put off giving me his oath that he would renounce his trade.

"You can put it off," I said, "until the moment the angel enters this cell to take me away with him; but I warn you that if you do not swear to give up your evil trade I will leave you here, for such is the order I received from the Holy Virgin."

I then saw his relief, for he felt sure that the angel would not come. He seemed to pity me. I could not wait to hear the nineteenth hour strike, and the comedy entertained me vastly, for I was sure that the arrival of the angel would set the brute's miserable reason tottering. The thing was infallible unless, to my great regret, Lorenzo had forgotten to deliver the book.

At eighteen o'clock I began eating dinner, and I drank water. Soradaci drank all the wine and for dessert ate all the garlic I had; it was his sweetmeat. When I heard nineteen o'clock I fell on my knees, ordering him to do likewise in a voice which made him tremble. He obeyed, looking at me like an idiot with unseeing eyes. When I heard the little noise which told me that my accomplice was passing through the wall,

"The angel is coming," I said.

I then lay down on my stomach, at the same time giving him a push between the shoulders which made him fall into the same position. The noise from the breaking was loud, and I remained there prostrate for a good quarter of an hour. Did I not have reason enough to laugh when I saw that the scoundrel had remained motionless in the same position? But I did not laugh. I was engaged in the noble work of driving him mad or at least frantic. His accursed soul could not become human except by being steeped in terror. I spent three and a half hours reading while he told the Rosary, falling asleep from time to time and never daring to open his mouth, only looking up at the ceiling when he heard the noise of the monk splitting a board. In his stupor he kept bowing to the image of the Virgin in the most comical way imaginable. At the stroke of twenty-three o'clock I told him to do as I would do, since it was time for the angel to leave; we prostrated ourselves, Father Balbi left, and we heard not another sound. When I rose the expression I saw on the villain's face betokened dread and terror rather than rational surprise.

I amused myself for a while talking with him to hear how he would reason. He said things, always weeping, the connection between which was little short of absurdity; it was a hodgepodge of ideas none of which was pursued. He talked of his sins, of his special devotions, of his zeal for St. Mark, of his duties to his prince, and it was to this merit in him that he attributed the grace which the Holy Virgin was granting him, and I had to put up with a long tale of the miracles of the Rosary which his wife, whose confessor was a Dominican, had told him. He said that he could not guess what I would do with him, ignorant as he was.

"You will be in my service and you will have everything you need, without pursuing your vile and dangerous trade of spying."

"But we cannot stay in Venice."

"Of course not. The angel will lead us to a state which does not belong to St. Mark. Are you ready to swear to me that you will renounce your trade? And if you swear, will you perjure yourself again?"

"If I swear, I will not break my oath, that is sure; but admit that if I had not perjured myself you would not have obtained the grace which the Holy Virgin has granted you. So you must be grateful to me and love me for betraying you."

"Do you love Judas, who betrayed Jesus Christ?"

"No."

"Then you see that one must loathe the traitor and at the same time adore Providence, which makes good come out of evil. You have been a scoundrel, my dear man, until now. You have offended God and the Holy Virgin, and at present I will no longer accept your oath unless you expiate your sin."

"What sin have I committed?"

"Your sin of pride in supposing that I should feel obliged to you for giving my letters to the Secretary."

"Then what must I do to expiate my sin?"

"You must do this. Tomorrow when Lorenzo comes you must remain motionless on your pallet with your face to the wall and never look at Lorenzo. If he speaks to you you must answer him, without looking at him, that you could not sleep. Do you promise to obey me?"

"I promise you that I will do all that you say."

"Promise it to this holy image. Quick!"

"I promise you, most holy Virgin, that when Lorenzo comes I will not look at him and that I will not stir from my pallet."

"And I, most holy Virgin, swear to you by the bowels of Jesus Christ your God and son, that as soon as I see Soradaci turn to Lorenzo I will run and strangle him to your honor and glory."

I asked him if he had anything to object to my oath, and he said he was satisfied with it. I then gave him something to eat and told him to go to bed because I needed sleep. I spent two hours writing an account of all this to the monk and I said that if the work was almost completed he need come to the roof of my cell again only to break through the board and enter. I told him that we would leave on the night of October 31st, and that we would be four, counting his companion and mine. It was the 28th. Early the next day the monk informed me that the small entrance-way was finished and that he needed to get on the roof of my cell again only to open it, which he was sure he could do in four minutes. Soradaci obeyed his orders perfectly. He pretended to be asleep, and Lorenzo did not even speak to him. I kept my eyes on him and I believe I should really have strangled him if I had seen him turn his head toward Lorenzo, for to betray me he would have had to do no more than give him a wink.

I spent the day treating him to sublime discourses calculated to inspire fanaticism, leaving him in peace only when I saw that he was drunk and ready to fall asleep or on the point of going into convulsions under the impact of a metaphysics equally foreign and new to his mind, which had never applied its faculties to anything but inventing some trick of his spying trade.

He gave me pause for a moment by saying that he could not understand how an angel would need to work so long to open my cell; but I at once regained the upper hand by saying that he was not working as an angel but as a man, and I added that his evil thought must have instantly offended the Holy Virgin.

"And you will see," I said, "that because of your sin the angel will not come today. You always think not like an honest, pious, devout man but like a wicked sinner who supposes he is dealing with Messer Grande and the sbirri."

He then began weeping, and I was delighted to see that he was in despair when nineteen o'clock struck and there was no sound of the angel arriving. I then broke into lamentations which distressed him, and I left him to suffer all day. The next day he did not fail to obey, and when Lorenzo asked after his health he answered without looking at him. He maintained the same behavior on the following day, until I finally saw Lorenzo for the last time on the morning of the 31st, having given him the book in which I told the monk to come and make the opening. This time I feared no more obstacles, having learned from Lorenzo himself that not only the Inquisitors but the Secretary too had gone to the country. I had no reason to fear the arrival of any other guest; and I no longer needed to humor my infamous companion.

But now for an apology which I should perhaps make to some reader who might think unfavorably of my religion and morals because of the way I abused our holy mysteries and the oath which I made the idiot swear and the lies I told him about the appearance of the Holy Virgin.

Since my purpose was to tell the story of my escape with all its circumstances as they really happened, I considered it my duty to conceal nothing. I cannot say that I am confessing, for I feel no sting of repentance; nor can I say that I am proud of what I did, for it was with the utmost reluctance that I made use of the imposture. If I had disposed of any better means I would certainly have given them the preference. To regain my freedom I feel that I would still do the same thing today, and perhaps a great deal more.

Nature commanded me to escape, and religion could not forbid me to do it; I had no time to lose; having a spy with me who had given me an indubitable example of his perfidy, I must make it morally impossible for him to inform Lorenzo that the roof of the cell was being broken in. What was I to do? I had only two possibilities, and I must choose. Either I must bind the villain's soul by terror, or silence him by strangling him, as any other reasonable man more cruel than I would have done. It would have been much easier for me, and I should even have had nothing to fear, for I would have said that he died a natural death and no one would have taken much trouble to discover if it was true or not. Now where is the reader who can think that I would have done better to strangle him? If there is one such, may God enlighten him; his religion will never be mine. I believe that I did my duty; and the victory which crowned my exploit may be proof that eternal Providence did not disapprove of the means I employed. As for the oath I made him that I would always look after him, thank God he himself freed me from it, for he did not have the courage to escape with me; but even if he had found the courage I confess to my reader that I should not have thought I was perjuring myself if I had not kept it. I would have got rid of the monster at the first opportunity, even if I had had to hang him from a tree. When I swore that I would always help him, I knew that his loyalty would last only as long as the frenzy of his fanaticism, which was bound to disappear as soon as he saw that the angel was a monk. Non merta fè chi non la serba altrui ("He does not deserve loyalty who does not observe it").[6] A man has far more right to sacrifice everything to his own self-preservation than sovereigns have to do the same to preserve the State.

After Lorenzo left I told Soradaci that the angel would come to make an opening in the roof of my cell at seventeen o'clock; "he will bring a pair of scissors," I said, "and you shall cut my beard and the angel's."

"Does the angel wear a beard?"

"Yes, you will see it. After that we will leave and go to break open the roof of the palace; and at night we will get down into the Piazza San Marco and go to Germany."

He did not answer; he ate by himself, for my heart and mind were too much occupied with my escape to leave me capable of eating. I had not even been able to sleep.

Seventeen o'clock strikes, and the angel is there! Soradaci made to prostrate himself, but I said it was no longer necessary. In less than three minutes he broke through, the perfectly round piece of board dropped at my feet, Father Balbi slid into my arms.

"Your work," I said as I embraced him, "is done; mine begins."

He delivered the pike to me and gave me a pair of scissors, which I handed to Soradaci so that he could cut off our beards at once. This time I could not keep from laughing when I saw the utter astonishment with which the brute was staring at the angel, who looked like a devil. Beside himself, he cut our beards perfectly with the points of the scissors.

Impatient to see the topography of the place, I told the monk to stay there with Soradaci, for I did not want to leave him alone; I climbed out and found that the hole in the wall was narrow, but I got through it; I came to the roof of the Count's cell, I entered it and cordially embraced the unfortunate old man. I saw a figure not fitted to encounter the difficulties and dangers which such a flight was sure to bring us on an immense sloping roof covered with lead plates. He at once asked me what my plan was, saying that he thought the steps I had taken were not sufficiently considered.

"All I ask," I replied, "is to go forward until I find freedom or death."

He said, grasping my hand, that if my idea was to make a hole in the roof and try to find a way down over the lead plates, he did not see how I could do it unless I had wings.

"I have not," he added, "the courage to go with you; I will stay here and pray to God for you."

I then went out to investigate the great roof, getting as close as I could to the sides of the loft. Managing to touch the under side of the roof at the narrowest point of the angle, I sat down among the roof timbering, with which the lofts of all great palaces are filled. I sounded the boards with the point of my bolt and I found that they were as if rotting away. At each blow I made with my pike everything it entered fell to pieces. Seeing that I could certainly make a big enough opening in less than an hour, I went back to my cell, where I spent four hours cutting up sheets, napkins, mattresses, and everything I had which would make a rope. I insisted on knotting the pieces together myself with weaver's knots, for a badly made knot could have come undone and whoever was hanging from the rope at that moment would have fallen to the ground. I saw myself in possession of a hundred braccia[7] of rope. In great enterprises there are certain points which decide the issue and in regard to which the leader who deserves to succeed is he who trusts no one.

After finishing the rope I made a bundle of my coat, my floss-silk cloak, some shirts, stockings, and handkerchiefs, and the three of us went to the Count's cell carrying all this with us. The Count first congratulated Soradaci on having had the luck to be put with me and to be about to follow me. His look of confusion gave me an almost irresistible desire to laugh. I no longer restrained myself; I had cast off the mask of Tartufe[8] which I had worn all day for the past week to prevent the two-faced scoundrel from betraying me. I saw that he was sure I had deceived him, but otherwise he was completely bewildered; for he could not guess how I could have corresponded with the supposed angel to make him come and go at the hour I pleased. He heard the Count saying that we were braving the most obvious danger of perishing, and coward as he could not but be, he was already turning over a plan to excuse himself from the perilous journey. I told the monk to bundle up his things while I went to make the hole at the edge of the loft.

I needed no help to complete my opening by two o'clock[9] that night. I pulverized the boards. My aperture was twice as big as necessary, and I was able to touch the entire plate of lead. The monk helped me get it out of the way, for it either curved around the edge of the marble gutter or was riveted to it; but by pushing my pike between the gutter and the plate I got it loose, and then with our shoulders we bent it back until the opening through which we would have to pass was large enough. Putting my head out of the hole, I was distressed to see the bright light of the crescent moon, which would reach its first quarter the following day. It was an obstacle which we had to bear with patience, putting off our departure until midnight, when the moon would have gone to light the antipodes. On a splendid night, when everyone of any account would be strolling in the Piazza San Marco, I could not risk being seen walking about up there. Our shadows, stretching far over the pavement of the square, would have been seen by the strollers, they would have looked up, and our persons would have provided a most unusual spectacle which would have aroused curiosity, especially on the part of Messer Grande, whose sbirri, the only guardians of the great city of Venice, keep watch all night. He would instantly have found a way to send a troop of them up there, which would have ruined all my fine plans. I therefore imperiously decreed that we were not to go out until after the moon had set. I called on God for help, and I did not ask for miracles. Exposed to the whims of Fortune, I must give her as little scope as I could. If my enterprise failed, I must not have the slightest miscalculation to reproach myself with. The moon was certain to set at five, and the sun would rise at half past thirteen; we would have seven hours of total darkness in which to act.

I told Father Balbi that we would spend three hours conversing with Count Asquin; and to go to him by himself at once and let him know that I was in need of his lending me thirty zecchini which might be as indispensable to me as my pike had been in accomplishing all I had done. He did my errand and four minutes later came back and told me to go alone because the Count wanted to speak to me without witnesses. The poor old man began by gently telling me that I did not need money to make good my escape, that he had none, that he had a large family, that if I died the money he gave me would be lost, adding a great many other reasons, all calculated to hide his avarice. My answer took half an hour. I used excellent arguments but ones which have never had any power since the world began, for no orator can extirpate a passion. It was a case of nolenti baculus ("for him who is unwilling, the rod"), but I was not hardhearted enough to use force on the unfortunate old man. I ended by saying that if he wanted to flee with me I would carry him on my shoulders as Aeneas did Anchises;[10] but that if he wanted to remain and pray to God for us his prayer would achieve nothing, for he would be asking God to bring success to an undertaking to which he had not contributed by ordinary means. The sound of his voice called my attention to his tears, which tried my temper; he asked me if two zecchini would satisfy me, and I answered that I had to be satisfied with anything. He gave them to me, begging me to return them if after making a round of the great roof of the palace I took the sensible course of going back to my cell. I promised him I would do so, a little surprised that he supposed I could decide to return. I was certain that I would never go back there.

I called my companions, and we put all our equipment near the hole. I divided the hundred braccia of rope into two coils and we spent two hours talking and not unpleasurably recalling all our vicissitudes. The first sample Father Balbi gave me of his excellent character was to tell me ten times over that I had broken my word to him, since I had assured him in my letters that my plan was all laid and infallible, whereas it was nothing of the kind; and he brazenly told me that if he had known this beforehand he would not have got me out of my cell. The Count, with all the gravity of his seventy years, told me that my wisest course was not to go on, for the impossibility of getting down from the roof was as obvious as the danger, which might cost me my life. I said mildly that the two things which were obvious to him were far from obvious to me; but since he was an advocate by profession, here is the harangue with which he tried to convince me. What spurred him on was the two zecchini which I should have had to return to him if he had persuaded me to stay.

"The slope of the roof, covered as it is with lead plates, will not allow you to walk over it for you can scarcely stand upright on it. The roof has seven or eight dormers, but they are all barred with iron and there is no way of reaching them to stand in front of them for they are all distant from the edges. The ropes you have will be of no use to you, because you will find no place to which you could fasten one end securely, and even if you found it, a man descending from such a height cannot remain suspended by his arms or manage his own descent. So one of you three would have to put a rope around the other two, one at a time, and let them down as you let a bucket down into a well; and whoever did this would have to stay behind and go back to his cell. Which of the three of you feels inclined to perform this act of charity? And supposing that one of you is hero enough to be willing to remain behind, pray tell me on which side you will go down. Not on the side toward the square and the pillars, for you would be seen. Not on the side toward the church, for you would still be shut in. Not on the side toward the courtyard of the palace, for the Arsenalotti[11] make constant rounds there. You can only go down on the side toward the canal. You have no gondola and no boat waiting for you; so you would have to throw yourselves into the water and swim as far as Sant'Apollonia,[12] which you would reach in a deplorable state, not knowing where to go at night to put yourselves in fit condition to continue your flight. Consider that it is slippery on the leads, and if you fall into the canal you cannot hope to escape death even if you can swim, for the height is so great and the canal so shallow that the fall would crush you to death before you could drown. Three or four feet of water are not a volume of fluid sufficient to lessen the violence of the descent of a solid body falling into it. The least that could happen to you would be to find you had broken your legs or arms."

I listened to this harangue, inappropriate as it was to the exigencies of the situation, with a patience which was not like me. The monk's reproaches, hurled at me with no consideration, made me indignant and provoked me to refute them harshly; but I would have ruined what I had built up, for I was dealing with a coward quite capable of answering that he was not desperate enough to brave death and so I had only to set off by myself; and by myself I could not hope to succeed. I humored these grudging spirits by mildness. I said that I was sure I would save us though I was not in a position to tell them my plans in detail. I told Count Asquin that his sensible considerations would make me act with prudence and that my trust in God was so great that it stood me in stead of all else.

I frequently put out my hands to discover if Soradaci was still there, for he never said a word; I laughed as I thought of what he might be turning over in his malicious mind, which must know that I had deceived him. At half past four I told him to go and see where the crescent moon was in the sky. He came back and said that in a half hour it would no longer be visible, and that an unusually thick fog must be making the leads very dangerous.

"It is enough for me, my man, if the fog is not oil. Make a bundle of your cloak and some of our ropes, which we must divide equally between us."

I was then surprised to find the man at my knees, taking my hands and kissing them, and saying with tears that he begged me not to ask his death.

"I am certain," he said, "to fall into the canal; I can be of no use to you. Alas! Leave me here and I will spend the whole night praying to St. Francis for you. It is in your power to kill me; but I will never make up my mind to come with you."

The fool did not know that I thought his company would bring me misfortune.

"You are right," I said, "stay; but on condition that you will pray to St. Francis and go at once and bring all my books, which I wish to leave to the Count."

He obeyed me instantly. My books were worth a hundred scudi[13] at least. The Count said he would return them to me when I came back.

"Be sure," I answered, "that you will not see me here again, and that I am very glad this base coward has not courage enough to follow me. He would be in my way, and in any case such a coward is unworthy to share the honor of so signal an escape with Father Balbi and me. Is not that so, my brave companion?" I said to the monk, another coward in whom I hoped to arouse some sense of honor.

"Very true," he said, "always provided that he does not have cause to congratulate himself tomorrow."

I then asked the Count for pens, ink, and paper, all of which he had despite the prohibition, for prohibitions were nothing to Lorenzo, who would have sold St. Mark himself for a scudo. I then wrote the following letter, which I left in the care of Soradaci without being able to read it over, for I wrote it in the dark. I began it with a visionary motto, which under the circumstances I thought very appropriate.

> Non moriar sed vivam, et narrabo opera Domini.
> ("I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord.")[14]

"Our Lords the State Inquisitors are bound to do everything to keep a culprit in prison by force; but the culprit fortunate enough not to be on parole must also do everything he can to gain his freedom. Their right is founded upon justice; the culprit's upon nature. Just as they did not need his consent to lock him up, so he cannot need theirs to flee.

"Giacomo Casanova who writes this in the bitterness of his heart knows that he is liable to the misfortune of being caught before he leaves the State and returned to the hands of those whose sword he seeks to flee, and in that case he appeals on his knees to the humanity of his generous judges, begging them not to make his fate still more cruel by punishing him for what he has done only at the prompting of reason and nature. He begs them, if he is taken, to return to him all his belongings which he leaves in the cell he has vacated. But if he has the good fortune to escape, he gives all that he leaves here to Francesco Soradaci, who remains a prisoner because he fears the danger to which I am about to expose myself and does not, as I do, love his freedom more than his life. Casanova begs the magnanimous virtue of Their Excellencies not to deny the wretch the gift he has made him. Written an hour before midnight without light in the cell of Count Asquin this 31st day of October 1756."

> Castigans castigavit me Deus, et morti non tradidit me.
> ("The Lord hath chastened me sore: but he hath not given me over unto death.")[15]

I gave him the letter, warning him not to give it to Lorenzo but only to the Secretary himself, who certainly would not fail to come up. The Count told him that my letter would infallibly produce the intended effect, but that he must give everything back to me if I reappeared. The idiot answered that he hoped to see me again and return everything to me.

But it was time to leave. The moon was no longer visible. I tied half the ropes to Father Balbi's neck on one side and the bundle of his wretched clothing on his other shoulder. I did the same to myself. Both of us in our vests, with our hats on our heads, we set forth to what we might find.

> E quindi uscimmo a rimirar le stelle (Dante).
>
> ("And from there we went out to see the stars again.")[16]

CHAPTER XVI

I leave the prison. I am in danger of losing my life on the roof. I leave the Doge's Palace, I embark, and I reach the mainland. Danger to which Father Balbi exposes me. Stratagem I am obliged to use to get rid of him for a time.

I WENT out first; Father Balbi followed me. I told Soradaci to put the lead plate back where it had been and dismissed him to pray to his St. Francis. Down on my hands and knees, I got a good grip on my pike and, extending my arm, I pushed it slantwise into the joints between the plates, with the result that by using my four fingers to grasp the edge of the plate I had raised, I was able to help myself along to the top of the roof. To follow me the monk had put the four fingers of his right hand into the belt of my breeches near the buckle, so that I was in the unhappy position of a beast of burden at once carrying and drawing, and what is more while climbing a slope wet from the fog.

Halfway up this rather dangerous ascent the monk told me to stop because one of his bundles had come loose from his neck and rolled down, perhaps no farther than the gutter. My first response was the temptation to give him a good kick; it would have been more than enough to send him hurrying after his bundle; but God granted me the strength to resist it; the punishment would have been too great both for him and for me, since all by myself I simply could not have got away. I asked him if it was the bundle of ropes; but when he said that it was the one in which he had put his black redingote, two shirts, and a precious manuscript he had found under the Leads and which, he insisted, would make his fortune, I calmly told him that he must bear it patiently and go on. He sighed, and, still clinging to my behind, he followed me.

After passing over fifteen or sixteen plates, I found that I had reached the ridge of the roof, on which, spreading my legs, I sat comfortably astride. The monk did likewise behind me. We had our backs turned to the small island of San Giorgio Maggiore,[1] and two hundred paces ahead of us were the numerous domes of the Church of San Marco, which forms part of the Doge's Palace; it is the Doge's chapel; no monarch on earth can boast of having one equal to it. I at once got rid of my burdens and told my accomplice that he might do likewise. He managed well enough to put his bundle of ropes between his thighs, but his hat, which he tried to put there too, lost its balance and, after turning all the somersaults necessary to bring it to the gutter, dropped into the canal. My companion instantly succumbed to despair.

"A bad omen," he said. "Here I am, at the beginning of our enterprise, without a shirt, without a hat, and without a manuscript which contained the precious and completely unknown history of all the festivals celebrated in the palace of the Republic."

Less savage than I had been when I was climbing, I told him that the two accidents he had just experienced were far too natural for even a superstitious person to call them auguries, that I did not consider them such, and that they did not discourage me; but that they should serve him as a last warning to be prudent and obedient and to reflect that if his hat had fallen off to his right instead of to his left we should have been lost, for it would have dropped into the palace courtyard, where the Arsenalotti would have picked it up, and, concluding that there must be someone on the roof of the Doge's Palace, they would certainly have done their duty and found some way to pay us a visit.

After spending several minutes looking to right and left, I told the monk to stay there with the bundles and not to move until I returned. I set out carrying only my pike, moving along on my behind, still straddling the angle without any difficulty. I spent nearly an hour going everywhere, stopping, observing, examining; but, seeing nothing in any direction to which I could fasten one end of my rope to let myself down into a place where I should be safe, I was in the greatest perplexity. There was no use giving further thought either to the canal or to the palace courtyard. On the top of the church I could see only precipitous slopes between the domes, none of them leading anywhere which was not locked. To get beyond the church in the direction of La Canonica[2] I should have had to climb over steep curved surfaces; it was natural that I dismissed as impossible what I saw no way of doing. I had to be bold but not foolhardy. The exact point between them is, I believe, one of the most imperceptible middle points in philosophy.

My eyes and my thought began to dwell on a dormer which was on the side toward the Rio del Palazzo,[3] about two thirds of the way down the slope. It was far enough from the place at which I had made my exit to assure me that the loft which it lighted did not belong to the guarded precincts of the cells I had broken open. It could only furnish light to some garret, inhabited or not, above one of the palace apartments, in which when day began I should naturally find the doors open. As for the palace servants, or those of the Doge's family,[4] I was morally certain that they would have hastened to get us away and done anything except put us back in the hands of inquisitorial justice, even if they had known us to be the greatest criminals in the State. With this idea in mind, I felt impelled to inspect the front of the dormer, and I proceeded there at once by raising one leg and letting myself slide until I was more or less sitting on its small horizontal roof, which was three feet long and a foot and a half wide. I then bent well over, holding firmly to its sides, and bringing my head as close to it as I could. I saw, or rather, managed to feel, a light iron grating and behind it a window with round panes joined together by narrow slotted strips of lead. I thought nothing of the window, though it was shut; but the grating, light as it was, demanded a file, and the only tool I had was my pike.

Thoughtful, gloomy, and baffled, I did not know what to do when a very natural occurrence had the effect of an extraordinary prodigy on my astonished soul. I hope that my sincere avowal will not lower me in the eyes of my philosophical reader, if he considers that a man in a state of anxiety and distress is only half of what he can be in a state of tranquillity. The midnight bell sounding from San Marco just at that moment was the phenomenon which seized upon my mind and which, by a violent shock, delivered it from the dangerous doubt under which it was laboring. The bell reminded me that the day which was just then to begin was All Saints' Day; if I had a patron saint, he must be among them. But what raised my courage still more and actually increased my physical powers was the profane oracle I had received from my dear Ariosto: Tra il fin d'Ottobre, e il capo di Novembre. If a great misfortune makes a freethinker pious, it is almost impossible for him not also to become in some degree superstitious. The sound of the bell spoke to me, told me to act, and promised me victory. Lying prone up to my neck and bending my head down toward the small grating, I pushed my bolt into the frame which held it and I determined to break it and remove the grating in one piece. It took me only a quarter of an hour to smash all the wood which made up the four sides of the frame. The grating being now in my hands in one piece, I put it beside the dormer. I found it no more difficult to break away the glazed window, paying no attention to the blood flowing from my left hand, which was slightly cut by a pane I pulled out.

With the help of my bolt I used my original method to return to my position astride the pyramidal summit[5] of the roof, and I made my way to the place where I had left my companion. I found him desperate, furious, and in an atrocious humor; he reviled me because I had left him all alone for two long hours. He assured me that he was only waiting for seven o'clock to go back to his cell.

"What did you think I was doing?"

"I thought you had fallen into some chasm."

"And aren't you glad to see that I didn't?"

"What were you up to all this time?"

"You'll see. Follow me."

I tied my belongings and my rope to my neck and proceeded toward the dormer. When we came to the place where it was to our right I gave him a detailed account of all that I had done, consulting him as to how we could both get into the loft. I saw that it would be easy for one of us, because the other could let him down by means of the rope; but I did not know what means the other could employ to get down too, for I did not see how I could make the cord fast so that I could tie myself to it. If I got in and let myself go, I might break a leg, for I did not know if the jump down was too long to risk. To these sound considerations, delivered in friendly tones, the monk replied that I had only to let him down, and that then I would have all the time I needed to think out how I could rejoin him in the place to which I had lowered him. I controlled myself enough not to reproach him with all the cowardice of his answer but not enough to defer setting his mind at rest. I instantly undid my bundle of ropes; I put a loop around his chest under the armpits, I made him lie down on his belly, and I let him down feet first to the small roof of the dormer, where, still controlling the rope from my position astride the summit, I told him to get his legs inside up to the hips, supporting himself with his elbows on the roof. I then slid down the slope as I had done the first time and, lying down on my belly, I told him to let his body go without any fear for I had a firm hold of the rope. When he reached the floor of the loft he untied himself, and pulling the rope back I found that the distance from the dormer to the floor was ten times the length of my arm. It was too long a jump to risk. He said that I could throw the ropes inside; but I took good care not to follow his stupid advice. I went back to the summit, and not knowing what to do, I made my way to a place near a cupola which I had not inspected. I saw a flat terrace, paved with lead plates, next to a large dormer window closed by a pair of blinds, and in a vat I saw a heap of quicklime and beside it a trowel and a ladder long enough for me to use it to climb down to where my companion was; only the ladder interested me. I passed my rope under the top rung and, resuming my position astride the roof, I dragged the ladder to the dormer. It was now a matter of getting it in. The ladder was twelve times the length of my arm.

The difficulties I had to overcome in the process of getting the ladder in were so great that I heartily repented of having deprived myself of the monk's help. I had pushed the ladder in the direction of the gutter so that one end of it touched the opening in the dormer and the other end protruded beyond the gutter by a third of the length of the ladder. I then slid down to the roof of the dormer, I dragged the ladder sidewise and, pulling it to me, I fastened the rope to the eighth rung. I then pushed it down again and got it back in line with the dormer; then I pulled the rope toward me; but the ladder could only go in as far as the fifth rung, its top struck against the roof of the dormer and no amount of force could have made it go in any farther. It was absolutely necessary to raise the other end; raising it would lower the opposite end, and the whole ladder could be put in. I could have set the ladder across the opening, tied my rope to it, and let myself down without any risk; but the ladder would have remained where it was, and in the morning it would have shown the sbirri and Lorenzo the place where I might well still be.

Somehow, then, the entire ladder had to be brought into the dormer, and having no one with me I was left with no choice except making up my mind to go down to the gutter myself and raise the end of it. This is what I did, exposing myself to a danger which, but for an extraordinary intervention of Providence, would have cost me my life. I had no hesitation about letting the ladder go by slackening the rope, for there was no fear that it would drop into the canal since it was hooked to the gutter by its third rung. Holding my pike, I slid slowly to a point in the gutter beside the ladder; I put down the pike and nimbly turned so that I was directly facing the dormer and had my right hand on the ladder. The gutter sustained the tips of my toes, for I was not standing but lying on my belly. In this position I mustered strength enough to raise the ladder half a foot, at the same time pushing it forward. I had the satisfaction of seeing it go in a good foot. The reader will understand that its weight must have diminished considerably. It was now necessary to raise it two more feet to make it go in that much farther; with that done, I was sure I could get it all the way in by at once returning to the roof of the dormer and pulling on the cord which I had tied to the rung. To elevate it two feet, I rose to my knees, but the force I tried to use to push it up made the toes of my two feet slip, so that my body dropped off into space as far as my chest, till it hung from my two elbows. It was in the same terrible instant that I used all my strength and all the aid of my elbows to press my body forward and check my further descent by my ribs; and I succeeded. Taking care not to slip, I managed with the help of the rest of my arms as far as the wrists to hold myself against the gutter with my whole belly. I had no fear for the ladder, since, my two efforts having pushed it in three feet, it could not move from where it was. So, finding that I now had my wrists and my groins from my lower belly to the top of my thighs actually on the gutter, I saw that by raising my right thigh so that I could put first one knee and then the other on the gutter, I should be out of my great danger. The effort I made to carry out my plan brought on a nervous spasm, the pain from which is enough to fell the strongest of men. It seized me just as my right knee was already touching the gutter; but the painful spasm, which is called a "cramp," not only practically paralyzed me in every limb, it necessitated my remaining motionless to wait for it to go away of itself, as previous experience had taught me it would do. Terrible moment! Two minutes later I made the attempt and—thank God!—I brought one knee to the gutter, then the other, and as soon as I thought I had sufficiently recovered my breath I straightened up, though still on my knees, and raised the ladder as far as I could, and I managed to get it high enough to be on a level with the opening in the dormer. Sufficiently well acquainted with the laws of the lever and of equilibrium, I then took my bolt and, following my usual method, climbed to the dormer, where I had no difficulty getting the ladder in, my companion receiving the end of it in his arms. I threw the ropes, my clothes, and all the debris from breaking the window down into the loft and then entered it, warmly greeted by the monk, who saw to pulling in the ladder. Arm in arm, we made the round of the dark place we were in, which might have been thirty feet long and ten wide.

At one end of it we found a double door made of iron bars; turning the latch at the center, I opened it. We groped our way around the walls, and, starting to cross the place, we found a large table surrounded by stools and armchairs. We went back to where we had touched windows; I opened one, then the blinds, and by the starlight we saw chasms between domes. I did not for a moment think of climbing down; I wanted to know where I was going, and I knew nothing of this part of the palace. I closed the blinds, we left the room, and returned to the place where we had left our baggage. At the end of my strength, I dropped onto the floor, stretched out with a bundle of ropes under my head, and in my utter exhaustion of body and mind a very sweet slumber took complete possession of me; I fell so irresistibly asleep that I thought I was yielding to death, and even had I been sure that it was so, I would have made no resistance, for the pleasure I felt in falling asleep was unbelievable.

My sleep lasted three hours and a half. The piercing cries and rough shaking of the monk were what waked me. He said that twelve o'clock[6] had just struck and that it was inconceivable I should sleep in our situation. It was inconceivable to him; but my sleep had not been voluntary; it was my constitution at bay which had brought it on, and the inanition due to my having neither eaten nor slept for two days. But the sleep had restored all my vigor, and I was delighted to see that the darkness of the loft had lessened a little.

I rose, saying:

"This place is not a prison; there must be a perfectly simple way of getting out of it, which will be easy to find."

We then made our way to the end opposite the door made of iron bars and in a very narrow corner I thought

I felt a door, I feel a keyhole, I thrust my bolt into it, hoping that it is not a closet. After three or four pushes I open it, I see a small room, and I find a key on a table. I try the key in the door, and I see that I have locked it. I open it and I tell the monk to go quickly for our bundles, and as soon as he brings them I lock the small door again and put the key back where it was. I leave the small room and find that I am in a gallery lined with niches full of notebooks. They were archives. I find a short, narrow stone stairway and I go down it; I find another with a glazed door at the end; I open it and I see that I am at last in a room I knew; we were in the ducal chancellery.[7] I open a window, and I see that I could easily get down, but I would be in the labyrinth of little courtyards which surround the Church of San Marco. God forfend! On a desk I see an iron instrument with a wooden handle and a round point, which the chancellery secretaries use to make holes in parchments, to which they then attach the lead seals[8] with thread; I take it. I open the desk and find a copy of a letter informing the Proveditor-General[9] in Corfu of the dispatch of three thousand zecchini for restoring the old fortress. I look to see if I can find the money, but it is not there. God knows with what pleasure I would have appropriated it, and how I would have laughed at the monk if he had dared to tell me that it was robbery. I would have considered it a gift from Providence, to say nothing of appropriating it by right of conquest.

I go to the door of the chancellery, I put my bolt into the lock, but convinced in less than a minute that my pike could not force it, I quickly decide to make a hole in one of the two leaves of the door. I choose the place where there are the fewest knots in the wood. I go to work on the board at the point where its junction with the other leaf affords me a crack, and all goes well. I made the monk force the wooden-handled instrument into the cracks I opened with the pike; then, pushing the latter as hard as I could to left and right, I broke and split and shattered the wood, heedless of the tremendous noise which my method of attack produced; the monk was trembling, for someone must be hearing it far away. I knew the danger, but I had to risk it.

In half an hour the hole was large enough, and so much the better for us that it was, for I should have had great difficulty making it any bigger. Knots to left, right, above, and below would have made it necessary for me to use a saw. The circumference of the hole was frightening, for it bristled all round with points jagged enough to tear our clothes and lacerate our skins. It was five feet up; under it I set a stool, onto which the monk climbed. He put his joined arms and his head into the hole, and I, standing behind him on another stool and taking him first by the thighs and then by the legs, managed to push him out into a dense darkness; but I did not care how dark it was, for I knew the place. When my companion was out, I threw him all my belongings, leaving nothing but the ropes in the chancellery.

I then set two stools side by side below the hole, and adding a third on top of them I climbed up on it; in this way the hole was opposite my thighs. I pushed myself into it up to the lower part of my abdomen with considerable difficulty and lacerating myself, for it was narrow; then, having no one behind to help me get farther, I told the monk to take me around the chest and pull me through without mercy and even in pieces if necessary. He obeyed my order, and I silently bore all the pain which my badly scratched flanks and thighs caused me.

As soon as I was out I quickly gathered up my clothes, went down two stairways, and had no difficulty in opening the door onto the passage in which is the great door to the Royal Stairs[10] and, beside it, the office of the Savio alla Scrittura.[11] The great door was locked, as was the one to the Hall of the Four Doors.[12] The door to the stairs was as big as a city gate; it took only a glance to show me that without a ram or a petard it was inviolable; at that moment my bolt seemed to be saying to me: "Hic fines posuit ['Here he has set the bounds'];[13] you have no more use for me." Precious instrument of my freedom, worthy to be hung ex voto on the altar of my tutelary divinity! Serene and calm, I sat down, saying to the monk that my work was ended and it was now for God or Fortune to do the rest:

> Abbia chi regge il ciel cura del resto
> O la Fortuna se non tocca a lui.
>
> ("Let him who rules the heavens see to the rest, or Fortune if it is not his concern.")[14]

"I do not know," I said, "if the palace sweepers will come here today, which is All Saints' Day, or tomorrow, All Souls' Day. If anyone comes I will run out as soon as I see the door opened, and do you follow in my tracks; but if no one comes I will not stir from here; and if I die of hunger I don't know what I can do about it."

At these words the poor man became furious. He called me a madman, desperate, a deceiver, a liar, and I know not what else. My patience was heroic. Thirteen o'clock[15] struck. From the moment I awoke in the loft under the dormer until that moment, only an hour had passed. The important thing which now occupied me was changing all my clothes. Father Balbi looked like a peasant, but he was unscathed: he was neither in rags nor bleeding; his red flannel vest and his violet leather breeches were not torn. But my figure inspired pity and horror. I was torn and scratched from head to foot and covered with blood. When I pulled my silk stockings off of two wounds I had, one on each knee, they both bled. The gutter and the lead plates had put me in this state. The hole in the chancellery door had torn my vest, my shirt, my breeches, my hips, and my thighs; I had terrible scratches everywhere. I ripped up some handkerchiefs and made such bandages as I could, tying them on with string, of which I had a ball in my pocket. I put on my fine coat, which on that cold day became laughable; I dressed my hair as well as I could and tied it up in the net; and, having no others, I put on white stockings, a shirt trimmed with lace, and put two more shirts, handkerchiefs, and stockings in my pocket, and I threw my breeches, my torn shirt, and everything else behind an armchair. I put my fine cloak on the monk's shoulders, which made him appear to have stolen it. I had the look of a man who, after attending a ball, has gone to some place of ill fame and there been roughed up. The bandages visible on my knees were the only thing which marred the elegance of my attire.

Thus decked out and wearing my fine hat trimmed with gold Spanish lace and a plume, I opened a window. My presence was at once noticed by some idlers in the palace courtyard, who, not understanding how a person of my appearance could be at that window at such an early hour, went and told the man who had the key to the place. Thinking he might have locked someone in the evening before without noticing it, he fetched his keys and came. I did not learn this until I was in Paris five or six months later.

Sorry that I had shown myself at the window, I sat down beside the monk, who was proceeding to treat me to some untimely remarks when I heard the sound of keys and of someone coming up the Royal Stairs. In the greatest perturbation I get up, I look through a crack in the great door, and I see a man alone,[16] wearing a black wig and no hat, calmly coming up carrying a bunch of keys in both hands. I told the monk in the most impressive tone not to open his mouth, to stand behind me, and follow me. I took hold of my pike, keeping it concealed under my coat, and I stationed myself by the door in such a position that, as soon as it was opened, I could start down the stairs. I prayed to God that the man would offer no resistance, for, otherwise, I should have to cut his throat. I was resolved to do it.

As soon as the door opened I saw that he was as if turned to stone by my appearance. Never pausing or saying a word to him, I went down as fast as I could, followed by the monk. Neither dawdling nor running, I took the magnificent "Stairway of the Giants," as it is called, disregarding the voice of Father Balbi who followed me repeating over and over:

"Let us go to the church!"

The door to the church was on the right, twenty paces beyond the stairs.

The churches of Venice do not enjoy the slightest immunity as asylums for any wrongdoer, be his offense criminal or civil; so no one goes there any more to stave off the constables who have a warrant to capture him. The monk knew this; but his knowledge was not enough to overcome the temptation. He told me afterward that what prompted him to take refuge at the altar was a religious feeling which I ought to respect.

"Why didn't you go by yourself?"

"Because I did not have the heart to abandon you."

The immunity I sought was beyond the boundaries of the Most Serene Republic;[17] I was already beginning even then to make my way to it; I was there in spirit, and I had to get my body there. I went straight to the Porta della Carta,[18] which is the royal entrance to the Doge's Palace; and looking at no one (a way to avoid being looked at), I crossed the Piazzetta, reached the quay, and got into the first gondola I found there, saying loudly to the gondolier on the poop:

"I want to go to Fusina, call another man quickly."

The other man came on board at once; I drop nonchalantly onto the cushion in the middle, the monk sits down on the bench, and the gondola at once leaves the quay. The person of the hatless monk wrapped in my cloak contributed not a little to my being taken for a charlatan or an astrologer.

No sooner had we rounded the Customs House[19] than my gondoliers began vigorously cutting through the waters of the great Giudecca Canal, which has to be traversed to reach either Fusina or Mestre, the place to which I really wanted to go. When I saw that we were halfway down the canal, I said to the gondolier on the poop:

"Do you think we shall be at Mestre before fourteen o'clock?"

"You told me to go to Fusina."

"You are mad; I said Mestre."

The other gondolier said I was wrong; and Father Balbi, as a good Christian zealous for the truth, told me I was wrong too. I then laughed, admitting that I might have made a mistake but that I had intended to say "to Mestre." No one answered. My gondolier said that he was ready to take me to England.

"We shall be at Mestre," he said, "in three quarters of an hour, for we have the current and the wind in our favor."

I then turned and looked down the splendid canal; and seeing not a single boat and admiring the most beautiful day one could hope for, the first rays of a magnificent sun just rising above the horizon, the two young gondoliers rowing at top speed, and thinking at the same time of the cruel night I had spent, of the place where I had been the day before, and of all the coincidences which had been favorable to me, feeling took possession of my soul, which rose up to a merciful God, setting the springs of my gratitude in motion, touching me with extraordinary power and so profoundly that my tears suddenly found fullest vent to relieve my heart, which was choking from excess of joy; I sobbed, I cried like a child forced to go to school.

My charming companion, who until then had not spoken except to side with the gondoliers, thought it his duty to calm my tears, of whose noble source he was unaware; and the way he went about it did indeed make me pass in an instant from tears to a laugh so strange that, baffled by it, he confessed to me some days later that he thought I had gone mad. The monk was stupid, and his malice came from his stupidity. I saw that I was in the difficult position of having to turn it to advantage; but he came very near to being my ruin, though unintentionally, because he was stupid. He would never believe that I had ordered the gondoliers to go to Fusina when I intended to go to Mestre; he said that the idea could not have come to me until I was on the Grand Canal.

We reached Mestre. I found no horses at the posthouse; but at the Osteria della Campana[20] there were plenty of vetturini, who serve as well as the post. I went into the stable, and seeing that the horses were good I agreed to give the vetturino what he asked to be at Treviso in an hour and a quarter. Within three minutes the horses were put in, and supposing that Father Balbi was behind me, I turned to say "Get in—"

But I did not see him. I look about, I ask where he is, nobody knows. I tell the stableboy to go and look for him, determined to reprimand him even if he had gone to attend to his natural needs; for we were under the necessity of putting that off too. I am told that he is not to be found. I was like a soul in torment. I think of leaving by myself, it was the thing to do; but I listen to a weak feeling instead of to my strong reason, and I run out. I ask for him, everyone says he has been seen but no one can tell me where he may have gone; I search the arcades of the principal street, it occurs to me to stick my head into a coffeehouse, and there I see him, standing at the counter drinking chocolate and talking with the waitress. He sees me, he says she is charming and urges me to drink a cup of chocolate too; he says I must pay, for he has no money. I control myself and answer that I do not want any, telling him to hurry and gripping his arm so hard he thought I had broken it. I paid, he followed me. I was shaking with anger. I start off toward the carriage, which is waiting for me at the door of the inn; but I have scarcely taken ten steps before I meet a citizen of Mestre named Balbo Tomasi, a good man but who had the reputation of being a spy for the tribunal of the Inquisitors. He sees me, he comes up, and he exclaims:

"You here, Signore! I am delighted to see you. So you have just escaped. How did you manage it?"

"I did not escape, Signore, I was set free."

"That is impossible, for I was at the Grimani palace in San Polo last evening and I should have heard of it."

The reader can imagine the state of my soul at that moment: here I was, discovered by a man who I believed had been hired to have me arrested, which he could do by merely winking at the first sbirro, of which Mestre was full. I told him to speak in a whisper and to follow me behind the inn. He came, and when I saw that we were out of anyone's sight and that I was close to a little ditch beyond which there was nothing but open country, I put my right hand on my pike and my left on his collar; but he nimbly escaped me, jumped the ditch, and began running as fast as he could away from the city of Mestre, turning every now and again to kiss his hand to me by way of saying: "A good journey to you, have no fear!" I lost sight of him; and I thanked God that the man's being able to escape from my hands had prevented me from committing a crime, for I was on the verge of cutting his throat and he had no evil intentions. My situation was dreadful. I was alone, and at open war with all the forces of the Republic. I had to sacrifice everything to foresight and caution. I put my pike back in my pocket.

In all the dejection of a man who has just escaped from a great danger, I cast a look of scorn on the base coward who had seen to what a pass he had brought me, and I got into the carriage. He sat down beside me and never dared to say a word. I thought of how I could rid myself of the wretch. We reached Treviso, where I ordered the post master to have two horses ready to leave at seventeen o'clock;[21] but I did not intend to continue my journey by the post—first because I had no money, and second because I feared I should be followed. The innkeeper asked me if I wanted breakfast, and I needed it to stay alive, for I was dying of inanition; but I did not have the courage to say yes. A quarter of an hour lost could be fatal to me. I dreaded being caught and feeling ashamed of it all the rest of my life, for a man with his wits about him and a clear field should be able to defy four hundred thousand men to find him. If he does not know how to hide, he is a fool.

I went out by the San Tomasso[22] gate like a man who is going for a stroll, and after walking a mile along the highroad I made off into the fields, not intending to leave them until I was out of the Venetian State. The shortest road out of it was by way of Bassano, but I took the longest because there might be men waiting for me at the nearest point of exit and I was sure that no one would suppose that, to leave the State, I would take the road to Feltre, which was the longest way round to reach the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Trento.

After walking for three hours I sank onto the hard ground, absolutely at the end of my strength. I either had to take some nourishment or prepare to die there. I told the monk to put the cloak beside me and to go to a farmhouse which I saw and buy something to eat and bring it all to me where I was. I gave him money enough. After saying he thought I had more courage, he went off on my errand. The wretch was stronger than I was. He had not slept; but he had eaten well the day before, he had drunk a cup of chocolate, he was thin, caution and honor were not harrowing his soul, and he was a monk.

Though the house was not an inn the farmer's kindly wife sent me a peasant girl with an adequate dinner, which cost me only thirty soldi. When I felt sleep about to overtake me I started off again, with a good sense of my direction. Four hours later I stopped behind a village and learned that I was twenty-four miles[23] from Treviso. I was done in; my ankles were swollen and my shoes broken. Daylight would end in an hour. I lay down in the middle of a clump of trees and made the monk sit down beside me.

"We must go," I said, "to Borgo di Valsugana,[24] the first town beyond the borders of the Venetian State. We shall be as safe there as in London, and we will rest, but to reach the town, which belongs to the Prince-Bishop of Trento, we must take some unavoidable precautions, the first of which is that we must separate. You will go by way of the forest of Mantello,[25] I through the mountains, you by the easiest and shortest way, I by the hardest and longest, you with money, I without a soldo. I make you a present of my cloak, which you will exchange for a cape and a hat, and then everyone will take you for a peasant, for fortunately you have the look of one. Here is all the money I have left from the two zecchini I got from Count Asquin, it comes to seventeen lire, take them; you will be at Borgo tomorrow evening, and I twenty-four hours later. You will wait for me at the first inn on the left. I need to sleep in a good bed tonight, and Providence will show me the way to one, but I need to be in it peacefully, and with you I cannot be at peace. I am sure that we are now being searched for everywhere and that our descriptions have been circulated so accurately that we should be arrested at any inn which we dared to enter together. You see my deplorable condition and my absolute need to rest for ten hours. So farewell. Go, and leave me to set about finding myself a refuge somewhere nearby.''

''I was already expecting,'' he replied, ''all that you have just said to me; but my only answer is to remind you of what you promised me when I let you persuade me to break open your cell. You promised that we would never separate; so do not hope that I will leave you, your fate shall be mine and mine shall be yours. We will find a good refuge for our money and we will not go to inns; we will not be arrested.''

''So you are determined not to follow the good advice I have given you.''

''Absolutely determined.''

''We shall see.''

So saying I got up, not without effort; I took his measure and marked it out on the ground, then I drew the pike from my pocket, lay down on my left side, and began to make a small excavation, maintaining the utmost calm and answering not a word to all the questions he asked me. After working for a quarter of an hour I looked at him sadly and said that, as a Christian, I considered it my duty to warn him that he should commend his soul to God.

''For,'' I said, ''I am going to bury you alive in this hole, and if you are stronger than I am, you shall bury me in it. This is the only course which your brute stubbornness leaves open to me. However, you can run away if you choose, for I will not run after you.''

Seeing that he did not answer I went on working. I began to fear that the sorry beast, of whom I was determined to rid myself, would drive me to extremes.

Finally, whether deliberately or in terror, he came hurtling toward me. Not knowing his intention, I advanced the point of the pike; but there was nothing to fear. He said that he would do everything I wished. I then embraced him; I gave him all the money I had, and I repeated my promise to join him at Borgo. Though left without a soldo, and having two rivers to cross, I heartily congratulated myself on having been able to shake off the burden of such a man's company. With that done, I was certain that I should succeed in getting out of the State.

Volume Five

CHAPTER I

I go to lodge in the house of the chief of the sbirri. I spend a delicious night there and completely recover my strength and health. I go to mass; untoward meeting. Violent means I am forced to employ to obtain six zecchini. I am out of danger. My arrival in Munich. What happens to Balbi. I leave for Paris. My arrival in that city; attempt on the life of Louis XV.

ON A hill some fifty paces away I noticed a shepherd driving a flock of ten or twelve sheep, and I went to him for the information I needed. I asked him what the village was called, and he answered that I was in Valdobbiâdene,[1] which surprised me because of the distance I had covered. I asked him the names of the owners of five or six houses I saw in the distance and nearby, and I found that all those whom he named were known to me but were people to whom I must not bring trouble by appearing at their houses. I saw a palace belonging to the Grimanis, in which the head of the family, then a State Inquisitor,[2] was no doubt residing, so I must not show my face there.

I asked the shepherd who was the owner of a red house I saw at some distance, and I was very much surprised when I learned that it belonged to the so-called Capitano della Campagna, who is the chief of the sbirri. I said good-by to the peasant and mechanically walked down the hill. It is inconceivable that I went to that terrible house, which both reason and nature told me to shun. I went straight to it, and I know for a fact that I did not go to it on purpose. If it is true that we all have a beneficent invisible being who guides us aright,* as happened, though rarely, to Socrates, I must believe that what made me go there was such a being. I admit that in all my life I never took so daring a step.

I enter the house with no hesitation and even with no sign of embarrassment. In the courtyard I see a little boy playing with a top; I ask him where his father is; and instead of answering he goes for his mother. In a moment I see a very pretty pregnant woman, who asks me most politely what I want with her husband, who is not there.

"I am as sorry that my fellow sponsor is not at home as I am glad to make the acquaintance of his beautiful wife."

"Your fellow sponsor? Then am I not speaking to His Excellency Vitturi?[4] He told me that you have been so good as to promise him you would stand sponsor to the child which you see I am carrying. I am most happy to make your acquaintance, and my husband will be very much disappointed that he was not at home."

"I hope he will not be long in coming, since I want to ask him to favor me with a bed for tonight. I dare not go anywhere in the condition you see me in."

"You shall have a bed even so, and a decent supper, and my husband will call on you when he gets back, to thank you for the honor you have done us. He left an hour ago on horseback with all his men, I do not expect him home again for three or four days."

---

* Saepe revocans raro impellens. (C.'s note in the margin.)[3]

"Why will he stay away so long?"

"Haven't you heard that two prisoners have escaped from the Leads? One is a patrician and the other a person named Casanova. He received a letter from Messer Grande ordering him to search for them; if he finds them he will take them to Venice, and if he doesn't he will come home; but he will look for them for at least three days."

"I am very sorry to hear it, my dear fellow sponsor; but I would not wish to put you to any trouble, and the more so since I want to go to bed at once."

"You shall do so, and my mother will wait on you. What is the matter with your knees?"

"I had a fall hunting on the mountain; they are bad scrapes, and I have lost blood."

"Poor gentleman! But my mother will look after you."

She called her, and after telling her everything I needed she left. The pretty constable's wife had not learned much of the trade, for nothing could seem more like a fairy tale than the story I told her. Hunting in a taffeta coat! On horseback in white stockings! Without a cloak or a servant! When her husband came back he would laugh at her. Her mother looked after me with all the courtesy I could have expected among people of the greatest distinction. She treated me like a mother and always addressed me as "son" while she was dressing my wounds. If my soul had been at peace I should have given her unmistakable proof of my own courtesy and my gratitude; but the place where I was and the dangerous role I was playing preoccupied me too gravely.

After examining my knees and my thighs she said I would have to bear a little pain but that in the morning I would be cured; I had only to see that the wet napkins she put on my wounds stayed there all night and to sleep without moving. I ate a good supper and then surrendered to her ministrations; I fell asleep while she was working on me, for I do not remember having seen her leave; she must have undressed me as if I were a child; I said nothing and thought nothing. I ate to supply my want of food, and I fell asleep yielding to a need which I could not resist. I had no consciousness of anything which required the exercise of reason. It was the first hour of night when I fell asleep, and when I woke in the morning to hear the clock striking thirteen[5] I thought I was under a spell, for I felt as if I had only just fallen asleep. It took me more than five minutes to return to my senses, to summon my mind back to its proper functions, to convince myself that my situation was real, and, in a word, to pass from sleep to real waking; but as soon as I came to myself I quickly got rid of the napkins, amazed to see that my wounds were perfectly dry. I dressed in less than four minutes, I put my hair in a bag without help, and I left my room, which was wide open; I went down the stairs, crossed the courtyard, and walked away from the house, paying no attention to two men who were standing there and who could be nothing but sbirri. I left a place where I had found courtesy, good food, health, and the complete recovery of my strength, with a feeling of horror which made me tremble, for I saw that I had most imprudently exposed myself to the most obvious of dangers. I was amazed that I had entered the house and even more amazed that I had been able to leave it, and I thought it impossible that I was not being followed. I walked for five hours on end through woods and over mountains, meeting no one but a few peasants and never looking back.

It was not yet noon when, still walking on, I heard a bell ringing. Looking down from the height on which I was, I saw the little church from which the sound came, and, seeing people going in, I thought it must be a mass; and I suddenly wanted to hear it. When a man is in distress, whatever comes into his mind seems an inspiration. It was All Souls' Day. I go down, I enter the church, and I am surprised to see Signor Marcantonio Grimani,[6] the nephew of the State Inquisitor, with his wife Signora Maria Pisani. I saw that they were astonished. I bowed to them and I heard the mass. When I left the church the Signore followed me, the Signora remained inside. He approaches me and says:

"What are you doing here? Where is your companion?"

"I gave him seventeen lire[7] I had so that he could get away in another direction which is easier, while I am making for the border this way, which is more difficult, and I haven't a soldo. If Your Excellency would be so good as to give me some assistance, I could manage better."

"I cannot give you anything; but you will find some monks who will not let you die of hunger. But tell me how you succeeded in breaking through the Leads."

"It is an interesting story, but a very long one; and meanwhile the hermits may have eaten everything up."

So saying, I bowed to him. Despite my extreme need his refusal to give me anything pleased me. I felt I was much more of a gentleman than the Signore. I learned in Paris that when his wife heard of it she reproached him in strong terms. There is no doubt that right feelings are found in women more often than in men.

I walked until sunset, when, tired and starving, I stopped at a solitary house which looked promising. I asked to speak to the owner, and the caretaker's wife told me he had gone to a wedding on the other side of the river[8] and would spend the night there, but that she had orders to welcome his friends. So she gave me an excellent supper and a very good bed. I discovered from the addresses on a number of letters that I was in the house of Signor Rombenchi,[9] consul of I forget what country. I wrote to him, and I left my sealed letter there. After a good sleep I dressed quickly, I crossed the river by promising to pay on my return, and after walking for five hours I dined at a Capuchin[10] monastery. After dinner I walked on until twenty-two o'clock[11] to reach a house the owner of which was a friend of mine. I had learned this from a peasant. I go in, I ask if the master is at home, and I am shown to the door of a room in which he was sitting alone, busily writing. I run to embrace him; but as soon as he sees me he draws back and tells me to leave instantly, giving all sorts of shallow and insulting reasons. I explain my situation to him and my need, and I ask him for sixty zecchini[12] against my note, assuring him that Signor Bragadin will send them to him, and he answers that he cannot help me or even offer me a glass of water, since the sight of me in his house set him shaking with fear that he would incur the displeasure of the Tribunal. He was a man of sixty, a broker on the Exchange, and under obligations to me. His heartless refusal had a different effect on me from Signor Grimani's. Whether from anger or indignation or prompted by the claims of reason or the law of nature, I took him by the collar, advancing my pike toward him and threatening him with death if he raised his voice. Shaking all over, he took a key from his pocket and, pointing to a desk, said that there was money in it and that I had only to take what I wanted, but I told him to open it himself. He did so and opened a drawer in which were gold pieces; I told him to count me out six zecchini.

"You asked for sixty."

"Yes, when I asked them from friendship; but from violence I accept only six, and I will not write you a note. They will be returned to you in Venice, to which I will send an account tomorrow of what you have forced me to do, you coward too base to live."

"Forgive me, I implore you; take it all."

"No. I am going, and I advise you to let me go quietly, or expect that I will come back and set your house on fire."

I walked for two hours and, seeing night falling, I stopped at a peasant's house, where, after eating a wretched supper, I slept on straw. In the morning I bought an old redingote, and I mounted a donkey after buying a pair of boots near Feltre. It was in this style that I passed the shanty known as "La Scala."[13] A guard who was there did not even ask my name. I took a two-horse cart and arrived early at Borgo di Valsugana,[14] where I found the inn for which I had given Father Balbi directions. If he had not come up to me I should not have recognized him. A green redingote and a hat worn with the brim turned down over a cotton cap disguised him completely. He told me that a farmer had given them to him in exchange for his cloak, with a zecchino to boot, and that he had arrived there that morning and had been well treated. He ended his story most generously by saying that he was not expecting me because he had not supposed I had intended to keep my promise to him. I spent the whole of the following day at the inn, never leaving my bed and writing more than twenty letters to Venice, ten or twelve of them circular letters in which I told what I had had to do to obtain six zecchini. The monk wrote impertinent letters to Father Barbarigo, his Superior, and to his patrician brothers, and love letters to the servant girls who had caused his ruin. I took the lace off my coat and sold my hat, for their richness made me too conspicuous.

The next day I slept at Pergine,[15] where a young Count d'Alberg[16] came to see me, having learned—though I never found out how—that we were escaping from the State of Venice. I went on to Trento and from there to Bolzano, where, needing money for a change of clothes and some shirts, I called on an old banker named Mench,[17] who gave me a reliable man whom I sent to Venice with a letter to Signor Bragadin, who accredited it. The banker Mench put me up at an inn where I spent all the six days which the man took to go and come back. He came back with a bill of exchange for a hundred zecchini, drawn on Mench. With the money I bought a change of clothes; but first I did the same for my accomplice, who every day gave me some new reason to find his company intolerable. He said that without him I would never have escaped and that by virtue of my promise I owed him half of whatever wealth I might come to possess. He was in love with all the servant girls, and since he had neither the figure nor the face to make them kind and submissive, they received his approaches by giving him hearty slaps, which he received with exemplary patience. It was my only amusement.

We had taken the post, and on the third day we arrived in Munich.[18] I went to lodge at the "Stag,"[19] where I immediately learned that two young Venetian friars, of the Contarini family, had been there for some time with Count Pompei of Verona; but not having the honor of their acquaintance and no longer needing to find monks in order to live, I did not trouble to make my bow to them. I went and made it to Countess Coronini,[20] whom I had met in Venice at the Convent of Santa Giustina[21] and who was highly regarded at Court.

The illustrious lady, who was then seventy, received me very well and promised that she would immediately apply to the Elector[22] to have me granted asylum. The next morning, after keeping her promise, she told me that the sovereign had no reservations about me and that I could consider myself safe in Munich and anywhere in Bavaria, but that there was no safety for Father Balbi, who, as a Somaschian and a fugitive, could be claimed by the Somaschians[23] of Munich, and that the Elector did not want to have any difficulties with monks. So the Countess advised me to get him out of the city as soon as possible to rehabilitate himself elsewhere and thus avoid any trouble which his fellow monks might be preparing for him.

Feeling that both conscience and honor obliged me to look after the wretch, I went to the Elector's confessor[24] and asked him for a letter of recommendation for the monk to some town in Swabia. The confessor, who was a Jesuit, received me as badly as possible. He said in passing that my reputation was well known in Munich. I asked him firmly if he was telling me this as good news or bad, and he did not answer. He simply walked away, and a priest told me that he had gone to verify a miracle of which all Munich was talking.

"The Empress,"[25] he said, "the widow of Charles VII, whose body is still exposed to public view, has warm feet though she is dead."

He said that I could go and see the wonder for myself. Most eager to be able to boast at last that I had witnessed a miracle, and one which was of the greatest interest to me since my feet were always icy, I go to see the illustrious corpse, which did indeed have warm feet, but it was because of a hot stove[26] which stood very near her defunct Imperial Majesty. A dancer who was there and who knew me quite well came up and congratulated me on my good fortune, which was already being talked of throughout the city. The dancer invited me to dinner and I accepted; his name was Michele dall'Agata,[27] and his wife was the same Gardela[28] whom, sixteen years earlier, I had known in the house of old Malipiero[29] who had hit me with his cane because I was fooling with Teresa.[30] La Gardela, who had become a celebrated dancer and was still very pretty, was delighted to see me and to hear the whole story of my escape from my own lips. She wanted to do something for the monk, and she offered me a letter of recommendation for Augsburg addressed to Canon Bassi, of Bologna, her friend and Dean of the Chapter of St. Moritz.[31] She wrote the letter then and there and, as she handed it to me, assured me I need no longer be concerned for the monk, for she was certain that the Dean would take care of him and even patch things up for him in Venice.

Delighted to get rid of him in such an honorable way, I run to the inn, I tell him the story, and I hand him the letter, and I promise not to abandon him if the Dean does not give him a good reception. I sent him off at daybreak the next morning in a good carriage.

He wrote me four days later that the Dean could not have received him more cordially, had put him up in his own house, had outfitted him as an abbé, had presented him to the Prince-Bishop, who was a Darmstadt,[32] and had persuaded the city to grant him asylum. In addition the Dean had promised to keep him in his house until he had obtained his secularization into the priesthood from Rome, together with freedom to return to Venice, for as soon as he was no longer a monk he ceased to be guilty before the Tribunal of the State Inquisitors. Father Balbi ended his letter by asking me to send him a few zecchini for pocket money, for he was too much of a gentleman, he said, to ask money from the Dean, who was not gentleman enough to offer him any. I did not answer him.

Left alone and in peace, I turned to recovering my health, for the fatigue and the sufferings I had undergone had given me nervous spasms, which might become very serious. In less than three weeks a good diet restored me to perfect health. During these days Madame Rivière[33] came from Dresden with her son and her two daughters, the elder[34] of whom she was taking to Paris to be married. Her son had finished his studies and was highly accomplished in every way, and her elder daughter, whom she was going to marry to an actor, combined the prettiest figure possible with a talent for dancing; she played the harpsichord perfectly and she possessed the social graces together with all the charms of youth. The whole family was delighted to see me, and I thought myself most fortunate when, anticipating my wish, Madame Rivière gave me to understand that she would welcome my company as far as Paris. There was no question of asking me to pay my share, and I had to accept the gift as it was given. Since my plan was to establish myself in Paris, I took this intervention of Fortune as a prophecy that success awaited me in the career of adventurer on which I was about to embark in the only city in the universe in which the Blind Goddess dispensed her favors to those who trusted in her completely. I was not mistaken, as the reader will see at the proper time and place; but Fortune's bounty was of no use to me, I spoiled everything by my thoughtless behavior. Fifteen months of the Leads gave me time to learn all the defects of my character; but I should have had to stay there longer to adopt principles which would remedy them.

Madame Rivière very much wanted me to go with her, but she could not put off her departure, and I had to wait for an answer from Venice and for money, which, however, could not be long in coming. Having made sure that she would spend a week in Strassburg, I felt confident that I would catch up with her, and I saw her leave Munich on December 18th.

I received the bill of exchange I was expecting from Venice two days after her departure, I paid my small debts, and I at once set out for Augsburg, not so much to see Father Balbi as to meet the worthy Dean Bassi, whose treatment of him had been princely. Reaching Augsburg seven hours from the time I left Munich, I went at once to call on the Dean. He was not at home; I found Father Balbi, dressed as an abbé, bareheaded, and with hair powdered, which made his skin look even darker. Not yet forty, the man was not only ugly but had a cast of countenance which indicated baseness, cowardice, insolence, and stupid malice. I saw that he was well lodged and well served and had books and all the requisites for writing; I congratulated him, I told him he was fortunate and I no less fortunate in having been able to procure him all these advantages together with the expectation of soon becoming a secular priest. Far from thanking me, he said I had got rid of him, and when he learned that I was going to Paris he said he would much rather go with me, since in Augsburg he was bored to death.

"What do you expect to do in Paris?"

"What will you do there yourself?"

"I will turn my talents to account."

"So will I mine."

"Then you have no need of me. Go there yourself. The people who are taking me there might not want my company if I had you with me."

"You promised not to abandon me."

"Do you call it abandoning someone to leave him with everything he needs?"

"Everything? I haven't a soldo."

"You don't need money. And if you think you need some for your pleasures, ask your brothers[35] for it."

"They haven't any."

"Your friends, then."

"I have no friends."

"So much the worse for you; it is proof that you have never been a friend to anyone."

"You will let me have a few zecchini."

"Wait for the Dean; he will be back tomorrow. Talk to him, persuade him to lend me money. Tell him I will return it to him."

"I will not wait, for I am leaving at once and I should never be so imprudent as to tell him to give you money."

After this acid dialogue I left him; I went to the post, and I set out, very ill pleased to have brought such good luck to a man who did not deserve it. At the end of March in Paris I received a letter from the generous and honorable Dean Bassi in which he told me that Father Balbi had absconded from his house with one of his maidservants, taking a sum of money, a gold watch, and twelve silver table services; he did not know where he had gone.

Toward the end of the year I learned that he had gone with the Dean's maid to Coire, the capital of Grisons, where he asked to be accepted into the Calvinist church and to be recognized as the legal husband of the lady who accompanied him, but when it was discovered that he was incapable of earning his living he was turned away. When he came to the end of his money the maid whom he had deceived left him after giving him several beatings. Not knowing where to turn or how to earn money, Father Balbi then decided to go to Brescia, a city belonging to the Republic,[36] where he went to the Governor, informed him of his name, his escape, and his repentance, and asked him to take him under his protection and secure his pardon. The Governor's protection began by clapping the stupid petitioner into jail, then he wrote to the Tribunal, asking what to do with him; pursuant to the orders he received he sent him in chains to Messer Grande,[37] who delivered him to the Tribunal, who sent him back to the Leads, where he did not find Count Asquin, who, in pity for his age, had been sent to "the Four"[38] three months after my escape. I learned five or six years later that the Tribunal, after keeping Father Balbi under the Leads for two years, had sent him to his monastery, where his Superior had packed him off to the monastery of the Order near Feltre, which was built on a hill; but Father Balbi remained there only six months. He escaped, went to Rome, and threw himself at the feet of the Rezzonico[39] who was then Pope, who absolved him from his monastic vows, and he then went back to his native country as a priest, where he led a miserable life because he could never behave himself. He died in poverty in the year 1785.

At the "Spirit"[40] in Strassburg I rejoined Madame Rivière and her charming family; she received me with tokens of unfeigned pleasure. We spent several days there and left for Paris in a good berlin, in which I thought I should do my share by keeping the company in perpetual high spirits. Mademoiselle Rivière's charms ravished my soul, but I was in a humiliating position and I should have considered that I was failing in respect to her mother and in what I owed to my situation if I had shown the least sign of any amorous inclination. Although too young for it, I enjoyed playing the role of father and attending to all the things which must be done if a party is to travel comfortably and spend its nights in good beds.

So we reached Paris on the morning of January 5, 1757, which was a Wednesday, and I got out at the house of my friend Balletti,[41] who welcomed me with open arms, assuring me that though I had not written to him he was expecting me, for since my escape necessarily entailed my leaving Venice and even being exiled, he could not imagine that I would choose any other place to stay in than a city in which I had spent two years enjoying all the pleasures of life. Joy reigned in the house as soon as my arrival was known; and I embraced his father and mother, whom I found treating me just as they had done when I left in 1752. But what struck me was Mademoiselle Balletti, my friend's sister. She was fifteen years old[42] and had become very pretty; her mother's teaching had given her everything that a fond and highly intelligent mother can give her daughter in the way of talents, graces, good behavior, and knowledge of society. After renting a room in the same street,[43] I set off for the Hôtel de Bourbon[44] to call on the Abbé de Bernis, who was the head[45] of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and I had good reason to hope that he would put me on the road to fortune. I go there, I am told that he is at Versailles; impatient to see him, I go to the Pont Royal,[46] I take the kind of carriage called a "chamber pot,"[47] and I reach Versailles at half past six. Learning that he had gone back to Paris with the Count of Cantillana,[48] the Neapolitan Ambassador, I had no choice but to do likewise. So I go back in the same carriage; but scarcely have I reached the gate before I see a great crowd running in all directions in the utmost confusion, and I hear people crying to right and left:

"The King has been assassinated, His Majesty has just been killed."

My terrified coachman thinks only of going on; but my carriage is stopped, I am ordered out of it and put in the guardhouse, where in three or four minutes I see more than a score of people arrested, all just as astonished and just as guilty as I am. I did not know what to think, and since I do not believe in witchcraft I believed I was dreaming. There we were, looking at each other and not daring to speak; surprise overpowered us, and every one of us, though innocent, was afraid.

But four or five minutes later an officer came in and, after begging our pardons most politely, said that we could leave.

"The King," he said, "is wounded and has been carried to his apartment. The assassin,[49] whom no one knows, has been arrested. Monsieur de la Martinière[50] is being looked for everywhere."

No sooner was I back in my carriage, and very glad to be there, than a well-dressed young man with a face which speaks eloquently in his favor asks me to take him with me, on condition that he pay his half; but despite the laws of politeness I refuse to do him the service. There are moments when one must not be polite.

During the three hours it took me to get back to Paris, for ‘‘chamber pots’’ travel very slowly, at least two hundred couriers passed me at full gallop. I saw another every minute, and each courier was shouting the news he carried to the four winds. The first few said what I knew; a quarter of an hour later I learned that the King had been bled, then I learned that the wound was not mortal, and an hour later that the wound was so slight that His Majesty could even go to Trianon if he wished.

Bearing this interesting news I went to Silvia's, where I found the whole family at table, for it was not yet eleven o'clock. I enter, and I find everyone in consternation.

‘‘I have just this moment come,’’ I said, ‘‘from Versailles.’’

‘‘The King has been assassinated.’’

‘‘Not at all; he could go to Trianon if he wished. Monsieur de la Martinière has bled him, the assassin has been arrested, and he will be burned after being drawn and quartered alive.’’

At the news, which Silvia's servants immediately spread, all the neighbors came in to hear me tell the story, and it was to me that the whole neighborhood owed sleeping well that night. In those days the French imagined that they loved their King, and they went through all the motions of it; today we have come to know them somewhat better. But at bottom the French are always the same. By its very nature their nation is always in a state of eruption; there is no reality among them, everything is mere appearance. It is a vessel which only asks to move and which demands wind, and whatever wind may be blowing is good. And in fact the arms of Paris display a ship.

CHAPTER II

The Minister of Foreign Affairs. Monsieur de Boulogne, the Comptroller-General. The Duke of Choiseul. The Abbé de Laville. Monsieur Pâris-Duverney. Establishment of the lottery. My brother comes to Paris from Dresden; he is received into the Academy of Painting.

ONCE MORE I am in the great city of Paris and, since I can no longer count on my own country, obliged to make my fortune there. I had spent two years in Paris; but since at that time my only object was to enjoy life I had not studied the city. This second time I had to pay my court to those with whom the Blind Goddess made her abode. I saw that to accomplish anything I must bring all my physical and moral faculties into play, make the acquaintance of the great and the powerful, exercise strict self-control, and play the chameleon to all those whom I should see it was my interest to please. To follow these principles I saw that I must scrupulously avoid what is known in Paris as ''dubious company'' and renounce all my old ways and any pretensions which could make me enemies who could easily give me the reputation of being a man not fit to be trusted with important business. As the result of these meditations I decided to practice a systematic reserve in both act and word which would lead to my being considered even more fit for affairs of consequence than I had any reason to suppose I was. As for living expenses, I could count on the hundred écus[1] a month which Signor Bragadin would never have failed to send me. It was enough. I had only to see that I was well dressed and decently lodged; but to begin with I needed a sum of money, for I had neither suits nor shirts.

So the next day I went back to the Palais Bourbon. Being sure that the porter would tell me the Minister was engaged, I went there with a note which I left for him. I announced my arrival and told him where I was lodging. To say more would have been to say too much. Meanwhile I found that wherever I went I had to tell the story of my escape; it was a task, for it took two hours; but I felt I must oblige those who were eager to hear it, for their eagerness could arise only from their lively interest in myself.

At supper at Silvia's I found all the evidence of friendship I could wish for, but in a calmer atmosphere than on the previous evening; and I was greatly impressed by the merits of her daughter. At the age of fifteen she had all the qualities which captivate. I congratulated her mother who had fostered them in her, and at the time I did not think of defending myself from her charms: I was not yet at ease enough to suppose that they could assail me. I left early, impatient to see what the Minister would say in reply to my note.

I received his answer at eight o'clock. He said that I would find him alone at two o'clock in the afternoon. He received me as I expected he would. He conveyed to me not only his pleasure over my triumph but all the joy which he felt in having an opportunity to be of use to me. He at once told me that as soon as he had learned of my escape by a letter from M. M. he had felt certain I would go nowhere but to Paris and that my first visit would be to him. He showed me the letter in which she[2] informed him of my arrest, and her last letter, in which she told him the story of my escape as she had heard it. She said that since she could no longer hope to see either of the two men on whom alone she could count, her life had become a burden to her. She lamented that she did not have the resource of devotion. She said that C. C. often came to see her and that she was not happy with the man who had married her.

Having looked through what M. M. wrote him about my escape and finding that all the details were wrong, I promised to send him the true story of it. He took me at my word, promising that he would send it on to our unfortunate friend and giving me a roll of a hundred louis[3] with the most perfect tact. He promised to keep me in mind and to let me know when he would need to speak to me. With the money I outfitted myself; and a week later I sent him the story of my escape, giving him permission to have it copied and to use it as he thought best to interest anyone who could be helpful to me. Three weeks later he sent for me and told me that he had spoken about me to Signor Erizzo,[4] the Venetian Ambassador, who had found nothing to say against me; but that, not wanting to compromise himself with the State Inquisitors, he would not receive me. I did not need him. He said that he had given my story to Madame la Marquise,[5] who knew me and with whom he would try to obtain me an interview, and in closing he said that when I went to see Monsieur de Choiseul,[6] I would be well received, as I would be by the Comptroller-General Monsieur de Boulogne,[7] with whom, if I used my head, I should be able to work out something substantial.

"He will himself," he said, "give you hints, and you will see that 'the man who is listened to is the man who obtains.' Try to think up some project profitable to the royal exchequer, avoiding anything complicated or chimerical, and if what you write is not too long I will give you my opinion on it.''

I left him full of gratitude, but at a loss to find a way to increase the King's revenues. Having not the faintest notion of finances, no matter how I racked my brains all the ideas which came to me were only for new taxes, and since they all struck me as odious or absurd I rejected them all.

My first visit[8] was to Monsieur de Choiseul, as soon as I learned that he was in Paris. He received me at his toilet table, where he was writing while his hair was being dressed. The courtesy he showed me was to interrupt his letter at short intervals, asking me questions, which I answered, but to no purpose, for instead of listening he went on writing. Now and again he looked at me; but that meant nothing, for the eyes see, they do not hear. Nevertheless the Duke was a man of great intelligence.

After finishing his letter he said to me in Italian that the Abbé de Bernis had told him part of the story of my escape.

''Tell me how you managed to bring it off.''

''The story, Monseigneur, takes two hours, and I have the impression that Your Excellency is in a hurry.''

''Tell it to me briefly.''

''It is the very shortest version of it which takes two hours.''

''You can tell me the details another time.''

''Without the details the story is not interesting.''

''Of course. But one can abbreviate anything as much as one wishes.''

''Very well. I will tell Your Excellency that the State Inquisitors had me imprisoned under the Leads.[9] At the end of fifteen months and five days I made a hole in the roof; I entered the Chancellery[10] through a dormer and broke open the door to it; I went down to the Piazza; I took a gondola which carried me to the mainland, whence I went to Munich. From there I came to Paris, where I have the honor to pay you my respects."

"But—what are the Leads?"

"That, Monseigneur, takes a quarter of an hour."

"How did you manage to make a hole in the roof?"

"That takes half an hour."

"Why were you imprisoned up there?"

"Another half hour."

"I think you are right. The interest of the thing is in the details. I have to go to Versailles. I should be glad to have you call on me from time to time. Meanwhile, think of how I can be of use to you."

On leaving him I went to call on Monsieur de Boulogne. I saw a man entirely different from the Duke in appearance, dress, and manner. He at once congratulated me on the interest which the Abbé de Bernis showed in me and on my financial abilities. I very nearly burst out laughing. He was with an octogenarian whose face bore the stamp of genius.

"Let me have your ideas, either by word of mouth or in writing; you will find me a good pupil and ready to grasp them. This is Monsieur Pâris-Duverney,[11] who needs twenty millions for his Military School.[12] The thing is to find them without burdening the State or embarrassing the royal treasury."

"There is only one God, Monsieur, who has the power of creation."

"I am not God," Monsieur Duverney replied, "yet I have sometimes created, but everything has changed."

"Everything," I answered, "has become more difficult, I know; nevertheless, I have a plan in mind which would yield the King the return on a hundred millions."

"And how much would such a yield cost the King?"

"Only the expense of collecting it."

"Then it is the nation which would supply the revenue?"

"Yes, but voluntarily."

"I know what you have in mind."

"I should be surprised, Monsieur, for I have imparted my idea to no one."

"If you are not otherwise engaged, come to dinner with me tomorrow, and I will show you your project, which is admirable but which is beset with almost insurmountable difficulties. Nevertheless, we will discuss it. Will you come?"

"I will do myself the honor."

"Then I will expect you. I am at Plaisance."[13]

After he left, the Comptroller-General praised his talent and his probity. He was the brother of Pâris de Montmartel,[14] whom secret history made the father of Madame de Pompadour, for he was Madame Poisson's lover at the same time as Monsieur Le Normand.[15]

I went to walk in the Tuileries, reflecting on the fantastic piece of luck which Fortune seemed to be offering me. I am told that twenty millions are needed, I boast that I can furnish a hundred millions without having any idea how to do it, and a famous man, thoroughly experienced in business, invites me to dinner to convince me that he already knows my plan. If he thinks he can worm it out of me I defy him to do it; when he has imparted his own plan to me I shall be at liberty to tell him whether he has guessed mine or not, and if the thing is within my comprehension I will perhaps say something new; if I don't understand a word of it, I will maintain a mysterious silence.

The Abbé de Bernis had described me as a financier only to get me a hearing. Otherwise, I should not have been admitted. I was sorry I did not at least know the jargon of the department. The next morning I took a hackney coach and, in low spirits, told the driver to take me to Monsieur Duverney's at Plaisance. It was a little way beyond Vincennes.

So here I am at the door of the famous man who had saved France after the crashes brought on by Law's[16] system forty years earlier. I find him with seven or eight gentlemen before a great fire. He announces me by my name, adding that I am a friend of the Minister of Foreign Affairs[17] and of the Comptroller-General. He then introduces me to his guests, giving three or four of them the title of Intendant of Finances.[18] I bow, and instantly fall to worshiping Harpocrates.[19]

After touching on the Seine, which was frozen more than a foot deep, on Monsieur de Fontenelle,[20] who had just died, on Damiens, who refused to confess anything, and on the five millions which his trial would cost the King, the conversation turned to the war and then to praise of Monsieur de Soubise,[21] whom the King had chosen as commander. This subject led to the cost of the war and to the resources for maintaining it and the country. I spent an hour and a half in boredom, for all their discussions were so stuffed with the technical terms of their profession that I understood nothing. After an hour and a half at table, where I opened my mouth only to eat, we went into a drawing room, where Monsieur Duverney left the company and took me to his study with a good-looking man of about fifty years of age whom he had presented to me by the name of Calzabigi.[22] A moment later two Intendants of Finances came in too. Smiling, Monsieur Duverney put in my hands a folio notebook, saying:

"There is your plan."

I see on the title page: "Lottery[23] of ninety lots, of which the winning lots, drawn each month at random, can only fall on five numbers," etc., etc. I hand it back to him and I do not hesitate an instant before telling him that it is my plan.

"Monsieur," he said, "you have been forestalled; the scheme is Monsieur de Calzabigi's."

"I am delighted to find that Monsieur and I think alike: but if you have not adopted it, may I ask you the reason?"

"Several very plausible arguments have been raised against the plan, and the answers to them have been indecisive."

"I know only one argument in the whole of nature," I answered coldly, "against which I could say nothing. That would be if the King would not allow his subjects to gamble."

"That argument has no bearing, the King will permit his subjects to gamble. But will they gamble?"

"I am astonished that there should be any doubt of it, if people are sure that they will be paid if they win."

"Then let us suppose that they will gamble if they are certain that there is money with which to pay. How is the money to be raised?"

"The royal treasury. A decree of the Council. It is enough if the King is believed able to pay a hundred millions."

"A hundred millions?"

"Yes, Monsieur. The thing is to dazzle."

"Then you think the King could lose them?"

"I suppose it possible; but after taking in a hundred and fifty millions. If you know the value of a political calculation, you can only start from there."

"Monsieur, I am not the only one. Will you not admit that at the very first drawing the King can lose an immense sum?"

"Between possibility and reality there is infinity; but I admit it. If the King loses a great sum at the first drawing, the success of the lottery is assured. It is a misfortune to be desired. Moral forces are calculated like probabilities. You know that all insurance companies[24] are rich. I will prove to you before all the mathematicians in Europe that, granted God is neutral, it is impossible that the King will not make a profit of one in five by this lottery. That is the secret. Will you admit that reason must yield to a mathematical proof?"

"I admit it. But tell me: why cannot the castelletto[25] guarantee the King an unfailing profit?"

"There is no castelletto in the world which can make it patently and absolutely certain that the King will always profit. The castelletto serves only to maintain a temporary balance on one number or two or three, which, being unusually overloaded, could if they came out cause the backer of the lottery a great loss. In such a case the castelletto declares the number closed. The castelletto could only make you sure of profiting by putting off the drawing until all the chances carried an equal load, and then there would be no lottery, for the drawing might not take place for ten years; and, besides that, I will tell you that under those circumstances the lottery would become a sheer fraud. What saves it from that dishonorable name is the scheduled drawing every month, for then the public is sure that the backer can lose."

"Will you be good enough to speak before the full Council?"[26]

"With pleasure."

"Will you answer all objections?"

"Every one."

"Will you bring me your scheme?"

"I will not communicate my scheme, Monsieur, until its theory is accepted and I am certain that it will be adopted and that I will receive the benefits for which I shall ask."

"But your plan can only be the same as this one."

"I doubt it. In my plan I set forth approximately how much the King will profit each year, and I prove it."

"Then it could be sold to a company which would pay the King a fixed sum."

"I beg your pardon. The lottery can prosper only under a precondition whose effect is absolutely necessary.

I would not go into it to serve a committee which, to augment the profit, would set about increasing the operations, and thereby diminish the eagerness to participate. I am sure of that. The lottery, if I am to have anything to do with it, must be royal or nothing.''

''Monsieur de Calzabigi is of the same opinion.''

''Nothing could please me better.''

''Have you capable people for the castelletto?''

''All I need is intelligent machines, of which there must be plenty in France.''

''What do you estimate the profit will be?''

''Twenty per cent at each drawing. Whoever brings the King six francs will receive five, and the crush will be so great that, caeteris paribus ['other things being equal'], the whole nation will pay the monarch at least five hundred thousand francs a month. I will prove it to the Council on condition that its members are men who, once they have recognized a truth which follows from either a scientific or a political calculation, will no longer hesitate.''

Delighted that I could keep my word in everything I had undertaken to do, I got up to go somewhere. When I came back I found them still standing discussing the matter among themselves. Calzabigi came to me and asked in a friendly tone if I included the quaterna in my plan. I answered that the public should be free to play the cinquina[27] too, but that in my plan I made the stake higher, because the player could not stake on the quaterna or the cinquina without also playing them as a terno.[28] He answered that in his plan he admitted the simple quaterna with a profit of fifty thousand for one. I mildly replied that there were very good mathematicians in France, who, when they found that all the chances did not yield equal gains, would profit from collusion. He then clasped my hand, saying that he hoped we could speak further. After giving my address to Monsieur Duverney I left at nightfall satisfied, and certain that I had left a good impression on the old man's mind.

Three or four days later Calzabigi appeared at my lodging, and I received him with the assurance that if I had not presented myself at his door it was because I had not dared. He said straightforwardly that the way I had spoken to the gentlemen had impressed them and that he felt certain that if I would apply to the Comptroller-General we would establish the lottery, which would be most profitable to us.

"I believe it," I answered; "but the profit they would draw from it themselves would be even greater; despite that, they are in no hurry; they have not sent for me, and in any case it is no longer my chief interest."

"You will hear something today. I know that Monsieur de Boulogne has spoken of you to Monsieur de Courteuil." [29]

"I assure you that I made no application to him."

He asked me most cordially to come and dine with him, and I accepted. Just as we were leaving I received a note from the Abbé de Bernis, who wrote me that if I could be at Versailles the next day he would arrange for me to speak with Madame la Marquise, and that I would find Monsieur de Boulogne there at the same time.

It was not vanity but policy which prompted me to give the note to Calzabigi to read. He said that I was in possession of everything I needed to force Duverney himself to start the lottery.

"And your fortune," he said, "is made, if you are not rich enough not to care. We have been moving heaven and earth for two years to get this project accepted, and we have never had anything for our pains but stupid objections, which you demolished last week. Your project must be very much the same as mine. We should join forces, believe me. Remember that, by yourself, you will encounter insurmountable difficulties, and that the 'intelligent machines' you need are not to be found in Paris. My brother[30] will take all the work on himself; use your powers of persuasion, and then be content to enjoy half the emoluments of the directorship while you amuse yourself."

"Then it is your brother who originated the plan."

"It is my brother. He is ill, but his mind is perfectly active. We will call on him."

I saw a man in bed covered with scab; but that did not keep him from eating with appetite, writing, conversing, and performing all the functions of a man in health. He did not appear in public because, in addition to the disfiguring scab, he had constantly to scratch some part of his body, which in Paris is an abomination which is never forgiven, whether the scratching is due to a disease or is simply a bad habit. So Calzabigi told me that he stayed where he was and saw no one because he itched all over and his only relief was to scratch.

"God," he said, "can have given me fingernails for no other purpose."

"Then you believe in final causes, and I congratulate you. Nevertheless I believe you would scratch even if God had forgotten to give you fingernails."

I saw him smile, and we discussed our business. In less than an hour I found that he was very intelligent. He was the elder brother and a bachelor. A great arithmetician, thoroughly acquainted with theoretical and practical finance, familiar with the commerce of all nations, versed in history, a wit, a worshiper of the fair sex, and a poet. He was a native of Leghorn; he had worked at Naples in the Ministry, and had come to Paris with Monsieur de l'Hôpital.[31] His brother was also very clever, but inferior to him in every respect.

He showed me a great pile of papers in which he had worked out all the details of the lottery.

"If you think," he said, "that you can do it all without needing me, I congratulate you; but you would be deluding yourself; for if you have had no practical experience and if you are without trained assistants who know what they are doing, your theory will get you nowhere. What will you do when you have obtained the decree? When you speak to the Council you would do well to set a date after which you will wash your hands of the matter. Otherwise they will keep putting you off till the Greek Kalends.[32] I can assure you that Monsieur Duverney will be very glad to see us join forces. As for the analytical relations between equal winnings from all chances, I will convince you that they should not be taken into account for the quaterna."

Thoroughly persuaded that I should join forces with them but without letting them know that I considered I should need their help, I went downstairs with his brother, who was to introduce me to his wife before dinner. I saw an old woman well known in Paris as La Générale La Mothe[33] and famous for her former beauty and her drops, another superannuated lady, known in Paris as Baroness Blanche,[34] who was still Monsieur de Vaux's[35] mistress, another who was called La Présidente,[36] and still another, pretty as an angel, who was called Madame Razzetti,[37] from Piedmont, the wife of a violinist at the Opéra and then on the best of terms not only with Monsieur de Fondpertuis,[38] Master of the Revels,[39] but also with several other gentlemen. I did not shine at dinner. It was the first I had attended with serious business on my mind. I never once spoke. That evening at Silvia's the company also thought me preoccupied, despite the love which the young daughter of the house increasingly inspired in me.

Two hours before dawn the next day I set off for Versailles, where Minister de Bernis received me banteringly, saying he would wager that, but for him, I should never have discovered that I was an expert in finance.

"Monsieur de Boulogne told me that you amazed Monsieur Duverney, who is one of the greatest men in France. Go to him at once, and pay court to him in Paris. The lottery will be established, and it is for you to profit by it. As soon as the King has gone hunting, be in the private apartments,[40] and when I see the opportunity I will 'show you off' to Madame la Marquise. After that you will go to the Foreign Affairs office and introduce yourself to the Abbé de Laville;[41] he is first secretary, he will give you a good reception."

Monsieur de Boulogne promised me that as soon as Monsieur Duverney informed him that the Council of the Military School had agreed, he would have the decree establishing the lottery issued, and he encouraged me to inform him of any other ideas which I might have.

At noon Madame de Pompadour came to the private apartments with the Prince of Soubise and my patron, who immediately pointed me out to the great lady. After curtsying to me, as was the custom, she said that she had read the story of my escape and had found it most interesting.

"Those gentlemen up there,"[42] she said with a smile, "are greatly to be feared. Do you visit the Ambassador?"

"I cannot better show him my respect than by not going there."

"I hope that you are now thinking of settling among us."

"Nothing could make me happier; but I need patronage, and I have learned that in this country it is accorded only to talent. That discourages me."

"I think that you need set no limit to your hopes, for you have good friends. I shall be glad to do what I can for you if I have an opportunity."

The Abbé de Laville received me very well and did not leave until he had assured me that he would have me in mind as soon as an opportunity arose. I went to dine at an inn, where a good-looking abbé came up and asked me if we might dine together. Politeness did not permit me to refuse. As we sat down at table, he congratulated me on the excellent reception which the Abbé de Laville had accorded me.

"I was there," he said, "writing a letter; but I heard almost all the kind things he said to you. May I ask you to whom you owe your introduction to the worthy Abbé?"

"If you are extremely curious to know, Monsieur l'Abbé, I will be glad to tell you."

"Oh, no, no! Pray excuse me."

After this indiscretion he spoke only of indifferent and amusing things. We left together in a "chamber pot" and reached Paris at eight o'clock, where, after promising to exchange visits and telling each other our names, we parted. He got out in the Rue des Bons Enfants and I went to supper at Silvia's in the Rue du Petit Lion. That woman among women congratulated me on my new acquaintances and advised me to cultivate them.

At home I found a note from Monsieur Duverney asking me to be at the Military School the next morning at eleven o'clock. At nine o'clock in came Calzabigi, whom his brother had sent to me with a large sheet of paper containing the arithmetical table of the entire lottery, which I could explain to the Council. It was a calculation of the probabilities which, set over against the certainties, proved what I had only stated. In substance it showed that the lottery would have come out exactly even so far as paying the winning tickets was concerned if instead of five numbers six should be drawn. Only five were to be drawn, and this made it scientifically certain that the advantage would always be one in five, which came to eighteen in ninety, which was the total number of lots in the lottery. This demonstration had the corollary that the lottery could not be maintained with drawings of six numbers, since the operating expenses amounted to a hundred thousand écus.

Thus instructed, and thoroughly persuaded that I ought to follow this plan, I proceeded to the Military School, where we at once went into conference. Monsieur d'Alembert[43] had been asked to be present as the great master of universal arithmetic. His presence would not have been considered necessary if Monsieur Duverney had been by himself; but there were some who, in order to avoid accepting the result of a political calculation, stubbornly denied its validity. The conference lasted three hours.

After my argument, which took only half an hour, Monsieur de Courteuil summarized all that I had said, and an hour was spent in nugatory objections which I easily refuted. I said that if the art of calculation in general was properly the art of finding the expression of a single relation arising from the combination of several relations, the same definition applied to moral calculation, which was as certain as mathematical calculation. I convinced them that without that certainty the world would never have had insurance companies, which, all of them rich and flourishing, laugh at Fortune and at the weak minds which fear her. I ended by saying that there was not a man at once learned and honorable in the world who could offer to be at the head of this lottery on the understanding that it would win at every drawing, and that if a man should appear with the temerity to give them that assurance they should turn him out, because either he would not keep his promise or, if he kept it, he would be a scoundrel.

Monsieur Duverney rose and said that in any case they could always abolish the lottery. After signing a paper which Monsieur Duverney presented to them, all the gentlemen left. Calzabigi came the next morning to tell me that the thing was settled and that it was now only a matter of waiting for the decree to be issued. I promised him I would call on Monsieur de Boulogne every day and that I would have him made a director as soon as I learned from Monsieur Duverney what my emoluments were to be.

The proposal made to me, which I accepted at once, was six collector's offices and an income of four thousand francs[44] a year secured by the lottery itself. It was the return on a capital of a hundred thousand francs, which I was at liberty to withdraw if I relinquished the offices, since the capital represented my guarantee.

The decree of the Council was issued a week later. The direction was given to Calzabigi, with emoluments of three thousand francs per drawing and a yearly income of four thousand francs—the same as mine—and the main office of the enterprise in the Hôtel de la Loterie in the Rue Montmartre. Of my six offices I at once sold five for two thousand francs each, and I opened the sixth[45] in luxurious quarters in the Rue Saint-Denis, putting my valet there as chief clerk. He was a young and highly intelligent Italian who had formerly served as valet to the Prince of La Cattolica,[46] the Neapolitan Ambassador. The day for the first drawing was set, and it was announced that all winning tickets would be paid a week after the drawing at the main office of the lottery.

Within twenty-four hours I had bills out to the effect that all winning tickets signed by me would be paid at my office in the Rue Saint-Denis twenty-four hours after the drawing. The result was that everyone came to my office for tickets. My profit consisted in the six percent on receipts. Fifty or sixty clerks from the other offices were stupid enough to complain of my move to Calzabigi. He could only answer them that they were free to catch up with me by doing the same thing, but that they had to have the money.

My receipts at the first drawing[47] were forty thousand livres. An hour after the drawing my clerk brought me the register and showed me that we had to pay out seventeen or eighteen thousand livres, all on ambi,[48] and I gave him the money. It was very profitable for my clerk, who though he asked for nothing always accepted the tips he was given, and from whom I did not demand any accounting. The lottery made a profit of six hundred thousand francs on the total receipts, which amounted to two millions. Paris alone contributed four hundred thousand francs. I dined at Monsieur Duverney's the next day with Calzabigi. We had the pleasure of hearing him complain that he had made too much. In Paris only eighteen or twenty terne won; though they were small, they gave the lottery a brilliant reputation. The rage being on, we expected that the receipts at the next drawing would be twice as large. The good-natured banter to which I was subjected at table over my scheme delighted me. Calzabigi demonstrated that my inspiration had assured me of an income of one hundred and twenty thousand francs a year, which ruined all the other collectors. Monsieur Duverney replied that he had often acted on similar inspirations and that, in any case, the collectors were all free to do the same thing, for it could only make the lottery more highly thought of. The second time, a terna of forty thousand francs forced me to borrow money. My receipts had been sixty thousand, but I had to turn them over to the financial agent the day before the drawing. In all the great houses to which I went and in theater lobbies, as soon as people saw me they gave me money, asking me to stake for them as I chose and to give them the tickets, for they knew nothing about it. I carried tickets for large and small amounts in my pockets, from which I let people choose, and I returned home with my pockets full of money. The other collectors did not have this privilege. They were not of a sort to be accepted in society. Only I went about in a carriage of my own; it gave me a reputation and unlimited credit. Paris was, and still is, a city where people judge everything by appearances; there is not a country in the world where it is easier to make an impression. But now that I have given my reader a full account of the lottery I will mention it only as it comes up.

A month after my arrival in Paris my brother Francesco, the painter, with whom I had left Paris in 1752, arrived from Dresden with Madame Silvestre.[49] He had spent four years there copying all the finest battle paintings in the celebrated gallery.[50] We were very glad to see each other again; but when I offered him the support of all my highly placed acquaintances to get him into the Academy, he answered that he did not need influence. He painted a picture representing a battle, he exhibited it at the Louvre, and he was received [51] by acclamation. The Academy paid him twelve thousand francs for his picture. After his reception my brother became famous, and in twenty-six years he earned nearly a million; however, extravagance and two bad marriages ruined him.

CHAPTER III

Count Tiretta, of Treviso. The Abbé de Lacoste. La Lambertini, pretended niece of the Pope. The name she gives Tiretta. Aunt and niece. Conversation at the fireside. Execution of Damiens. Tiretta's mistake. Anger of Madame XXX; reconciliation. I am happy with Mademoiselle de la M—re. Silvia's daughter. Mademoiselle de la M—re marries; my jealousy and desperate resolve. Change for the better.

AT THE beginning of March a handsome young man with an easy manner betokening high birth appeared before me wearing a redingote and carrying a letter. Yet something in the way he hands it to me makes me decide that he is a Venetian. I open it and am delighted. It was from my dear and worthy friend Signora Manzoni.[1] She asked my good offices for the bearer, Count Tiretta,[2] of Treviso, adding that he would tell me his sad story himself. She was sending me a small chest in which she said I would find all my manuscripts, for she was sure she would never see me again.

I at once rose and told him that if he wanted me to serve him in any way he could not have a stronger recommendation.

"So tell me, Count, how I can be of use to you."

"I need your friendship. A year ago the Council of my country chose me to fill a dangerous post. I was made a director of the pawn office[3] with two other noblemen of my age. The pleasures of the Carnival having left us in want of money, we used some of what we had in the till, hoping to return it before we should have to account for it. Our hope proved vain. The fathers of my two colleagues, who were richer than mine,[4] saved them by paying at once, and I, having no means of paying, decided to flee. Signora Manzoni advised me to entrust myself to you, at the same time asking me to bring you a small chest, which you shall have today. I arrived yesterday by the diligence from Lyons; I have only two louis left; I have shirts, but no suit except the one I am wearing. I am twenty-five years old, with an iron constitution and an absolute determination to do anything to earn an honest living; but I have no training and no talents; I only play the flute to amuse myself; I neither speak nor write any language but my own, and I am not a man of letters. What do you think you can do with me? I must also tell you that I have no hope of receiving the slightest help from anybody, least of all from my father, who to save the honor of the family will dispose of my inheritance, which I shall have to renounce for the rest of my life."

His brief account surprised me, but his sincerity pleased me. I told him to go at once and bring his baggage to a room next to mine which was for rent and to order something to eat in his room.

"All that, my dear Count, will cost you nothing, and in the meanwhile I will consider your situation. We will talk tomorrow. I never eat at home. Leave me now, for I have work to do; and if you go out for a walk beware of bad company and above all tell no one your business. You are fond of gambling, I suppose?"

"I loathe it, for it is the cause of half my ruin."

"And the other half?"

"Women."

"Women? They are more likely to pay you."

"God grant that I find some who will. At home we have nothing but trollops."

"If you are not too scrupulous in the matter of women you will do very well in Paris."

"What do you mean by scrupulous? I could never be a pimp."

"You are right. By scrupulous I mean a man who can only be loving if he is in love, who cannot bear holding some old harridan in his arms."

"If you mean no more than that, I am not scrupulous. I suspect that a rich woman would find me loving enough even if she were an utter horror."

"Bravo! You will do. Shall you call on the Ambassador?"

"God forbid!"

"At the moment all Paris is in mourning.[5] Go up to the third floor; you will find a tailor. Have him make you a black suit, and tell him from me that you must have it tomorrow morning. Good-by."

When I came back at midnight I found in my room the chest containing all my correspondence and the miniature portraits which were of concern to me. I have never in my life pawned a snuffbox without removing the portrait it contained. In the morning I saw Tiretta dressed in solid black.

"You see," I said, "how quickly things get done in Paris."

Just then the Abbé de Lacoste[6] is announced. I did not remember the name, but I have him shown in. I see the same Abbé who had seen me with the Abbé de Laville. I ask him to excuse me for not having had time to call on him. He congratulates me on my lottery. He says he has heard that I distributed over two thousand écus' worth of tickets at the Hôtel de Koelen.[7]

"Yes, I always carry eight or ten thousand francs' worth in my pocket."

"I will take a thousand écus' worth too."

"Whenever you please. At my office you can choose the numbers."

"I don't care about that. Just give me what you have."

"Gladly. Here they are. Choose."

After choosing he asks for paper and pen to write me a receipt.

"There is no need of that," I said, smiling and taking back my tickets; "I only give them out for cash."

"I will bring it to you tomorrow."

"And you shall have the tickets tomorrow; they are recorded at the office, and I cannot do otherwise."

"Give me some which are not recorded."

"I do not issue any such, for if they won I should have to pay them out of my own pocket."

"I think you could take that risk."

"And I think not."

He then speaks to Tiretta in Italian and offers to introduce him to Madame Lambertini,[8] the widow of a nephew of the Pope's. I say that I will go too, and we are driven there.

We get out at her door in the Rue Christine. I see a woman whose age, despite her youthful appearance, I put at forty years—thin, with black eyes, lively, scatter-brained, given to laughter, and in short a woman capable of inspiring a passing fancy. I set her talking and I find that she is neither a widow nor a niece of the Pope's; she was from Modena and an out-and-out adventuress. I see Tiretta becoming interested in her. She tries to keep us for dinner, but we excuse ourselves. Only Tiretta remains. I let the Abbé out at the Quai de la Ferraille and go to dine at Calzabigi's.

After dinner he takes me aside and says that Monsieur Duverney had told him to warn me that I was not allowed to distribute tickets on my own account.

"Then he considers me either a fool or a rogue. I shall complain to Monsieur de Boulogne."

"You will be making a mistake, for a warning is not an insult."

"You insult me yourself by giving me the warning. But no one shall give me another of the kind."

He calms me and persuades me to go with him to talk with Monsieur Duverney. The worthy old man, seeing that I am angry, begs my pardon and says that a self-styled Abbé de Lacoste had told him I was making so free. I did not see the Abbé anywhere again; he was the same man who three years later was sentenced to the galleys, where he ended his days, for having gone about Paris selling tickets for a lottery in Trévoux[9] which did not exist.

The day after the Abbé's visit I saw Tiretta in my room, just getting back. He said he had spent the night with the Pope's niece and that he thought she had found him satisfactory, since she proposed to put him up and keep him in funds if he would tell Monsieur Lenoir,[10] her lover, that he was her cousin.

"She claims," he said, "that Monsieur Lenoir will give me a post in the tax farming administration.[11] I replied that, since you were my intimate friend, I could not decide anything without first consulting you. She begged me to persuade you to dine with her on Sunday."

"I will do so with pleasure."

I found the woman madly in love with my friend, whom she dubbed "Count of Six Times," a name by which he was known in Paris as long as he remained there. She had recognized him as lord of that fief, which is thought to be fabulous in France, and she wanted to become its lady. After telling me of his nocturnal exploits as if I had been her oldest friend, she said that she wanted to give him room and board, that she had already obtained the consent of Monsieur Lenoir, who in fact was delighted to have her cousin stay with her.

She expected him after dinner, and she could not wait to introduce them to each other.

Reverting after dinner to the subject of my fellow countryman's powers, she excited him to the point where, wanting to convince me of his stamina, he confirmed her testimony in my presence. The sight had not the slightest effect on me; but observing my friend's extraordinary build I admitted that he could expect to make a fortune wherever he could find women with money.

At three o'clock two old women arrived. They were gamblers. La Lambertini introduced the "Count of Six Times," her cousin. By that imposing name he became an object of intense scrutiny, and the more so when his gibberish proved to be unintelligible. The heroine did not fail to whisper the explanation of his grandiose name into her friends' ears and to boast of the incredible wealth of the lord of the fief. "It is unbelievable," said the matrons, looking him up and down; and Tiretta seemed to answer: "Mesdames, have no doubt of it."

A hackney coach arrives. I see a stout woman,[12] well beyond middle age, a niece[13] pretty enough to eat, and a pale man wearing black and a round wig. After the embraces La Lambertini introduces her cousin Six Times; the name arouses surprise, but the explanation passes without comment; the only point dwelt upon was the strangeness of a man who dared to be in Paris without knowing a word of French and nevertheless jabbered away to the entire company, who, understanding not a word, did nothing but laugh. La Lambertini got up a game of brelan[14] and did not make me play; but she insisted that her dear cousin play beside her and on half shares. He did not know one card from another, but that didn't matter, he would learn; she would teach him. Since the charming young lady knows no card games I offer to keep her company in front of the fire. Her aunt says with a laugh that I shall be hard put to it to find subjects interesting enough to persuade her to talk; but that I must excuse her, for she had only been out of the convent for a month.

So as soon as I see the game started I go and sit down with her in front of the fire. It was she who broke the silence by asking me who the handsome man who could not talk was.

"He is a nobleman from my country who has left it because of an affair of honor. He will speak French when he has learned it, and then no one will laugh at him. I am sorry I brought him here, for in less than twenty-four hours he has been spoiled."

"How?"

"I do not dare tell you, for your aunt might not like it."

"I have no intention of making a report; but perhaps my curiosity deserves a rebuke."

"Mademoiselle, it is I who am in the wrong; but I will make amends by telling you everything. Madame Lambertini made him sleep with her and has given him the absurd name of 'Six Times.' That is all. I am sorry, because he was not a libertine before this happened."

Could I have supposed that I was talking to a well-born girl, a decent girl and a novice, in La Lambertini's house? I was surprised to see her face fiery red from shame. I refused to believe it. Two minutes later she astonishes me with a question I should never have expected.

"What is there in common," she asked, "between 'Six Times' and having slept with Madame Lambertini?"

"He did to her six times running what a decent husband does to his wife only once a week."

"And you think I am fool enough to tell my aunt what you have just told me?"

"But I am sorry for another thing too."

"I will come back in a moment."

After taking the little excursion which my charming story apparently made her feel she needed, she re-entered the room and stood behind her aunt's chair examining the hero's face; then she came back to her seat, blushing furiously.

"What is the other thing you said you were sorry for?"

"Dare I tell you all?"

"You have told me so much that I think you can have no scruples left."

"Then I will tell you that after dinner today she made him do it to her in my presence."

"If that offended you, obviously you were jealous."

"No. I felt humiliated because of something which I don't dare mention to you."

"I think you are mocking me with your 'don't dare.'"

"God forfend, Mademoiselle! She showed me that my friend outmeasured me by two inches."

"On the contrary, I think you are two inches taller than he is."

"It is not a question of height, but of another dimension, which you can imagine and in which my friend is a monster."

"A monster! But why should you mind that? Isn't it better not to be a monster?"

"That is very true; but in this respect certain women, who are not like you, prefer monstrosity."

"I haven't a clear enough idea of the matter to imagine what dimension can be called monstrous. I still consider it strange that you should have felt humiliated."

"Would you have thought it of me when you saw me?"

"When I came into the room and saw you I did not think about it. You appear to be a well-proportioned man, but if you know you are not I feel sorry for you."

"Please look."

"I think it is you who are the monster, for you frighten me."

She went and stood behind her aunt's chair; but I had no doubt that she would come back, for I was far from thinking her either stupid or innocent. I thought she wanted to pretend that she was; and not caring whether she had played the role well or badly I was delighted to have turned it to profit. I had punished her for wanting to impose on me, and as I thought her charming I was delighted that my punishment could certainly not have displeased her. Could I doubt her intelligence? It was she who had kept our entire dialogue from breaking off, and all that I had said and done had only been in consequence of her specious objections.

Four or five minutes later her stout aunt, having lost a game, told her niece she was bringing her bad luck and that it was bad manners to leave me alone. She did not answer her, and she came back to me smiling.

"If my aunt," she said, "knew what you have done she would not have accused me of being impolite."

"If you knew how mortified I am by it now! The only proof of my repentance I can give you is to leave. But will you not be offended if I do?"

"If you go my aunt will say that I am stupid and have bored you."

"In that case I will stay. So until now you had no idea of what I thought you would not mind my showing you?"

"Only a vague idea. It is no more than a month since my aunt had me come here from Melun[15] where I had been in a convent since I was eight years old, and now I am seventeen. They tried to make me take the veil, but I did not let them talk me into it."

"Are you angry at what I did? If I acted wrongly, I meant well."

"I have no right to be angry with you, for it was my fault. I only beg you to be discreet."

"Have no doubt that I will be; for I shall be the first to suffer if I am not."

"You have given me a lesson which will be useful to me in future. But you are going on with it. Stop, or I will leave you and not come back."

"Stay, it is finished. On this handkerchief you see the proof of my pleasure."

"What is that?"

"It is the substance which, placed in the proper retort, emerges nine months later male or female."

"I understand. You are an excellent tutor. You deliver yourself like a professor. Should I thank you for your zeal?"

"No. You should forgive me, for I would never have done what I did if I had not fallen in love with you the first moment I saw you."

"Then am I to take it as a declaration of love?"

"Yes, my angel. It is a daring one, but it is not to be doubted. If it did not come from a very strong love I should be a scoundrel who deserved death. May I hope that you will love me?"

"I have no idea. All I know is that I ought to loathe you. In less than an hour you have taken me on a journey which I thought I could not finish until after I married. You have left me with nothing to learn of a subject on which I never dared allow my mind to linger, and I feel guilty because I have let you seduce me. But how is it that you have now become calm and decent?"

"Because we are talking rationally. Because after the height of pleasure, love rests. Look!"

"What, again! Is this the end of the lesson? As I see you now, you do not frighten me any more. The fire is going out."

She puts on a log and, to poke up the fire, goes down on her knees. As she bends forward in this posture I put a determined hand under her dress, and I instantly find a completely closed door which could only lead me to happiness by being broken open. But at the same moment she rises, sits down, and says gently but with feeling that she is a well-born girl and believes she has the right to demand respect. At that I ask her pardon profusely, and the end of my speech calms her. I said that my daring hand had made me certain she had not yet enjoyed happiness with any man. She replied that the man who would make her happy could only be the man who would marry her, and she showed her forgiveness by letting me cover her hand with kisses. I would have gone further if someone had not arrived. It was Monsieur Lenoir, who had come in response to Madame Lambertini's note to hear what she had to tell him.

I see a man of mature years, simple and modest, who very politely asks everyone not to get up and not to interrupt the game. La Lambertini introduced me, and on hearing my name he asked if I was the artist. When he learned that I was his elder brother he congratulated me on the lottery and on Monsieur Duverney's high opinion of me; but what interested him more was the "cousin," whom she at once introduced to him as Count Tiretta. It was I who said that he had been recommended to me and had been forced to leave his country because of an affair of honor. La Lambertini then added that she wanted to put him up, but had not wished to do so until she learned if he would approve. He answered that she was sole mistress in her own house, and that he would be delighted to have him one of her circle. As he spoke Italian very well, Tiretta breathed again. He left the game and the four of us sat by the fire, where, when her turn came, the pretty young lady conversed very sensibly with Monsieur Lenoir. He led her to talk of her convent, and when she told him her name he spoke of her father, whom he had known. He was a Councilor in the Parlement of Rouen.[16] The charming girl was tall, a natural blonde, with regular features and a countenance marked by candor and modesty. Large and prominent blue eyes whose expression was of the tenderest bore witness to the ardent desires of her soul. Her close-fitting buttoned dress displayed the elegance of her waist, leaving the beauty of her bosom to be divined. I saw that Monsieur Lenoir, though he did not tell her so, was as sensible of her merits as I had been. But he was not in a position to show it as I had done. At eight o'clock he left. A half hour later Madame XXX also left, accompanied by her niece, whom she called De la M—re, and by the pale man who had come with them. I then left with Tiretta, who promised he would come to stay with her the next day; he kept his word.

Three or four days after this arrangement was made, my clerk sent me a letter which had been addressed to me at my office. The letter was from Mademoiselle de la M—re. Here is a copy of it:

"My aunt Madame XXX, sister of my late mother, is sanctimonious, fond of gambling, rich, stingy, and unjust. She does not love me and, not having succeeded in making me take the veil, she wants to marry me to a merchant of Dunkirk whom I do not know. Note that she does not know him either. The marriage broker speaks highly of him. He asks only that she guarantee him twelve thousand francs a year as long as she lives, since he is certain that on her death I will inherit fifty thousand écus. But note that, in accordance with the terms of my mother's will, she ought to give me twenty-five thousand when I marry. If what has happened between you and me has not made me contemptible in your eyes, I offer you my hand with twenty-five thousand écus and another twenty-five thousand on the death of my aunt. Do not answer me, for I do not know how or through whom or where to receive a letter from you. You shall answer me by word of mouth Sunday at Madame Lambertini's. Thus you have four days before you in which to think it over. I do not know if I love you; but I know that I must prefer you to any other man if I am to love myself. It is for me to win your esteem, and to give you the opportunity to win mine. Then, too, I feel sure that you will make life pleasant for me. If you consider that the happiness to which I aspire can contribute to yours, I warn you that you will need an attorney, for my aunt is stingy and may well go to law. As soon as you have made up your mind, you will have to find a convent for me, to which I can go before I take the slightest step, otherwise I should be terribly ill-treated and I cannot bear the thought of that. If the proposal I make to you does not suit you, I ask you for one favor which I hope you will grant me and for which I will be grateful to you. You will make an effort not to see me again, taking care to avoid any places where you think I might be. You will thus help me to forget you. Do you not understand that I cannot be happy unless I marry you or forget you? Good-by. I am sure I shall see you on Sunday."

Her letter touched me. I saw that it was dictated by virtue, honor, and good sense. I found that Mademoiselle de la M.'s mind deserved even more praise than her body. I felt ashamed that I had seduced her and worthy of the worst punishment if I refused the hand which she offered me with such dignity, and at the same time I saw that she offered me a fortune far larger than any for which I could reasonably hope; but the idea of marriage made me shudder; I knew myself too well not to foresee that in a settled way of life I should become unhappy and hence my wife would be unhappy too. My vacillation in coming to a decision during the four days she gave me to think it over convinced me that I was not in love with her; nevertheless, I could never make up my mind to reject her proposal, still less to tell her so. I spent the whole four days thinking of her, feeling that I esteemed her, repenting that I had wronged her, but never having the firmness to decide to repair my wrongdoing. When I thought that, if I did not, she would hate me, I could not tolerate that idea either; and such is always the unhappy predicament of a man who must make a decision and cannot make it.

Fearing that some demon would lead me to fail in my duty to Mademoiselle de la M—re by compelling me to go to the theater or the opera, I went to dine at La Lambertini's with my mind still not made up. She was at mass. Tiretta was in his room playing the flute; as soon as he saw me he came out to pay me what his black clothes had cost him.

"So you are in funds now—I congratulate you."

"Better condole with me, for it is stolen money, though I am only an accomplice. There is cheating here, and I have been taught to lend a hand; and I take my share so they won't call me a fool. My hostess and three or four other women shear the sheep. It revolts me, I cannot put up with it. One day or another I shall be killed or I will kill, and either way it will cost me my life; so I am planning to get out of this den of thieves as soon as I can."

"That would be my advice to you, my friend, and I urge you to follow it. Better leave today than tomorrow."

"I do not want to precipitate anything, for Monsieur Lenoir, who is a gentleman and my friend, and who thinks I am the trollop's cousin and knows nothing of her infamous proceedings, would suspect something and might leave her when he learned what had driven me away. In five or six days I will find some excuse and come back to you."

La Lambertini said she was delighted that I had dropped in to take potluck; she told me that Mademoiselle de la M—re and her aunt would be of the company. I asked her if she was satisfied with "Six Times" and she answered that he did not always lodge in his fief but that she loved him none the less. Madame XXX arrived with her niece, who concealed her pleasure at seeing me. She was in half-mourning, and so beautiful that I was amazed at my indecision. Tiretta came down and as there was no reason why I should not show that I felt attracted by Mademoiselle de la M—re, I paid her every attention. I told her aunt that I would renounce my bachelorhood if I could find a wife like her.

"My niece, Monsieur, is virtuous and sweet-tempered, but she has neither intelligence nor piety."

"As for my intelligence, my dear aunt, I have nothing to say, but no one at the convent ever reproached me with lack of piety."

"I can well believe it. They are female Jesuits. Grace is what matters, my dear niece, grace; but let us change the subject. All I ask is that you please the man who will be your husband."

"Is Mademoiselle about to be married?"

"Her intended will arrive at the beginning of next month."

"I suppose he belongs to the legal profession?"

"He is an extremely well-to-do merchant."

"Since Monsieur Lenoir has told me that Mademoiselle is the daughter of a Councilor, I did not expect a misalliance."

"It does not signify. He is noble[17] if he is honest, and it will be her own fault if he does not make her happy."

Since this sort of talk could only be painful to the charming girl, who was listening and saying nothing, I changed the subject to the great crowd which would be at La Grève[18] to watch Damiens's execution; and seeing that they were all curious about the horrible spectacle I offered them a large window from which all five of us could see it. They accepted on the spot.[19] I promised to call for them; but since I had no window, when we rose from table I pretended I had some important business and hurried in a hackney coach to La

Grève, where within a quarter of an hour I rented a good window one flight up between two staircases for three louis. I paid and was given a receipt with a forfeit of six hundred francs. The window faced the front of the scaffold. Returning to La Lambertini's, I found her playing piquet à écrire[20] with Tiretta, while Madame XXX kept score.

As Mademoiselle de la M—re knew only "Comet,"[21] I offered her my company, and, since we had something to say to each other, we retired to the other end of the room. I told her that the receipt of her letter brought me to realize that I was the most fortunate of men and at the same time to realize that her mind and her character were such as to make her adored by any man endowed with common sense.

"You shall be my wife," I said, "and until my last breath I will bless the fortunate boldness with which I surprised your innocence, for without it you would never have come to prefer me to a hundred other men of your own rank, none of whom would ever have refused you even without the bait of fifty thousand écus, which are nothing in comparison with the charms of your person and your good sense. Now that you know what my feelings are, let us not be precipitate; trust me. Give me time to take a house, furnish it, and put myself in a position to be considered worthy to marry a girl of your condition. Consider that I am still living in a furnished room, that you have relatives, and that I should be ashamed to look like an adventurer in a matter of such moment."

"You heard that my supposed future husband is to arrive; and when he arrives they will move quickly."

"Not so quickly but that in twenty-four hours I can free you from all constraint without your aunt's even knowing that it will be I who deal her the blow. Know, my angel, that I have only to ask it and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, certain that you want no other husband than myself, will secure a refuge for you in one of the best convents in Paris; that it is he who will supply you with a lawyer, and he who, if the language of the will is clear, will within a few days force your aunt to give you your dowry and furnish security for the rest of your inheritance. Keep calm, take no action, and wait for the merchant from Dunkirk. Be sure that I will not leave you in difficulties. You will no longer be in your aunt's house on whatever day they set to sign the contract.''

''You have convinced me, and I put myself entirely in your hands; but I beg you to give no weight to one circumstance which pains my delicacy in the highest degree. You said that I would never have proposed to you that you either marry me or cease to see me if you had not taken such liberties as you took last Sunday. It is true in one respect, for without an overpowering reason I should have been mad to offer you my hand point-blank; but our marriage could equally well have come about in a different way, for I can truly tell you that in any case I should have given you the preference over all men.''

On hearing this magnanimous confidence, I kissed her hand again and again and with such a fervor of feeling that I should not have waited a quarter of an hour to marry her if a notary and a priest empowered to give us the nuptial blessing had been present. Entirely absorbed in our own concerns, we paid no attention to the terrible racket the company was making at the other end of the room; but I thought I ought to look into it, at least in order to calm Tiretta.

I saw an open casket, filled with jewels ranging from mere trumpery to articles of value, and two men arguing with Tiretta, who had a book in his hand. I immediately thought it was a lottery; but why the quarrel? Tiretta said that they were scoundrels, who had won thirty or forty louis from them by means of the book, which he handed me. One of the men told me that the book contained a lottery than which nothing could be more honest.

"This book," he said, "contains twelve hundred leaves, two hundred of which represent prizes and the others are blanks. Each winning leaf, then, is followed by five losing ones. The person who wants to play pays a petit écu and puts the point of a pin at random between the leaves of the closed book. The book is opened at the place where the pin went in, and the leaf is examined. If it is blank the person who paid the petit écu loses it, and if it indicates a prize he is given the prize written on the leaf or its value in money, as stated on the same leaf. Observe that the smallest prize is worth twelve francs and that there are prizes which run up to six hundred and one to twelve hundred. In the hour during which these ladies and this gentleman have been playing they have already won several prizes, and Madame here has won a ring worth six louis, which she would still have if she had not preferred to take the money, which, continuing to play, she has lost."

"In short," said Madame XXX, who had won the ring, "there are six of us here, and these gentlemen have won our money with their accursed book. You can see that we were taken unawares."

Tiretta called them scoundrels, and one of them replied that in that case the collectors for the Military School lottery were scoundrels too. At that Tiretta gave him a sound slap; whereupon I stepped between them, demanded silence, and proceeded to end the matter.

"All lotteries," I said, "are advantageous to the backers; but the backer of the Military School lottery is the King himself, and I am the chief collector. As such, I confiscate this casket, and I give you your choice. Either you will give these persons back the money you have won and I will let you leave with your casket, or I will send for a police officer, who on my demand will put you in prison until tomorrow, when Monsieur Berryer[22] himself will judge the case. I will take this book to him tomorrow morning. We shall see if, because you are scoundrels, we have to admit that we are the same.''

Seeing that they were in a poor position they decided to give back the money. They were made to give back forty louis in all, though they swore they had won only twenty. I was convinced of it; but vae victis (''woe to the vanquished'')[23]; I was angry with them and was determined that they should pay. They asked for their book, but I would not give it to them. They thought they were lucky they could leave with their casket of jewels. The ladies were touched and after they were gone said that I might at least have let the poor wretches have their conjuring book.

They came to see me at eight o'clock the next morning, and they made me relent by presenting me with a large case containing twenty-four eight-inch Saxon porcelain[24] statues. At that I gave them back the book, threatening that I would have them arrested if they went about Paris any longer with their lottery. The same day I took all twenty-four of the pretty figures to Mademoiselle de la M—re. It was a sumptuous present, and her aunt thanked me profusely.

A few days later—it was March 28th[25]—I went very early to call for the ladies, who were breakfasting at Madame Lambertini's with Tiretta, and took them in my carriage to La Grève, holding Mademoiselle de la M—re on my lap. All three of the ladies crowded into the front of the window, leaning forward with their elbows on the sill so as not to prevent us from seeing. The window had two steps, they had got up on the second, and, since we were behind them, we had to be on it too, for if we had stood on the first we could have seen nothing. I have reasons for acquainting my reader with this particular.

We had the firmness to remain present at the horrible spectacle[26] for four hours. I shall say nothing about it, for it would take too long and in any case everyone knows the details. Damiens was a fanatic who had tried to kill Louis XV in the belief that he was doing a good deed. He had only just pierced the King's skin; but that made no difference. The populace at his execution called him a monster spewed up from Hell to assassinate "the best" of kings, whom they believed they adored and whom they had named "the Well-Beloved." Yet it was the same populace which massacred[27] the whole royal family, all the noblemen of France, and all those who gave the nation the fair character which made it esteemed, loved, and even taken as a model by all other nations. The people of France, said Monsieur de Voltaire himself, is the most abominable of all peoples. It is a chameleon which takes on all colors and is ready to do whatever a leader wants it to do, whether for good or for evil.

While Damiens was being tortured I had to turn away my eyes when I heard him shriek with only half his body left; but La Lambertini and Madame XXX did not look away; and it was not because they were hard-hearted. They told me, and I had to pretend to believe them, that they could not feel the least pity for such a monster because they loved Louis XV so well. It is true, however, that Tiretta kept Madame XXX so strangely occupied during the whole execution that it may have been only on his account that she never dared to stir or look around.

Being behind her and very close to her, he had raised her dress so as not to step on it, and that was all very well. But later, looking toward them, I saw that he had raised it a little too high; whereupon, determining neither to interrupt my friend's enterprise nor to embarrass Madame XXX, I took up a position behind my beloved which assured her aunt that what Tiretta did to her could be seen neither by myself nor by her niece. I heard the rustling of a dress for two whole hours, and finding the whole thing most amusing I never swerved from the resolve I had taken. I admired Tiretta's appetite even more than his boldness, for in that respect I had often been as daring as he.

When at the end of the execution I saw Madame XXX straighten up, I turned too. I saw my friend as lively, fresh, and calm as if nothing had happened; but I thought the lady looked pensive and more serious than usual. Between keeping La Lambertini from laughing at her and preventing her niece from discovering mysteries of which she should still be ignorant, she had been under the dire necessity of having to dissimulate and patiently put up with all that the brute had done.

I dropped La Lambertini at her door, asking her to leave Tiretta with me, since I needed him. Then I dropped Madame XXX at her house in the Rue Saint-André-des-Arts,[28] where she asked me to call on her the next day as she had something to say to me. I noticed that she did not curtsy to my friend. I took him to dinner at Landel's, who had a wineshop in the Hôtel de Buci[29] and furnished excellent meals, even on fast days, for six francs a head.

"What were you doing," I asked him, "behind Madame XXX?"

"I am sure neither you nor the others saw anything."

"That may well be; but having seen the beginning of the performance and guessing what you were going to do, I took up a position which prevented Mademoiselle de la M—re and La Lambertini from seeing you. I can imagine what you did, and I admire your hearty appetite; but Madame XXX is angry."

"Then she is pretending to be, for since she stayed still for two whole hours, I cannot believe anything but that I gave her pleasure.''

''I believe it too; but her self-esteem leaves her no choice except to claim that you affronted her—as indeed you did! You see that she is vexed with you and that she wants to talk with me tomorrow.''

''But I cannot imagine she will talk to you about anything so trifling. She would be out of her mind.''

''Why not? You don't know these pious women. They are delighted to have an opportunity to weep and confess such things to a third person, especially if they are ugly. It is quite possible that Madame XXX will demand reparation; and I shall be delighted to take a hand in it.''

''I do not see what kind of reparation she can demand. If she hadn't been willing she could have given me a kick which would have knocked me off the step backward.''

''La Lambertini is vexed with you too, I noticed. She may have seen what happened and feel that you have cheated her.''

''La Lambertini is vexed with me for another reason. Last night I raised a row and I shall move from there before evening.''

''Really?''

''Really. Here is the story. Last evening a young man in the tax farming administration, whom an old Genoese harridan brought to supper with us, after losing forty louis at petits-paquets[30] threw the cards in my hostess's face and called her a thief. I picked up the candlestick and put the candle out on his face, at the risk, I confess, of blinding him, but it did not go into his eyes. He ran for his sword, shouting, and if his Genoese friend had not held him round the waist there would have been a murder, for I had already unsheathed. When the poor fellow saw his wound in the mirror he became so furious that the only way they could quiet him was to give him back his money. They did so despite my protests; for giving it back was tantamount to admitting that they had cheated him. This led to a bitter quarrel between myself and La Lambertini after the young man had gone. She said that nothing would have happened and we should still have the forty louis if I had stayed out of it; that it was she and not I whom he had insulted; to which the Genoese added that if we had kept our heads we should have fleeced him for a long time, but God knew what he would do now with the scar on his face from the burning candle. Disgusted with their trollops' morality, I told them to go . . . . . themselves; on which my dear hostess said that I was a tramp. But for Monsieur Lenoir's arrival I would have given her a beating. They told me to keep still, but I was too angry. I told the worthy man that his mistress had called me a tramp, that she was a whore, that she was not my cousin, and that I would move out today. So saying I went up to my room and locked myself in. I shall go back there in two hours for my clothes, and I will drink coffee with you tomorrow morning."

Tiretta was right. The more I learned of his character, the more I saw that he was not born for the trade of fancy man.

The next day about noon I went on foot to call on Madame XXX, whom I found with her niece. A quarter of an hour later she told her to leave us alone, then spoke to me as follows:

"You will be surprised, Monsieur, by what I have to say to you. It is a complaint of an unimaginable nature, which I have determined to lay before you without making any long reflections, for the situation is both painful and urgent. To come to the decision I had only to remind myself of the impression you made on me the first time I saw you. I believe you to be intelligent, discreet, a man of honor and decent behavior, and, what is more, of true religious feeling; if I am mistaken it will be most unfortunate, for insulted as I feel that I have been, and not lacking in resources, I will find a way to avenge myself; and, as his friend, you will regret it."

"Are you complaining of Tiretta?"

"None other. He is a villain and he has insulted me in an unheard-of manner."

"I should never have believed him capable of it. What, Madame, is the nature of the insult? You may count on me."

"Monsieur, I will not tell you; but I hope you can guess it. For two whole hours yesterday at the execution of that monster Damiens he took the strangest advantage of his position behind me."

"I understand, and you need tell me no more. You are justified; and I condemn him, for it was a low trick; but permit me to tell you that the thing is not unheard-of, or indeed unusual; I even consider that it can be forgiven either to love or to the situation at the moment, to the extreme proximity of the fiendish temptation, to the extreme youth of the offender. It is a crime for which reparation can be made in a number of ways, with the full consent of the parties. Tiretta is a bachelor, a gentleman with the best connections, and a marriage can easily be arranged; and if a marriage does not accord with your ideas, he can make reparation by a most constant friendship, of a nature to give you the clearest evidence of his repentance and worthy of your indulgence. Consider, Madame, that he is a man and hence subject to all the weaknesses of humanity. Consider, too, that your charms must have played no small part in exciting his senses beyond measure. In short, I believe he may hope to obtain your forgiveness."

"Forgiveness? All that you have just said flows from the wisdom of a Christian soul; but your whole argument is founded on a false supposition. You do not know what took place. But alas! how could anyone guess it?"

Madame XXX then shed a few tears, which baffled me. I did not know what to think. "Can he have stolen her purse?" I wondered. After drying her tears she went on as follows:

"You imagine a crime which, by an effort, one could reconcile with reason and hence, I admit, discover some proper reparation for it; but what the brute did to me is so infamous that I must not even think of it, for it is of a nature to drive me mad."

"Good God! What are you saying? I tremble. Tell me, I beg you, if I have guessed."

"I think so, for I do not believe it possible to imagine anything worse. I see that you are upset. Yet such is the case. Forgive my tears, and seek their source, I beg you, only in resentment and shame."

"And in religion."

"That too. Indeed it is their chief source. I did not mention it because I do not know if you are as attached to it as I am."

"I am so to the extent of my powers, thank God!"

"Then be prepared to let me damn myself, for I demand vengeance."

"Renounce it, Madame; I could never be your accomplice in seeking vengeance, and if you will not renounce it, at least keep it from my knowledge. I promise to tell him nothing, even though, since he is staying with me, the laws of hospitality demand that I warn him."

"I thought he was staying with La Lambertini."

"He left her house yesterday. It was a den of iniquity. I got him out of there."

"What are you saying? You astonish and edify me. I do not seek his death, Monsieur; but admit that he owes me reparation."

"I admit it; but I know of none commensurate with the insult. I can think of only one, and I will undertake to procure it for you."

"Tell me what it is."

"I will trick him into coming here, I will hand him over to you and leave him alone with you to face all your righteous anger—but on condition that, without his knowing it, I shall remain in the room next to the one in which you will have him at your mercy, for I hold myself responsible for his life."

"I consent. You shall be in this room, and you shall leave him with me in the room in which I will receive you both; but he must not know."

"He will not even know that I am bringing him to your house. I do not want him to be aware that I know anything about his abominable crime. I will find some excuse for leaving him with you."

"When will you bring him? I can hardly wait to abash him. I will make him tremble. I cannot imagine what excuses he will jabber out to justify his insolence."

She made me stay for dinner with her and the Abbé Desforges,[31] who arrived at one o'clock. The Abbé was a pupil of the famous Bishop of Auxerre,[32] who was still alive. At table I talked so eloquently of grace and quoted St. Augustine to such good purpose that the Abbé and his sanctimonious disciple took me for a most zealous Jansenist,[33] which was against all probability. Mademoiselle de la M—re never once looked at me, and assuming that she had her reasons I never spoke to her.

After dinner I promised Madame XXX that I would bring her the culprit the next day when we were walking home from the Comédie Française,[34] for I was certain that at night he would not recognize her house.

But Tiretta only laughed when I told him the whole story, reproaching him in serio-comic vein with the horrible act he had dared to perpetrate on a woman in every way respectable.

"I should never have believed," he replied, "that she would bring herself to complain of it to anyone."

"Then you do not deny having done this horrible thing to her?"

"If she says I did, I will not contradict her; but may I die if I believe I can swear to it. In the position in which I was placed, I apparently could do nothing else. But I will calm her, and I will try to make short work of it so as not to keep you waiting."

"No, no. On the contrary, your interest and mine demand that you take a long time over it, for I am sure I shall not be bored. You must not know that I am in the house; and even if you stay with her only an hour, take a hackney coach and leave. There is a hack stand in the street. You must realize that the least Madame XXX owes me in the way of politeness is not to leave me alone and without a fire. Remember that she is well born, rich, and pious. Try to gain her friendship—not front to back but de faciem ad faciem ['face to face'], as the King of Prussia said.* [35] You may find it very profitable. If she asks you why you are no longer living with La Lambertini, do not tell her the reason. Your discretion will please her. In short, try your best to expiate your execrable crime."

"I need only tell her the truth. I didn't know where I was going in."

"It's an excuse in a million, and a Frenchwoman may very well consider it legitimate."

When we left the Comédie I dismissed my carriage, and I ushered the culprit into the presence of the matron, who received us most politely, saying that she never supped but that if we had let her know beforehand she would have had something for us. After telling her all the news I had heard in the foyer, I asked her to allow me to leave my friend with her, since I had to call on a foreigner at the Spanish Embassy.[36]

---

* D'Alembert dared to correct him. I would have done the same. Why should a king insist on speaking Latin when he has not learned it? (C.'s note.)

"If I am not back within a quarter of an hour," I said to Tiretta, "do not wait for me. You will find hackney coaches in the street. We will meet tomorrow."

Instead of going downstairs I entered the adjoining room by the door from the hall. Two or three minutes later I saw Mademoiselle de la M—re, who, carrying a candle, said with a smile that she did not know if she was dreaming.

"My aunt," she said, "ordered me not to leave you alone and to tell the chambermaid not to come up until she rang. You have left 'Six Times' alone with her, and she told me to speak softly because he is not to know you are here. May I ask what this strange business is? I admit it makes me very curious."

"You shall know all, my angel, but I am cold."

"She also told me to make a good fire. She has become generous. As you see, there are candles."

As soon as we were seated in front of the fire I told her the whole story, to which she listened with the utmost attention but which she found it difficult to understand when it came to explaining the nature of Tiretta's crime. I was not sorry that I had to explain it to her in clear terms, accompanying them with gestures, which made her laugh and blush together. I told her that when I had made myself responsible for her aunt's receiving reparation, I had arranged the thing in a way to make it certain that she and I would be together and perfectly free during all the time that her aunt was occupied; and thereupon I for the first time covered her lovely face with kisses, which, as they were not accompanied by any other liberties, she candidly received as indubitable proof of my love.

"There are two things," she said, "which I do not understand. The first is how Tiretta managed to commit a crime on my aunt which I can see is possible if the party assaulted consents but which must be impossible if she does not—which leads me to conclude that, since the crime was committed, my good aunt must have consented to it."

"Certainly, for she could have changed her position."

"Even without that—for it seems to me she could simply have made it impossible for him to enter."

"In that, my angel, you are mistaken. A well-equipped man asks only for no change in position; granted that, he breaks through the barrier easily enough. Besides, I do not believe that achieving entrance in the case of your aunt is the same as it would be in, let us say, yours."

"That I defy a hundred Tirettas to do. The other thing I do not understand is how she can have told you about the affront, which, as she should have known if she had any intelligence, could only make you laugh, for it makes me laugh too. Nor do I understand what kind of reparation she can expect from a wild brute who probably considers the whole thing completely unimportant. I believe he would have tried to play the same trick on anyone behind whom he happened to be standing at that frenzied moment."

"You are right, for he told me himself that he had entered but really did not know where."

"Your friend is a strange sort of creature."

"As for the kind of reparation your aunt may demand, and which she perhaps hopes to obtain, she told me nothing; but I believe it will consist in a formal declaration of love on his part and that he will expiate the crime he unwittingly committed by becoming her devoted lover and spending this very night with her just as if he had married her this morning."

"Come now—that would be too amusing. I don't believe it. She is too much in love with her saintly soul; then, too, how can you suppose our young man can play the role of lover to her when he has her face before his eyes? He didn't see her when he did what he did to her at La Grève. Have you ever seen as repulsive a face as my aunt's? Her skin is freckled, her eyes are rheumy, her teeth rotten, and her breath unbearable. She is hideous."

"Those are trifles, dear heart, for a man like my friend, who, being twenty-five, is always ready. It is I who can only be a man when I am stimulated by charms like yours, which I cannot wait to possess completely and legitimately."

"You will find me the fondest of wives, and I am sure I shall conquer your heart so that nothing can take it from me until I die."

As an hour had already passed, and her aunt's conversation with Tiretta still continued, I saw that the thing had become serious.

"Let us eat something," I said.

"I can't give you anything but bread, cheese, and ham, and some wine which my aunt thinks very good."

"Bring them all, for my stomach is perishing."

No sooner have I spoken than she lays two places on a small table and brings everything she has. The cheese was Roquefort and the ham delicious. There was enough for ten people, but since there was nothing else we ate it all with ravenous appetites and emptied the two bottles. Pleasure shone in the charming girl's beautiful eyes; even so, we spent an hour over our frugal repast.

"Are you not curious," I asked her, "to know what your aunt has been doing with 'Six Times' during the two hours and a half they have been together?"

"They may be playing cards; but there's a hole. All I see is the two candles, with wicks an inch long."

"Didn't I tell you? Give me a coverlet, and I will lie down on this sofa; and you be off to sleep. Let us go see your bed.''

She took me into her little room, where I saw a pretty bed, a prayer stool, and a large crucifix. I said her bed was too small, but she said it wasn't, and she showed me that she was perfectly comfortable in it stretched out full length. What a charming wife I was to have!

''Oh, I beg you, don't move, and let me unbutton this dress which hides things unknown I am dying to devour.''

''My dear, I cannot defend myself; but afterward you will no longer love me.''

The unbuttoned dress showing me only half of her, she could not resist my insistence. She had to let my eyes enjoy all her bared beauties and my mouth devour them; and at last, burning with desires equal to mine, she opened her arms to me, making me promise to spare her in the one crucial point. What does one not promise in such moments? But where is the woman, if she really loves, who calls on her lover to keep his promise when love has taken the place vacated by his reason? After spending an hour in amorous toying which inflamed her and of which until that moment she had known nothing, I showed my mortification at having to leave her without paying her charms the chief homage they deserved. I saw her sigh.

As I had to resign myself to sleeping on the couch, and the fire having gone out, I asked her for a coverlet, since it was very cold. If I stayed in bed with her and abstained as I had promised I would, I should only too easily fall asleep. She told me to stay in bed while she went to light a faggot. Wanting to hurry, she did not think of dressing, and in a minute I saw a fine fire; but it was less strong than the one kindled in my mind and body by her charms, whose power, in the position she assumed to light the faggot, became overwhelming. I ran to her, determined to break my promise and certain that she would not have the firmness to resist me. Clasping her in my arms, I said that I would be too wretched unless, at least from pity if not from love, she would consent to make me happy.

"Then let us be happy," she answered, "and be sure that on my side pity has nothing to do with it."

We then lay down on the couch, and we did not leave each other until daybreak. After lighting the fire for me again, she went off to bed in her own room, locking the door behind her, and I fell asleep.

It was Madame XXX who waked me in the morning, dressed in a fetching dishabille.

"Good morning, Madame. What has become of my friend?"

"And mine. I have forgiven him. He gave me the clearest proof that he made a mistake. He has gone home. You must not tell him that you spent the night here, for he might think you had spent it with my niece. I am obliged to you. I am in need of your indulgence and especially of your discretion."

"You may count on that, Madame; it is enough for me to know that you have forgiven him."

"How could I help it? He is really something more than mortal. If you knew how he loves me! I am grateful to him. I am taking him to board with me for a year, and he will be well lodged and even better fed. So we shall leave today for La Villette,[37] where I have a charming little house. Just at the beginning I have to do this to silence spiteful tongues. At La Villette there will be a good room for you whenever you wish to come for supper. You will find a good bed in it. I am only sorry that you will be bored, for my niece is sulky."

"Your niece is very pleasant, she gave me a tasty supper and kept me excellent company until three o'clock in the morning."

"I congratulate her. How did she manage it when there was nothing in the house?"

"We ate all there was, and afterward she went off to bed and I slept very well here."

"I didn't think the girl had that much intelligence. Let us go see her. She has locked her door. Open up, will you! Why did you lock your door, you prude? Monsieur is a man of honor."

She opened her door, excusing herself for appearing in such undress, but she was dazzling.

"There she is," said her aunt. "As you see, she's not bad-looking. It's a pity she's so stupid. You were right to give Monsieur Casanova supper. I gambled all night; and when one gambles, one forgets everything else. I quite forgot that you were here, and not knowing that Count Tiretta would eat supper, I did not order anything. But in future we will sup. I have taken him to board. He is a young man of character and intelligence. You'll see how quickly he will learn to speak French. Get dressed, niece, for we must pack. After dinner we shall go to spend the whole spring at La Villette. And listen, niece, there's no need for you to tell my sister anything about all this."

"Never fear, my dear Aunt. Did I tell her anything the other times?"

"You see how stupid she is! Her 'the other times' would make one suppose the thing had happened to me before."

"I meant that I never tell her anything at all."

"We will dine at two o'clock, you shall dine with us, and we will leave immediately afterward. Tiretta promised me he would be here with his portmanteau. We will put everything in a hackney coach."

I promised her that I would not fail to come. I hurried home, very curious to hear the whole story from Tiretta himself. As he got out of bed he told me that he had sold himself for a year for twenty-five louis a month and board and lodging.

"I congratulate you. She tells me that you are something more than mortal."

"I worked all night for that; but I am sure you didn't waste your time either."

"Get dressed, for I am to dine there with you, and I mean to see you off for La Villette, where I shall go sometimes too, for your little darling has told me I have a room there."

We arrived at two o'clock. Madame XXX, dressed in clothes suitable for a girl, was a laughable sight, and Mademoiselle de la M—re was as beautiful as a star. At four o'clock they set out with Tiretta, and I went to the Comédie Italienne.[38]

I was in love with Mademoiselle de la M—re; but Silvia's daughter, with whom I had only the pleasure of supping at the family table, weakened a love which now left me nothing to desire. We complain of women who, though they love us and are sure that they are loved, refuse us their favors; and we are wrong. If they love us they must fear to lose us and hence must do all that they can to keep alive our desire to attain possession of them. If we attain it nothing is surer than that we will no longer desire them, for one does not desire what one possesses; so women are right in refusing to yield to our desires. But if the desires of the two sexes are equal, why is it that a man never refuses a woman whom he loves and who urges him on? The reason can only be this: The man who loves and knows that he is loved rates the pleasure he is sure he will give the loved object more highly than the pleasure which that object can give him in fruition. Hence he is eager to satisfy her. Woman, whose great preoccupation is her own interest, cannot but rate the pleasure she will herself feel more highly than the pleasure she will give; hence she procrastinates as long as she can because she fears that in giving herself she will lose what concerns her most—her own pleasure. This feeling is bound up with the nature of the female sex, and it is the sole cause of coquetry, which reason forgives in women and which it can never forgive in a man. And in fact coquetry in a man is very seldom seen.

Silvia's daughter loved me, and she knew that I loved her even though I had never made her a declaration; but she took great care not to let me know it. She feared she would encourage me to demand favors of her, and not feeling sure that she would have the firmness to refuse, she felt afraid that she would lose me afterward. Her mother and father planned to marry her to Clément,[39] who had been her harpsichord teacher for the past three years; she knew it, and she could do nothing but consent, for though she was not in love with him she did not dislike him. Knowing that he was to be her husband, she could not but see him with pleasure. Most well-brought-up girls enter marriage without love having played any part in it, and they are content to do so. They seem to know that their husbands are one thing and their lovers another. Men commonly take the same attitude, especially in Paris. Frenchmen are jealous of their mistresses, never of their wives; but Clément the harpsichordist was visibly in love with his pupil, and she was delighted that I noticed it. She knew that, once I was certain of it, I should be led to make a declaration, and she was not mistaken. I resolved on it after Mademoiselle de la M—re left, and I had reason to repent. After my declaration Clément was dismissed; but I found myself in a worse position. The man who declares that he is in love with a woman except by the language of gesture needs to go to school.

Three days after Tiretta left, I took his few belongings to him at La Villette, and Madame XXX was pleased to see me. Just as we were sitting down at table the Abbé Desforges arrived. The stern rigorist, who had been most friendly to me in Paris, ate his dinner without ever giving me a look and did the same to Tiretta. But the latter finally lost his patience at dessert. He rose from the table first, asking Madame XXX to let him know in advance when she again entertained the gentleman, with whom she immediately withdrew. Tiretta took me to see his room which, as might be expected, was next to Madame's. While he was putting away his clothes Mademoiselle took me to see my room. It was a very attractive one on the ground floor; hers was across from it. I pointed out how easily I could go into hers when everyone was in bed, but she replied that, as her bed was too small, she would come to me.

She then told me all the extravagant things her aunt was doing for Tiretta.

"She thinks," she said, "that we do not know he sleeps with her. She rang this morning at eleven o'clock and told me to go and ask him if he had had a good night. Seeing that his bed had not been unmade, I asked him if he had spent the night writing. He said that he had and asked me to say nothing about it to Madame."

"Does he make eyes at you?"

"No. But even if he did—stupid as he is, he must know that he is contemptible."

"Why?"

"Because my aunt pays him."

"You pay me too."

"Yes, but in the same coin as you give me."

Her aunt said that she was stupid, and she believed it. Not only was she not stupid, she was both intelligent and virtuous, and I should never have seduced her if she had not been brought up in a convent of Béguines.[40]

I went back to Tiretta's room, where I spent more than an hour. I asked him if he liked his work.

"I don't enjoy it; but since it costs me nothing I don't think I am badly off. I don't have to look at her face, and she is extremely clean."

"Does she take good care of you?"

"She is full of consideration. This morning she refused my morning greeting. She said she was sure her refusal would pain me, but that I ought to put my health above pleasure."

The Abbé Desforges having gone, leaving Madame alone, we went to her room. She treated me like an old crony, cuddling up to Tiretta in the most revolting fashion. But my dauntless friend returned her caresses so heartily that I was amazed. She assured him he would not see the Abbé Desforges again. After telling her that she was damned in this world and the next, he had threatened to abandon her and she had taken him at his word.

An actress known as La Quinault,[41] who had retired from the stage and who was a neighbor, came to call on Madame XXX, and a quarter of an hour later I saw Madame Favart[42] with the Abbé de Voisenon;[43] in another quarter of an hour Mademoiselle Amelin[44] arrived with a handsome youth whom she called her nephew and whose name was Chalabre; he looked like her, but she did not think it reason enough to admit that she was his mother. Monsieur Paton,[45] a Piedmontese who was with her, finally let himself be persuaded to make a bank at faro, and in less than two hours won everybody's money except mine, for I did not play. My attention was all for Mademoiselle de la M—re. In addition, the banker was obviously a swindler, but Tiretta did not realize it until he had lost all his money and a hundred louis on his word. The banker then laid down the cards, and Tiretta told him in good Italian that he was a scoundrel. The Piedmontese replied with the utmost coolness that he was a liar. At that I said Tiretta had been joking, and I made him admit it, though he laughed as he spoke. He went off to his room. The affair had no consequences, and Tiretta would have been in the wrong.*

* Eight years later I saw Monsieur Paton in Petersburg, and in 1767 he was murdered in Poland. (C.'s note.)

That evening I preached him a most forceful sermon. I showed him that as soon as he played he laid himself open to the skill of the banker, who might be a scoundrel but at the same time a brave man, and hence, by daring to tell him so, he risked his life.

"Then am I to let myself be robbed?"

"Yes, for the choice is yours. You are at liberty not to play."

"By God, I won't pay the hundred louis."

"I advise you to pay even before he asks you for them."

Three quarters of an hour after I had gone to bed Mademoiselle de la M—re came to my arms, and we spent a much sweeter night than the first.

The next morning after breakfasting with Madame XXX and her lover I went back to Paris. Three or four days later Tiretta came to tell me that the merchant from Dunkirk had arrived, that he was to dine at Madame XXX's, and that she wanted me to be of the company. I dressed with anguish in my heart. I could neither consent to the marriage nor do what I could have done to prevent it. I found Mademoiselle de la M—re dressed more elaborately than usual.

"Your suitor," I said, "will not need all that to find you charming."

"My aunt does not think so. I am curious to see him, even though, since I trust you, I am sure he will never be my husband."

A moment later he arrived with the banker Kornmann,[46] who had arranged the marriage. I see a man of about forty with a handsome face expressing perfect frankness, very well dressed though unostentatiously, who presents himself to Madame XXX simply and politely and does not look at his future wife until Madame XXX introduces her to him. When he saw her his manner became less formal, and, eschewing any attempt at fine phrases, he said no more to her than that he hoped the impression she made on him might bear at least some resemblance to the impression he trusted he might make on her. She answered only with a graceful curtsy, continuing all the while to study him with grave attention.

Dinner is announced, the company sits down at table, all sorts of things are discussed, but never the marriage. The eyes of the couple met only by accident, and they never addressed each other. After dinner Mademoiselle withdrew to her room, and Madame went to her study with Monsieur Kornmann and the suitor, where she spent two hours. When they came out, since the gentlemen had to go back to Paris, she sent for her and in her presence told the suitor that she expected him the next day and that she was sure her niece would be glad to see him again.

"Will you not, my dear niece?"

"Yes, my dear Aunt. I shall be glad to see Monsieur again tomorrow."

But for that answer he would have left without having heard her voice.

"Well, what do you think of your husband?"

"Permit me, Aunt, not to talk of him until tomorrow; and at table please be so good as to talk to me; for it is possible that my looks may not have repelled him, but he cannot yet know if I am capable of thought."

"I am afraid you will say something stupid and spoil the good impression you have made on him."

"So much the better for him if the truth disabuses him, and so much the worse for him and for me if we decide to marry without first knowing at least something of each other's views and opinions."

"How do you like him?"

"I think he is agreeable; but let us wait until tomorrow. It may be he who will want no more of me tomorrow, for I am so stupid."

"I know perfectly well that you think you are bright; but that is exactly why you are stupid, despite Monsieur Casanova's saying that you have brains. He is laughing at you, my dear niece."

"I am certain he is not, my dear Aunt."

"There you are! No one could say anything more stupid."

"I beg your pardon," I said. "Mademoiselle is right in thinking that I am far from laughing at her, and I am also certain that tomorrow she will shine on whatever subjects we bring up for her."

"Then you will stay here; I am delighted. We will have a game of piquet and I will sit it out. My niece shall play with you, for she ought to learn."

Tiretta asked his little darling's permission to go to the theater. No visitors arrived, we played until suppertime; and after listening to Tiretta's attempts to tell us what the play was about we went off to bed.

I was surprised to see Mademoiselle de la M—re before me fully dressed.

"I will go and undress," she said, "after we have talked. Tell me frankly if I should consent to this marriage."

"How do you like Monsieur X?"

"I have nothing against him."

"Then consent."

"That is enough. Good-by. At this moment our love affair ends and our friendship begins. I am going to my own bed."

"Let our friendship begin tomorrow."

"No—not if it should kill me, and you too. It is hard, but I have made up my mind. If I am to become the man's wife, I must first assure myself that I am worthy of it. I may even be happy. Do not hold me, let me go. You know how much I love you."

"Let us at least kiss."

"Alas, no."

"You are weeping."

"No. In God's name, let me go!"

"Dear heart, you will go and weep in your room. I am in despair. Stay here. I will be your husband."

"No, I can no longer consent to it."

As she spoke these last words she tore her hands from mine and went, leaving me sunk in shame. I loathed myself. I did not know whether I was more guilty for having seduced her or for abandoning her to another.

At dinner the next day she shone. She conversed with her future husband so intelligently that I saw he was delighted with the treasure he was about to possess. As usual, I pretended to have a toothache as an excuse for saying nothing. Sad, thoughtful, and indeed ill from the painful night I had spent, I realized that I was in love, jealous, and in despair. Mademoiselle de la M—re never spoke to me or looked at me; she was right, but I would not admit it.

After dinner Madame went to her room with her niece and Monsieur X, and an hour later she came out and told us to congratulate her as she was to be married to Monsieur in a week and would leave with him for Dunkirk the same day.

"Tomorrow," she added, "we are all invited to dine at Monsieur Kornmann's, where the contract will be signed."

I am incapable of conveying to my reader the wretchedness which I felt.

They decided to go to the Comédie Française, and since there were four of them I excused myself. I went to Paris, where, thinking I had a fever, I immediately got into bed; but instead of my finding the rest I needed, the torments of my bitter repentance kept me in Hell. I believed that I must either stop the marriage or resign myself to dying. Being certain that Mademoiselle de la

M—re loved me, I could not believe that she would resist me when I made her understand that her refusal would cost me my life. With this idea in mind I got up and I wrote her a letter than which tumultuous passion could dictate nothing stronger. After thus soothing my grief I slept, and very early in the morning I sent my letter to Tiretta, asking him to convey it to the young lady secretly and saying that I would not leave my room until I had received an answer. I received it four hours later. This is what I read, trembling:

"My dear friend, it is too late. Leave your room. Come and dine at Monsieur Kornmann's, and be sure that in a few weeks we will both feel that we have won a great victory. Our love will no longer exist except in our memory. I beg you not to write to me again."

It was too much. Her refusal, with her more than cruel order not to write to her again, made me furious. I felt certain that her inconstant soul had fallen in love with the merchant. This supposition decided me to go and kill him. A hundred foul means of carrying out my infamous purpose crowded into a mind which, already in love and jealous, was now beside itself with anger, shame, and spite. Angel though she was, I saw her as a monster to be hated or a jilt to be punished. I thought of a method which could not fail, and though I considered it base I did not hesitate to embrace it. I determined to go to the future husband at Kornmann's where he was lodging and reveal to him all that had taken place between the young lady and myself, and, if that should not be enough to make him give up marrying her, to inform him that one of us must die, and finally, to murder him if he refused my challenge.

Thoroughly resolved to execute my horrible plan, the mere recollection of which today fills me with shame, I eat with a ravenous appetite, I go to bed, and I sleep soundly all night. When I wake I find no change in me.

I dress; I put a pair of excellent pistols in my pockets, and I go to Kornmann's in the Rue des Greniers-Saint-Lazare.[47] My rival was asleep; I wait. A quarter of an hour later I see him coming toward me with open arms. He embraces me; he says that he has been looking forward to my visit, for he could not but divine the feeling which he must also have inspired in one who was a friend of his future wife's and that he would always share in whatever feeling she entertained toward me.

His honest countenance, his frank manner, the conviction with which he spoke instantly make it impossible for me to talk to him as I had resolved to do. I am at a loss; I do not know what to say to him. Fortunately he gives me all the time I need to recover myself. He talked to me for a good quarter of an hour until Monsieur Kornmann came and coffee was brought. When I had to speak to him, what I said was unexceptionable.

Leaving the house a different man from the one who had entered it, I was amazed; not only was I glad that I had not carried out my purpose, I felt ashamed and humiliated that it was only to chance that I owed not being a base scoundrel. I ran into my brother, and after spending the morning with him I took him to dine at Silvia's, where I remained until midnight. I saw that it was her daughter who would make me forget Mademoiselle de la M—re, whom I felt that I must not see again before her marriage.

The next morning I packed my few traveling things in a hatbox and went to Versailles to pay my court to the ministers.

CHAPTER IV

The Abbé de Laville. The Abbé Galiani. Character of the Neapolitan dialect. I go to Dunkirk on a secret mission. I am completely successful. I return to Paris by way of Amiens. My comical escapades. Monsieur de la Bretonnière. My report gives satisfaction. I receive five hundred louis. Reflections.

THE MINISTER of Foreign Affairs asked me if I would be interested in undertaking secret missions and if I thought I had any aptitude in that way. I replied that I would be interested in anything which I considered honest and by which I could be sure of earning money, and that so far as aptitude was concerned I left it to him. He told me to go and talk with the Abbé de Laville.

The Abbé, the First Secretary, was a man of cold temperament, a profound politician, the soul of his department, and very highly esteemed. He had served the State well as Chargé d'Affaires at The Hague;[1] in gratitude, the King gave him a bishopric on the very day that he died. It was a little too late. The heir to all he possessed was Garnier,[2] a self-made man who had been cook to Monsieur d'Argenson[3] and who had become rich by profiting from the friendship which the Abbé de Laville had always felt for him. The two friends, who were about the same age, had named each other residuary legatee in wills which they had deposited with a notary. The survivor was Garnier.

The Abbé, then, after treating me to a short discourse on the nature of secret missions and on the prudence necessary in those who undertook them, said that he would inform me as soon as anything suitable for me turned up, and he kept me for dinner. At table I met the Abbé Galiani,[4] the Neapolitan Embassy Secretary. He was a brother of the Marchese Galiani, of whom I will speak when we come to my journey to the Kingdom of Naples. The Abbé was very witty. He had an extraordinary knack for giving his most serious remarks a tinge of humor, and always with a straight face, speaking French very well with the incorrigible Neapolitan accent, which made him a favorite in all circles. The Abbé de Laville told him that Monsieur Voltaire complained that his Henriade[5] had been translated into Neapolitan verse in a way which made readers laugh. He replied that Voltaire was in the wrong, for the nature of the Neapolitan language was such that it was impossible to handle it in verse except in a way which aroused laughter.

"If you can imagine it," he said, "we have translations of the Bible and the Iliad both of which are funny."

"I can believe it of the Bible, but I find it surprising in the case of the Iliad."

Having returned to Paris the day before Mademoiselle de la M—re, now Madame P., was to leave, I could not avoid going to Madame XXX's to congratulate her and wish her a good journey. I was more pleased than vexed by her easy and happy manner—a sure sign that I was cured. We talked to each other without the least constraint. I thought her husband a very worthy man. In response to his solicitations I promised him that I would visit them in Dunkirk, not intending to keep my word; but I did keep it. So Tiretta was left alone with his little darling, whom his fidelity made more madly in love with him every day.

My soul being now at peace, I began an Arcadian courtship of Manon Balletti, who every day gave me some new testimony to the progress which I was making in her heart. The friendship and esteem which I felt for her family kept me from harboring any idea of seducing her; but falling more in love with her every day and not intending to ask for her hand in marriage, I had no clear idea at what I was aiming.

At the beginning of May[6] the Abbé de Bernis wrote me that I should go to Versailles to talk with the Abbé de Laville. The Abbé asked me if I thought I was capable of paying a visit to ten or twelve warships which were anchored at Dunkirk and becoming well enough acquainted with their commanding officers to give him a detailed report on how well they were provisioned in all respects, especially as to their supplies in general, the numbers of their crews, their stock of munitions of all kinds, their administration, and their discipline. I answered that I could try, that when I returned I would give him my report in writing, and that it would be for him to tell me if I had done well.

"Since it is a secret mission," he said, "I cannot give you any letters. I can only wish you a successful journey and give you some money."

"I do not want any money. When I return you may give me what you consider I have deserved; as for my making a successful journey, I shall need at least three days before starting, for I must get some sort of letter."

"Then try to be back before the end of the month. That is all I have to say."

On the same day I had a half hour's conversation at the Palais Bourbon with my patron, who, unable to resist praising me for my delicacy in refusing to take any money in advance, gave me another roll of a hundred louis with his usual magnanimity. From then on I never again needed to make use of the generous man's purse, not even at Rome fourteen years later.

"Since the mission is secret," he said, "I am sorry that I cannot give you a passport; but through Silvia you can obtain one on some pretext from the First Gentleman of the Bedchamber[7] now serving. You must be extremely prudent in your behavior, and above all keep clear of anything in munere ['in the way of bribery'],[8] for you know, I believe, that if you get into any difficulty appealing to your principal will avail you nothing. You will be disowned. The only acknowledged spies are the ambassadors. So you need to be even more reserved and circumspect than they are. If when you come back you will let me see your report before you take it to the Abbé de Laville, I will give you my advice regarding what I think you should omit from it."

Full of this business, in which I was a complete novice, I told Silvia that, as I wanted to accompany some English friends to Calais and return to Paris, she would do me a great favor if she would obtain a passport for me from the Duke of Gesvres.[9] Glad to oblige me, she wrote to the Duke, telling me that I must deliver the letter to him personally, since passports of this kind could not be issued unless they contained a description of the bearer. They were valid only in the so-called Île de France,[10] but they procured respect in all the northern part of the kingdom. So I went to him with her husband. The Duke was at his estate in Saint-Ouen.[11] No sooner had he seen me and read Silvia's letter than he had a passport issued for me; and after leaving Mario I went to La Villette to ask Madame XXX if she wanted me to take any message from her to her niece. She said that I could take her the box of porcelain figures if Monsieur Kornmann had not yet sent it. So I went to see the banker, who delivered it to me and to whom I gave a hundred louis, asking him for the same amount in a letter of credit on a reliable house in Dunkirk together with a personal recommendation, since I was going there for pleasure. Kornmann gladly did both, and I set out toward evening of the same day.

Three days later I put up at the Conciergerie[12] in Dunkirk. An hour after my arrival I gave the charming Madame P. the most pleasant surprise by delivering her box and conveying her aunt's compliments to her. Just as she was praising her husband to me and saying that he made her happy, he arrived and, delighted to see me, at once offered me a room without even asking if my stay in Dunkirk was to be long or short. After duly thanking him and promising that I would come and take potluck for dinner at his house from time to time, I asked him to show me the way to the banker to whom Monsieur Kornmann had recommended me.

Scarcely had the banker read the letter before he gave me a hundred louis and asked me to expect him at my inn toward evening, when he would introduce me to the Commandant. The latter was Monsieur du Bareil.[13] With the politeness of all Frenchmen in high office, the Commandant, after asking me the usual questions, invited me to sup with his wife, who was still at the theater. She received me as cordially as her husband had done, and having excused myself from cards, I began making the acquaintance of the company, especially of the army and navy officers. Making a point of talking about all the European navies and giving myself out to be an expert on the subject from having served in the fleet of my Republic, it took me no more than three days not only to pick up an acquaintance of all the naval captains but to become good friends with them. I rattled away about shipbuilding and the Venetian system of maneuvers, and I observed that the worthy sailors who listened to me were even more attentive when I talked nonsense than they were when I said anything sensible. On the fourth day one of the captains invited me on board his ship for dinner; whereupon all the others invited me either to breakfast or to a between-meals repast. I devoted the entire day to each of the captains who thus honored me. I showed interest in everything, I went down into the hold, I asked countless questions, and everywhere I found young officers eager to show their importance, whom I had no difficulty in pumping. I got them to confide to me whatever I needed to know for my detailed report. Before going to bed I wrote down everything good or bad I had learned during the day about the ship on which I had been. I slept only four or five hours. In two weeks I considered that I had learned enough.

During this journey neither women nor any other pleasure turned me from my course; my mission was always the sole thing in my mind and the sole object of all my efforts. I dined once at the banker Kornmann's and once at Monsieur P.'s in the city and a second time in a small country house he owned a league away. Madame P. took me there in her carriage, and when she was alone with me I saw that she was delighted with my behavior. I showed her nothing but the fondest friendship. Seeing that she was charming, and my love affair with her having ended only five or six weeks earlier, I was surprised at my coldness. I knew myself too well to attribute my behavior to my virtue. Then what accounted for it? An Italian proverb, which speaks for human nature, gives the real reason: C. . . non vuol pensieri ("The p[rick] does not want to think").[14]

My mission being accomplished, I took leave of everyone and got into my post chaise to return to Paris, giving myself the pleasure of taking a different route from that by which I had come. Arriving about midnight at I forget what post station, I order horses to go on to the next. The postilion says that the next post is at Aire,[15] a fortified town which could not be entered at night. I answer that I will get the gate opened for me and I repeat my order to put two horses to my chaise. I come to Aire. The postilion cracks his whip and says, "Courier." After an hour's wait the gate is opened and I am told that I must go to see the Commandant.[16] I go there, cursing, and am shown into an alcove in which a man in an elegant nightcap was in bed with a woman whose pretty face I could see.

"Whose courier are you?"

"Nobody's, but since I am in a hurry——"

"That will do. We will talk tomorrow. Meanwhile you will stay in the guardhouse. Let me sleep. Be off."

I was taken to the guardhouse, where I spent the rest of the night sitting on the ground. Day breaks, I shout, I swear, I say that I must go. No one answers. Ten o'clock strikes; raising my voice, I tell the officer on duty that the Commandant has it in his power to have me murdered but that I cannot be refused writing materials or a courier for Paris. He asks my name; I show it to him on my passport; he says he will take it to the Commandant to read; I snatch it from him; he tells me to go with him and speak to the Commandant, and I consent.

We go. The officer enters first and comes out four minutes later to show me in too. I hand the Commandant my passport, he reads it, looking at me to see if I am the person named in it, then hands it back to me, saying that I am free. He orders the officer to let me take post horses.

"By now," I said, "I am no longer in a hurry. I have to send a courier to someone and wait for him to come back. By delaying my journey you have broken the law of nations.''

''It is you who broke it by saying that you were a courier.''

''On the contrary, I told you that I was not.''

''You told the postilion you were, and that is enough.''

''The postilion lied. All I said to him was that I would get the gate opened for me.''

''Why didn't you show me your passport?''

''Why didn't you give me time enough?''

''In three or four days we shall know which of us is in the wrong.''

''Do whatever you please.''

I was taken to the post station, which was also the inn, and a moment later I see my post chaise at the door. I ask the post master for an express messenger ready to leave at my demand, a room with a good bed, paper, pens, and ink, a broth at once and a good dinner at two o'clock. I have my trunk and everything I had in my chaise carried upstairs, I undress, I wash, and I sit down to write, not knowing to whom, for when all was said and done I was in the wrong; but I had undertaken to show my importance and I felt I must continue to play the role I had assumed. However, I was sorry I had made it necessary for me to stay in Aire until the messenger for whom I had asked should return. I had decided to spend the night there, at least I should get some rest. I had nothing on but my shirt and I was drinking the broth I had ordered when the Commandant appeared before me unattended.

''I am sorry,'' he said most politely, ''that you think you have reason to complain, whereas I have only done my duty, for I had to believe what your postilion would never have said unless you had ordered him to do so.''

''That is possible, but your duty did not extend to turning me out of your room.''

"I needed sleep."

"And I need it now, but politeness keeps me from imitating you."

"May I make bold to ask you if you have ever served?"

"I have served on land and sea, and I resigned at the age when many others are beginning."

"If you have served you must know that the gate of a fortified town is never opened at night except to royal couriers and to the supreme military command."

"But once it has been opened politeness might be observed."

"Are you disposed to dress and take a walk with me?"

I am as pleased by his proposal as I am nettled by his haughtiness. The thought of a sword thrust given or received comes to me instantly as a most attractive prospect. I answer calmly and respectfully that the honor of taking a walk with him is enough to make me put off all other business. I asked him to sit down while I hastened to dress. I put on my breeches, throwing the pistols which were in their pockets onto the bed, I send down for a hairdresser who does my hair in two minutes, and I draw my sword from an oilcloth sheath and hang it at my side. After locking my room I leave the key with the innkeeper, and we go out.

After walking along two or three streets we go through a porte-cochere into a courtyard through which I expect we will pass; but he stops at the end of it in front of an open door and I see a numerous gathering of men and women. It did not occur to me to turn back.

"This is my wife," said the Commandant, and, in the same breath, "this," he said to her, "is Monsieur de Casanova who has come to dine with us."

"I am very glad," said the beautiful woman, rising after laying down her cards; "otherwise, Monsieur, I should never have forgiven you for the distress you caused us by having us waked last night."

"Yet it is a fault for which I have paid rather dearly, Madame. After such a Purgatory permit me to say that I deserve the Paradise in which I find myself."

At that she laughed, made me sit down beside her, and returned to the game. I instantly realized that I had been outwitted in masterly fashion; but there was nothing I could do but put a good face on it, and the more so since the pretty trick got me out of a very ugly situation at no cost to my honor and gave me a very plausible excuse for leaving without sending the courier I had ordered to I knew not whom. The Commandant, whose pleasure in his victory put him in high spirits, spoke of the war,[17] the court, the news of the day, often addressing his remarks to me as imperturbably as if there had never been any quarrel between us. He was enjoying himself thoroughly in his role of hero of the play; but on my side I maintained the attitude of a young man who has obliged an old officer to accord him a reparation, for such it was and one which did me all the honor I could ask.

Dinner was served, and since success in my role depended entirely on how well I played it, I have seldom been more wide awake than I was at the table, where the only remarks addressed to me simply provided pretty opportunities for Madame to shine. She was at least thirty years younger than her husband, and the misunderstanding which had condemned me to six hours in the guardhouse was not once mentioned; but at dessert the Commandant himself almost brought things to a head by a sly joke which was not worth making.

"It was very kind of you," he said to me, "to believe that I was going to fight you. I fooled you."

"I don't know if I believed it," I answered, "but I know that I was instantly curious to see what the walk on which you invited me would turn out to be, and I admire your cleverness. But far from considering myself fooled, I consider that you have made me reparation, and I am very grateful to you."

He did not answer, and we rose from the table. Madame invited me to make a third at ombre, then we went for a walk, and toward nightfall I took my leave; but I did not resume my journey until the next morning, after making a fair copy of my report.

At five o'clock in the morning I was sleeping in my chaise when I was waked. I was at the gate of the city of Amiens, and the person who waked me was a clerk of the office at which the duties levied on merchandise in transit are paid. The clerk asked me if I had anything forbidden by the King's orders. In a bad humor, like any man whom some brute deprives of sweet sleep to ask him a tiresome question, I reply that by G.. I had nothing and that he could f...... well have let me go on sleeping.

"Since you see fit to be rude, we shall see."

He orders the postilion to bring my chaise in, has my bags taken off, tells me to get out, demands my keys, and keeps me waiting while everything has been examined.

I at once realized the mistake I had made, and I could no longer set it right. As I had nothing, there was nothing to fear, but my petulance was to cost me two hours of boredom while I raged in silence and let the villains use the right they had. I saw their pleasure in their revenge portrayed on their insolent faces. The clerks who in those days were stationed at the gates of French cities to examine travelers were the scum of the earth; but when they were politely treated by people of distinction they prided themselves on becoming tractable. A twenty-four-sou piece[18] graciously proffered made them human; they bowed to the traveler, they wished him a good journey and gave him no trouble. I knew all this; but there are moments when a man gives in to bad temper and forgets, or disregards, what he knows.

The brutes emptied my bags and even unfolded my shirts, among which, they said, I might have English laces. After going through everything they gave me back my keys; but that was not the end of it. My chaise had to be searched. The scoundrel who searches it exults when he finds the remains of a pound of snuff which I had bought at Saint-Omer[19] on my way to Dunkirk. The head of the gang triumphantly orders my chaise impounded and tells me I must pay a fine of twelve hundred francs.

This time I really lost my patience, and I leave my reader to guess all that I said to the cutthroats. I told them to take me to the Intendant;[20] but they answered that I was free to find my own way there. Surrounded by a growing mob, I enter the city, striding along like a madman. I go into the first open shop I see and ask the proprietor to take me to the Intendant; I tell my story, and a respectable-looking man who happened to be there says that he will show me the way himself but that I shall not find him since he must already be informed of the affair. He says that unless I pay or give security I will not easily escape from my difficulty. I ask him to show me the way and leave the rest to me. He says that I must first get rid of the mob by sending a louis to a distant tavern and telling them to go there for breakfast. I give him a louis and ask him to do me the favor. He executed the maneuver most successfully, and the whole mob disappeared with joyous shouts. Such is the people which today believes itself to be the King of France. The man who was to take me to the Intendant tells me that he is a prosecutor[21] by profession.

We arrive at the Intendant's house; but the porter tells us that he has gone out alone, that he will not come home until evening, and that he does not know where he will dine.

"There's the whole day gone," said the Prosecutor.

"Let us look for him where he is likely to be, he must have friends, habits. I will pay you a louis for your time."

"I am at your orders."

We spent four hours vainly looking for him at ten or twelve houses. In all of them I had talked to the master or the mistress, always exaggerating the indignity to which I had been subjected. They listened, they condoled with me, but the only comfort they offered me was to say that he would certainly come home to sleep and that then he would have to hear me out.

At half past one the Prosecutor took me to the house of an old lady who had great influence in the city. She was at table alone. After listening attentively to my story, she said with the greatest composure that she did not think it would be indiscreet in her to tell a stranger where to find a man whose office forbade him ever to be inaccessible.

"And so, Monsieur, I can reveal to you what is no secret. My daughter told me last evening that she was invited to Madame XX's and that the Intendant was to dine there too. So go there now, and you will find him at table with the best society in Amiens. I advise you," she said with a smile, "to go in without being announced. The servants taking dishes from the kitchen to the dining room will show you the way without your asking them. Once there, you can speak to him whether he likes it or not and despite your not knowing him; he will hear all the horrors you have told me in your justifiable indignation. I am sorry I cannot be present when you stage your surprise."

I bowed to her hurriedly and ran to the house she had named, accompanied by the exhausted Prosecutor. I had no difficulty finding my way with the servants and my guide to a room in which I saw twenty people at table in high spirits.

"Pray excuse me, ladies and gentlemen," I said, addressing the company, "if in the terrible state in which you see me I am obliged to come here to trouble the peace and festivity of your repast."

At this compliment, uttered in thunderous tones, everyone rises. My hair was in disorder and I was dripping with sweat; my face was that of a fiend; the reader can imagine the surprise of a company made up entirely of elegant women and of men entitled to pay court to them.

''For the last seven hours,'' I went on, ''I have been searching every house in this city for His Honor the Intendant, whom at last I find here because I know that here he is and that, if he has ears, he now hears me. I have come, then, to tell him to order his henchmen, who have impounded my conveyance, to release it to me instantly so that I can continue my journey. If Catalan laws[22] decree that, for seven ounces of snuff, which are for my own personal use, I must pay twelve hundred francs, I repudiate them and I inform him that I will not pay a sou. I will remain here, I will send a courier to my Ambassador, who will complain to the King that the law of nations has been violated upon my person in the Île de France, and I will have satisfaction. Louis XV is great enough to refuse to make himself an accomplice in these extraordinary and murderous proceedings. Moreover, if reparation is denied me this affair will become a great affair of State, for what my Republic will do in reprisal will not be to have every Frenchman traveling in her States murdered but to order every one of them to leave her territories. This is who I am. Read.''

Foaming with rage, I throw my passport in the middle of the table. A man picks it up and reads it, and I infer that he is the Intendant. While the paper passed from hand to hand among the startled guests he haughtily said to me that he was in Amiens for no purpose but to enforce the ordinances and that consequently I should not leave unless I paid or furnished security.

''If that is your duty, you should consider my passport an ordinance. Be my security yourself, if you are a gentleman.''

"Does the nobility in your country stand security for lawbreakers?"

"The nobility in my country does not lower itself by accepting dishonorable employments."

"In the King's service no employment is dishonorable."

"The hangman uses the same language."

"Take care what you say."

"Take care what you do. Know, Monsieur, that I am a free man and a man of nice honor who has been outraged and that I am afraid of nothing. I defy you to have me thrown out of the window."

"Monsieur," a lady said to me imperiously, "in my house no one is thrown out of the window."

"Anger, Madame, often makes a man lose his head. I am at your feet craving your forgiveness. Be so good as to consider that this is the first time in my life that I am the victim of fraudulent proceedings in a kingdom in which I believed I need only be on guard against the attacks of highway robbers; for them I have pistols; for these gentlemen I have a passport, but I find that it is worthless. For seven ounces of snuff which I bought at Saint-Omer three weeks ago this gentleman despoils me and interrupts my journey, when the King himself is my surety that no one will dare to interrupt it; I am ordered to pay fifty louis, I am consigned to the fury of a raging mob, from which that worthy man there delivered me for a price; I am treated like a criminal, and the man who should defend me sneaks away and hides. His cutthroats at the gate of this city have rumpled my coats and shirts to avenge themselves on me for not having given them twenty-four sous. What has happened to me will be the talk of the diplomatic corps at Versailles and Paris tomorrow, and in a very few days it will be read in numerous gazettes. I will not pay one sou. Speak, sir," I said to the Intendant. "Shall I send a courier to the Duke of Gesvres?"

"Pay. And if you refuse to pay, do whatever you please."

"Then good-by, ladies and gentlemen."

Just as I am leaving the room like a madman, I hear a voice telling me in Italian to wait a moment. I see an elderly man, who addresses the Intendant in these words:

"Give orders at once that the gentleman may leave. I will stand security for him. Do you hear me, Intendant? You do not know the Italian spirit. I served through the whole of the last war in Italy, and I had several opportunities to learn what it is. I consider that this gentleman is in the right."

"Very well, then," the Intendant said to me. "Simply pay thirty or forty francs to the office, for the matter has already been recorded."

"I repeat that I will pay nothing. But who are you, worthy sir, who stand surety for me without knowing me?"

"I am a commissary of war,[23] my name is La Bretonnière,[24] I live in Paris at the Hôtel de Saxe[25] in the Rue du Colombier; I shall be there day after tomorrow. Do me the honor of calling on me and we will go to Monsieur de Britard,[26] who, when he has been apprised of the matter, will release me from my suretyship, which I assume on your behalf with great pleasure."

After expressing all my gratitude to him and assuring him that he would see me at his lodging very soon, I made my excuses to the entire company and went to dine at an inn, inviting my worthy Prosecutor, who was beside himself, to accompany me. As we rose from the table I gave him two louis. But for this man and the stalwart Commissary, I should have been in a great quandary, for though I was not short of money I would never have made up my mind to leave fifty louis there.

My chaise being ready at the door of the inn, just as I was getting into it one of the clerks who had gone through my belongings came up and said that I should find everything in it that I had left there.

"That would surprise me," I answered; "shall I find my snuff too?"

"The snuff, my Prince, has been confiscated."

"That is too bad. I would have given you a louis."

"I'll go for it now."

"I haven't time to wait. Whip up, postilion."

I arrived in Paris the next day. Four days later I went to see La Bretonnière, who took me to the Farmer-General Britard, who released him from his suretyship. He was a young and very agreeable man, who blushed for all that I had been made to suffer.

I at once took my report to the Minister, at the Hôtel de Bourbon; he spent two hours with me making me delete whatever he considered unnecessary. I spent the night making a fair copy of it, and the next day I took it to Versailles to the Abbé de Laville, who after coldly reading it said he would let me know the outcome at his convenience. A month later I received five hundred louis, and I had the pleasure to learn that Monsieur de Crémille,[27] the Minister of Marine, found my whole report not only accurate but informative. A number of well-founded apprehensions made me decline the honor of making myself known to him, though my patron wished to procure it for me.

When I related my two adventures to him, one at Aire and the other at Amiens, he was amused; but he told me that the true courage of a man on a secret mission should consist in his never getting into difficulties, for even if he was able to get out of them with no help but his cleverness they were bound to make him talked about and that was precisely what he should avoid.

My mission cost the Department of Marine twelve thousand francs. The Minister could easily have found out everything I told him in my report without spending a sou. Any young officer could have served his turn, and any intelligent young officer would have served it well in order to gain his good opinion. But such were all the departments of the French ministry under the monarchical government. They squandered money which cost them nothing on their henchmen and on anyone they liked; they were despots, the people was downtrodden, the State in debt, and the finances in such bad condition that the inevitable bankruptcy would have overthrown it: a revolution was necessary. This is the language of the representatives who today reign in France, pretending to be the faithful ministers of the master of the Republic, the people. Poor people! Stupid people, which dies of hunger and poverty or goes to be massacred all over Europe to enrich those who have deceived it.

Silvia found my adventures at Aire and Amiens very amusing, and her daughter condoled with me over the wretched night I had been forced to spend in the guardhouse at Aire. I replied that I should have been in despair if I had had a wife with me, and she retorted that if she was a good wife it would have been her duty to go to the guardhouse with her husband.

"On the contrary, my dear daughter," said Silvia in her wisdom; "in such cases a wife who deserves the name, after seeing to the safety of their carriage, goes to the person in charge to plead for her husband's release."

CHAPTER V

The Count of La Tour d'Auvergne and Madame d'Urfé. Camilla. My passion for the Count's mistress; ridiculous incident which cures me. The Count of Saint-Germain.

DESPITE THIS budding love I did not lose my taste for the mercenary beauties who brightened the haunts of pleasure and got themselves talked about; but those who most interested me were the kept women and the ones who claimed to belong to the public only because they sang or danced or acted. Considering themselves free women in all other respects, they enjoyed their privilege by surrendering now to love, now to money, and sometimes to both at once. I had very easily managed to make the acquaintance of them all. The lobbies of the theaters are the noble mart to which men so inclined repair to exercise their talent for entering on intrigues. I had profited well from this pleasant school; I began by making friends with their official lovers, and I succeeded by never asserting any pretensions and especially by appearing to be not ingenuous but innocuous. It was always necessary to have my purse ready when the occasion demanded, but since the sums were not large the pain was not as great as the pleasure. I was sure that in one way or another it would be made worth my while.

Camilla,[1] actress and dancer at the Comédie Italienne, whom I had begun to love at Fontainebleau seven years earlier, was the woman of this kind on whom I especially fastened because of the pleasures I enjoyed in her small house at the Barrière Blanche,[2] where she lived with her lover the Count of Égreville,[3] who made much of me among their guests. The brother of the Marquis de Gamaches[4] and of the Countess du Rumain,[5] he was a handsome young man, very amiable and reasonably rich. He was never so happy as when he saw a great deal of company in his mistress's house. She loved only him; but, full of intelligence and tact, she drove none of her admirers to despair; neither miserly nor prodigal in granting her favors, she made all the members of her circle adore her without having to fear either a blabbing tongue or the mortification of being cast off.

After her lover the man whom she honored with her attention above all the rest was the Count of La Tour d'Auvergne.[6] He was a nobleman of ancient lineage who adored her and who, not being rich enough to have her entirely to himself, had to be content with the share in her which she granted him. She was said to love him second best. She allowed him a modest sum for the expenses of a young girl whom she had, in a manner of speaking, given him as a present on seeing that he had fallen in love with her when she was in her service. La Tour d'Auvergne kept her at Paris with him in furnished rooms in the Rue Taranne;[7] he said that he loved her because she was a present his dear Camilla had given him; and he often took her to sup with her at the Barrière Blanche. She was fifteen years old, simple, ingenuous, without a grain of ambition; she told her lover she would never forgive him an infidelity except with Camilla, to whom she thought she must yield him because she owed her happiness to her. I fell so much in love with the girl that I often went to sup at Camilla's only in the hope of finding her there and enjoying the artless remarks with which she enchanted the entire company. I tried my best not to betray myself, but I was so mad about her that by the time supper was over I would often have become very gloomy because I saw that my passion could not be cured in the usual way. Allowing my condition to be suspected would have made me ridiculous, and Camilla would have railed at me mercilessly. But now for what happened to cure me of my passion.

As Camilla's little house was at the Barrière Blanche I sent my lackey for a hackney coach to take me home when everyone was ready to leave after supper. Since we had remained at table until an hour after midnight he told me that no coaches were to be found. La Tour d'Auvergne said that it would be no inconvenience to him to take me home, though his carriage was only for two.

"My little girl," he said, "will sit on our laps."

I accept, of course, and here I am in the carriage, with the Count at my left and Babet sitting on our thighs. Full of desire, I determine to seize the opportunity, and, wasting no time, for the coachman was driving fast, I take her hand, squeeze it, she squeezes mine, I gratefully raise it to my lips, covering it with silent kisses, and, impatient to convince her of my ardor, I proceed as my state of bliss demands that I do; but just at the moment of crisis I hear La Tour d'Auvergne saying:

"I am obliged to you, my dear friend, for a piece of your country's politeness of which I thought I was no longer worthy; I hope it is not a mistake."

At these horrifying words I put out my hand, I feel the sleeve of his coat; there is no such thing as presence of mind at such a moment, and the more so since the words were followed by a laugh which would have confounded the most hardened of men. I let go, unable either to laugh at the thing or deny it. Babet asked her lover why he was laughing so hard, and when he tried to tell her the reason laughter overcame him again, I said nothing, and I felt an utter fool. Fortunately the carriage soon stopped at my lodging, and, my lackey opening the door for me, I went in, wishing them a good night, which La Tour d'Auvergne reciprocated still laughing uproariously. As for me, I did not begin to laugh at the episode until half an hour later, for, after all, it was funny; nevertheless it depressed and vexed me, for I saw that I must expect to be the butt of many jokes.

Three or four days later I decided to go at nine in the morning and ask the obliging nobleman to give me breakfast, for Camilla had sent to inquire after my health. I did not mean to let the incident stop my visits to her, but I wanted first to know how the thing had been taken.

As soon as the charming La Tour saw me he exploded into laughter and after laughing his fill came and embraced me, mincing like a girl. I begged him, half humorously, half seriously, to forget my silly blunder, for I really did not know how to defend myself.

"Why try to defend yourself?" he answered. "We all like you, it is a very funny story, which has delighted us and delights us every evening."

"Then everyone knows of it?"

"Can you doubt that? Camilla is dying of laughter, and you must come this evening, I'll bring Babet, and she will set you laughing too, for she maintains that you made no mistake."

"She is right."

"What! she is right? Tell that to someone else. You do me too much honor, and I do not believe a word of it; but you are taking the right stand."

And it was the stand I took at table, pretending to be amazed at La Tour's indiscretion and saying that I was cured of my passion for him. Babet called me a dirty swine and refused to believe I was cured. For unfathomable reasons the episode turned me against her and attached me to La Tour d'Auvergne, who had every quality to make everyone like him. But my friendship for him very nearly had a disastrous consequence.

It was on a Monday in the foyer of the Comédie Italienne that the charming Count asked me to lend him a hundred louis, promising to return them on Saturday.

"I haven't that much. But here is my purse at your service," I said, "with ten or twelve louis."

"I need a hundred, and immediately, for I lost them last night on my word at the Princess of Anhalt's." * [8]

"I haven't that much."

"A collector of the lottery must have over a thousand."

"Of course, but my cash box is sacred; I have to turn it over to the fiscal agent a week from today."

"It won't keep you from turning it over, for I will return them to you on Saturday. Take a hundred louis from your cash box, and put my word of honor in their place. Do you think it worth a hundred louis?"

At that I turn my back on him, telling him to wait for me, I go to my office in the Rue Saint-Denis, I take a hundred louis, and I bring them to him. Saturday arrives, I do not see him, and on Sunday morning I pawn my ring and put the same amount in my cash box, which I turn over to the fiscal agent the next day. Three or four days later in the amphitheater of the Comédie Française, up comes La Tour d'Auvergne and apologizes. I reply by showing him my hand and saying that I had pawned my ring to save my honor. He answers gloomily that someone has failed him but that he is sure he can return the amount to me on the following Saturday:

---

* She was the mother of Empress Catherine of Russia. (C.'s note.)

"And I give you," he said, "my word of honor for it."

"Your word of honor is in my cash box, so you will permit me not to count on it further; you may return the hundred louis to me when you please."

At these words I saw the gallant nobleman turn as pale as a corpse.

"My word of honor, my dear Casanova," he said, "is dearer to me than life, and I will give you the hundred louis tomorrow morning at nine o'clock a hundred paces from the coffeehouse at the end of the Champs Élysées. I will give them to you privately, no one will see us, I hope that you will not fail to be there and that you will have your sword, as I shall have mine."

"I find it very regrettable, sir, that you insist on my paying so dearly for a jest. You do me infinite honor, but I would rather apologize to you, if that can prevent this unfortunate matter from going further."

"No, I am far more in the wrong than you, and the wrong can only be undone by the blood of one of us. Will you come?"

"Yes."

I supped at Silvia's in great depression, for I loved the gallant man, and I loved myself no less. I felt I was in the wrong, for my jest had really been too cutting, but it did not enter my mind not to keep the appointment.

I arrived at the coffeehouse a moment after he did; we breakfasted, he paid, and we left and walked in the direction of the Étoile. When we were sure we were not observed he handed me a roll of a hundred louis with the greatest courtesy; and, saying that one thrust should suffice on either side, he unsheathed after stepping back four paces. My only answer was to unsheathe too, and as soon as I saw that I was in measure I gave him my straight lunge, and, certain that I had wounded him in the chest, I jumped back, calling upon him to keep his word. Mild as a lamb, he lowered his sword, put his hand to his chest, and, showing it to me stained with blood, said that he was satisfied. I spoke to him with all the civility of which I was capable and which the occasion demanded, while he applied a handerchief to his chest. I was very glad when, looking at the point of my sword, I saw that only one line[9] of it showed blood. I offered to see him home and he refused. He asked me to be discreet and to be his friend thenceforward. After embracing him in tears, I went home very sad and considerably wiser in the ways of the world. Our meeting never became known. A week later we supped together at Camilla's.

About this same time I received twelve thousand francs from the Abbé de Laville as the honorarium for the mission I had accomplished in Dunkirk. Camilla told me that La Tour d'Auvergne was in bed because of his sciatica, adding that if I liked we would pay him a visit the next day. I accepted, we went, and after breakfasting I told him gravely that if he would let me do what I wished to his thigh I would cure it, for his trouble was not what was called "sciatica" but a damp humor which I would dispel with the Talisman of Solomon[10] and five words. He laughed but told me to do whatever I pleased.

"Then I will go and buy a brush."

"I will send a servant."

"No, for I must be sure that it is bought without haggling, and I have to get some drugs too."

I went for niter, flowers of sulphur, mercury, and a small brush, and I told him I needed a small quantity of his urine, which must be fresh. His laughter and Camilla's did not impair my gravity; I handed him a glass, I drew his curtains, and he obeyed me. After making a little amalgam with it, I told Camilla to rub his thigh with her hands while I murmured a spell, but that all would be lost if she laughed. After spending a good quarter of an hour laughing, they finally prevailed on themselves to behave as I was behaving. La Tour exposed his thigh to Camilla, who, pretending she was acting a role in a play, began massaging the patient while I mumbled words which they could not possibly understand since I did not myself know what I was saying. I almost spoiled the performance myself when I saw the faces Camilla was making to keep from laughing. Nothing could be funnier. After telling them at last that there had been enough massage I dipped the brush in the amalgam and, making one continuous stroke, drew the Sign of Solomon on him—the five-pointed star composed of five lines, thus ⛤. After that I wrapped his thigh in three napkins and told him that if he could stay in bed and not unwrap it for twenty-four hours I guaranteed that he would be cured. What pleased me was that I heard no more laughter from them. They were astonished.

After this comedy, which I made up and acted with neither purpose nor premeditation, we left, and in the hackney coach on the way I told Camilla a quantity of wonderful tales, to which she listened so attentively that when I left her I saw that she was vastly impressed.

At eight o'clock in the morning four or five days later, when I had almost forgotten what I had done to Monsieur de La Tour d'Auvergne, I hear horses stopping at my door. I look out of my window, I see him dismount and come in.

“You were sure of the result,” he said, embracing me, “since you did not come to see how I was getting on the morning after your amazing treatment.”

“Certainly I was sure, but if I had had time you would have seen me nevertheless.”

“Tell me if I am allowed to take a bath.”

“No bath until you feel you are cured.”

“I will obey you. Everyone is amazed, for I could not help telling all my acquaintances about your miracle. I find skeptics who laugh at me, but I let them say what they please.”

"You should have kept the secret, I think, for you know Paris. Everyone will say I am a quack."

"Not everyone is so narrow-minded, and I have come to ask you to do me a favor."

"What is your pleasure?"

"I have an aunt who is not only well known but famous for her knowledge of all the abstruse sciences, a great chemist, a woman of intelligence, extremely rich, sole mistress of her fortune, and whose acquaintance can only be useful to you. She is dying to meet you, for she claims that she knows you and that you are not the man Paris believes you to be. She begged me to bring you to dinner at her house, and I hope that you will have no objection. My aunt is the Marquise d'Urfé." [11]

I did not know her, but the name d'Urfé impressed me at once, for I knew the story of the famous Anne d'Urfé,[12] who had flourished at the end of the sixteenth century. The lady was the widow of his great-grandson; and I saw that, having entered the family, she might well have become versed in all the sublime doctrines of a science which greatly interested me though I considered it chimerical. I therefore answered Monsieur de La Tour d'Auvergne that I would go to his aunt's house with him whenever he pleased, but not for dinner unless there would be only the three of us.

"She has twelve people to dinner every day, and you will eat at her house with the best of Parisian society."

"That is exactly what I do not want, for I loathe the reputation of magician, which, in the kindness of your heart, you must have given me."

"Not at all; you are known and you are highly regarded. The Duchess of Lauraguais[13] told me that you went to the Palais-Royal four or five years ago and spent whole days with the Duchess of Orléans,[14] and Madame de Boufflers,[15] Madame du Blot,[16] and even Melfort[17] have spoken to me about you. You are wrong not to cultivate your old acquaintances. What you have done for me convinces me that you could have a brilliant and lucrative career. I know any number of the best people in Paris, both men and women, who have the same malady as mine and who would give you half of their possessions if you cured them.''

La Tour's reasoning was sound; but since I knew that what I had done to him was only a prank which had happened to succeed I had no wish to incur publicity. I told him that I absolutely declined to make a spectacle of myself, and that he had only to tell his aunt that I would wait on her privately and not otherwise and that I left it to her to indicate the day and the hour. When I got home about midnight of the same day I found a note from the Count telling me to be at the Terrasse des Capucins at the Tuileries the next day at noon, where he would meet me to take me to dinner at his aunt's, and assuring me that we should find her door open only to us.

Meeting punctually at the appointed place and hour, we went to the lady's house the next day. She lived on the Quai des Théatins[18] next door to the Hôtel de Bouillon. Beautiful despite her age, Madame d'Urfé received me most courteously with all the easy grace of the old court in the days of the Regency.[19] We spent an hour and a half in desultory conversation, but all the while, though of course we did not confess to it, she was studying me as closely as I was studying her. Each of us was trying to trap the other into admissions. I had no difficulty in pretending to be ignorant, for I really was so. Madame d'Urfé displayed nothing except curiosity, but I clearly saw that she could not wait to parade her lore. At two o'clock the three of us were served the same dinner which was served every day for twelve. After dinner La Tour d'Auvergne left us to go and see Prince Turenne,[20] whom he had left that morning with a high fever, and then Madame d'Urfé began talking to me of chemistry, alchemy, magic, and all the things with which she was infatuated. When we came to the subject of the Great Work[21] and I guilelessly asked her if she was acquainted with the primordial substance, she did not burst out laughing, for that would have been impolite, but with a gracious smile she told me that she already possessed what was called the philosopher's stone and that she was versed in all the great operations. She showed me her library,[22] which had belonged to the great D'Urfé[23] and his wife Renée of Savoy[24] and to which she had added manuscripts which had cost her more than a hundred thousand francs. Her favorite author was Paracelsus,[25] who, according to her, had been neither man nor woman and had had the misfortune to poison himself with too strong a dose of the universal medicine.[26] She showed me a small manuscript which set forth the great operation in French in very clear terms. She said she did not keep it under a hundred locks because it was written in a cipher of which she alone had the key.

"Then, Madame, you do not believe in steganography?"[27]

"No, Monsieur; and if you will accept it I make you a present of this copy."

I took it and put it in my pocket.

From the library we went to her laboratory, which really astonished me; she showed me a substance which she had kept on the fire for fifteen years and which needed to remain there four or five years more. It was a powder of projection[28] which was to perform the transmutation of all metals into gold in one minute. She showed me a tube through which coal to keep the fire in her furnace always at the same heat came down of its own weight, so that she often went three months without entering her laboratory at no risk of finding her fire out. A small conduit underneath carried off the ashes. The calcination of mercury was child's play for her; she showed me some already calcined and said that she would demonstrate the procedure to me whenever I pleased. She showed me the tree of Diana[29] of the famous Talliamed,[30] whose pupil she was. As everyone knows, Talliamed was the learned Maillet, who, according to Madame d'Urfé, had not died at Marseilles, as the Abbé Le Mascrier[31] had led everyone to believe, but was alive, and, she added with a slight smile, she often received letters from him. If the Regent[32] of France had heeded his advice he would still be among the living. She said that the Regent had been her first friend, that it was he who had nicknamed her Égérie[33] and had himself arranged her marriage to Monsieur d'Urfé. She had a commentary by Raymond Lully,[34] which made clear everything that Arnold of Villanova[35] had written following Roger Bacon[36] and Geber,[37] who, according to her, were not dead. This precious manuscript was in an ivory casket, to which she had the key, and in any case her laboratory was closed to everyone. She showed me a cask filled with patina del Pinto,[38] which she could turn into pure gold whenever she pleased. It was Mr. Wood[39] himself who had given it to her in 1743. She showed me the same platinum in four different vessels, three of which contained it intact in sulphuric, nitric, and hydrochloric acid, but in the fourth, in which she had used aqua regia,[40] the platinum had been unable to resist. She melted it by the burning glass[41] and said that without some admixture it could be melted in no other way, which in her opinion proved that it was superior to gold. She showed me some of it precipitated by sal ammoniac, which was never able to precipitate gold.

She had an athanor[42] which had been kept burning for fifteen years. I saw that the tower of it was filled with black coals, from which I concluded that she had visited it two or three days before. When we went back to her tree of Diana I respectfully asked her if she agreed with me that it was only a toy to amuse children. She answered with dignity that she had in fact only made it to amuse herself, using silver, mercury, and spirits of niter and crystallizing them together, and that she considered her tree only a metallic vegetation which showed in little what nature could do on a great scale; but she said that she could make a tree of Diana which would be a true tree of the sun, producing golden fruits which would be gathered and continuing to produce them until the exhaustion of an ingredient which she would mix with the six "lepers"[43] in proportion to their quantity. I modestly replied that I did not believe it was possible without the powder of projection. Madame d'Urfé answered only with a gracious smile. She then showed me a porcelain bowl, in which I saw niter, mercury, and sulphur, and a plate on which was a fixed salt.[44]

"I imagine," the Marquise said, "that you know these ingredients."

"I know them," I answered, "if the fixed salt is the salt of urine."

"You are right."

"I admire your sagacity, Madame. You have analyzed the amalgam with which I painted the pentacle[45] on your nephew's thigh; but there is no tartar which can show you the words which give the pentacle its efficacy."

"What is needed for that is not tartar but a manuscript by an adept which I have in my room and which I will show you, in which the words are set forth."

I made no answer, and we left the laboratory.

We had scarcely entered her room before she took from a casket a black book, which she placed on her table, then she began looking for a piece of phosphorus; while she was searching I opened the book, which was behind her, and I saw that it was full of pentacles, and luckily I saw the very talisman which I had painted on her nephew's thigh, encircled by the names of the Planetary Geniuses[46] except for two—those of Saturn and Mars—and I quickly closed the book. The Geniuses were the same as Agrippa's,[47] which I knew, but betraying nothing, I returned to her, and a moment later she found the phosphorus, which really surprised me; but I will speak of it elsewhere.

Madame sat down on her sofa, made me sit beside her, and asked me if I knew the Count of Trèves's[48] talismans.

"I never heard of them, but I know Polyphilus's."[49]

"They are said to be the same."

"I do not believe it."

"We shall find out if you will write down the words you spoke when you painted the pentacle on my nephew's thigh. It will be the same book if I find you those words around the same talisman in this one."

"That would be proof, I admit. I will go and write them."

I wrote the names of the Geniuses; Madame found the pentacle, read out the names to me, and, pretending astonishment, I gave her my paper, where with great satisfaction she read the same names.

"You see," she said, "that Polyphilus and the Count of Trèves were masters of the same science."

"I will admit it, Madame, if your book shows the way to utter the ineffable names.[50] Do you know the theory of the planetary hours?"[51]

"I believe I do, but it is not necessary in this operation."

"I beg your pardon. I painted the pentacle of Solomon on Monsieur de La Tour d'Auvergne's thigh at the hour of Venus, and if I had not begun with Anael,[52] who is the Genius of that planet, my operation would have had no effect."

"I did not know that. And after Anael?"

"One must go on to Mercury, from Mercury to the Moon, from the Moon to Jupiter, from Jupiter to the Sun. You see that it is the magical cycle according to the system of Zoroaster,[53] in which I skip Saturn and Mars, which science excludes in this operation.''

''And if you had operated during the hour of the Moon, for example?''

''In that case I should have gone to Jupiter, then to the Sun, then to Anael, that is, Venus, and I should have ended with Mercury.''

''I see, Monsieur, that you employ the hours with remarkable facility.''

''Without that, Madame, one can do nothing in magic, for one does not have time to calculate; but it is not difficult. A month's study will accustom any beginner to it. What is more difficult is the rites, for they are complicated; but one can learn them in due time. I never go out in the morning without knowing how many minutes compose the hour of that particular day, and I take care that my watch is perfectly regulated, for a minute is decisive.''

''Would you be so kind as to instruct me in the theory?''

''You have it in Artephius[54] and more clearly in Sandivonius.''[55]

''I have them, but they are in Latin.''

''I will translate them for you.''

''Will you be so obliging?''

''You have shown me things, Madame, which compel me to oblige you, for reasons which I will perhaps tell you tomorrow.''

''Why not today?''

''Because I must first know the name of your Genius.''

''You know that I have a Genius.''

''You must have one, if it is true that you have the powder of projection.''

''I have it.''

''Give me the oath of the Order.''

''I dare not, and you know why.''

"Tomorrow I shall perhaps do away with your fears."

The oath was that of the Brothers of the Rosy Cross,[56] which is never exchanged unless the parties first know each other; so Madame d'Urfé was afraid, and rightly so, that she might be indiscreet, and on my side I had to pretend that I felt the same fear. I thought I ought to gain time, but I knew what the oath was. It can be exchanged between men without indecency, but a woman like Madame d'Urfé must hesitate to give it to a man whom she was seeing for the first time that day.

"When we find the oath announced in our Sacred Scriptures," she said, "it is masked. 'He swore,' says the Holy Bible, 'putting his hand on his thigh.'[57] But it is not the thigh. So we never find a man taking an oath to a woman in that manner, for woman has no word."[58]

At nine in the evening the Count of La Tour d'Auvergne arrived at his aunt's and was surprised to find me still with her. He said that his cousin Prince Turenne's fever had increased greatly and that smallpox had broken out. He told her that he had come to take leave of her for at least a month, since he was going to shut himself up with the patient. Madame d'Urfé praised his zeal, and she gave him a sachet, making him promise that he would return it to her after the Prince was cured. She told him to hang it around the Prince's neck and to be certain of a harmless eruption and a sure cure. He promised, took the sachet, and left.

I then said to the Marquise that I did not know what her sachet contained, but that if it was magic I had no faith in it, for she had given him no instructions concerning the hour. She answered that it was an electrum;[59] and, that being the case, I asked her pardon.

She said that she admired my reserve, but that she thought I would not be disappointed in her circle if I would consent to make their acquaintance. She said that she would introduce me to all her friends by having me to dinner with them one at a time and that afterward I would enjoy their company together. In consequence of this arrangement I dined the next day with a Monsieur Gerin[60] and his niece, neither of whom I liked. Another day it was with an Irishman named Macartney, a physician of the old school, who bored me extremely. Another day she ordered her porter to admit a monk, who, talking of literature, said countless inane things against Voltaire, of whom I was fond in those days, and against the Esprit des Lois,[61] which he nevertheless refused to credit to its celebrated author, Montesquieu. He attributed it to the malice of some monk. Another day she had me to dinner with the Chevalier d'Arzigny,[62] a man of ninety, who was known as the "dean of the fops" and who, having figured at the Court of Louis XIV, displayed all its courtesy and knew its gossip. He amused me vastly; he wore rouge; his coats were adorned with the pompons of his century; he professed to be tenderly attached to his mistress, who did the honors of a small house for him where he supped every night in company with his friends, all of them charming young girls who forsook other company for his; nevertheless he was not tempted to be unfaithful to her, for he slept with her every night. This amiable though decrepit and shaky old man had such sweetness of character and such unusual manners that I believed everything he said. His cleanliness was extreme. A large posy of tuberoses and jonquils in the top buttonhole of his coat, together with a strong smell of ambergris from the pomade which kept his false hair and eyebrows attached to his head—even with these, his teeth gave off an extremely strong smell, which Madame d'Urfé did not mind but which I found intolerable. Except for that, I would have sought his society as often as I could. Monsieur d'Arzigny was a professed Epicurean, with a serenity which was amazing; he said that he would undertake to receive a drubbing of twenty-four blows every morning if that could assure him that he would not die within twenty-four hours, and that the older he grew the more of a drubbing he would accept.

On another day I dined with Monsieur Charon,[63] Councilor of the Great Chamber,[64] who was her referee in a suit she was prosecuting against Madame du Châtelet,[65] her daughter, whom she hated. The old Councilor had been her accepted lover forty years earlier, and for that reason he felt it incumbent on him to find in her favor. The French magistrates made justice go by favors and they considered they were at liberty to favor their friends because their right to judge was theirs by virtue of the money with which they had bought it.[66] The Councilor bored me.

But on another day I greatly enjoyed the company of Monsieur de Viarmes,[67] Madame d'Urfé's nephew, a young councilor, who came to dinner at her house with his wife. The couple were likable, and the nephew was extremely witty, as all Paris knew from reading the Remonstrances au Roi,[68] of which he was the author. He told me that the business of a councilor was to oppose everything the King might do even if it was good. The reasons he alleged for the soundness of this maxim were those put forth by all minorities in collective bodies. I shall not bore my reader by repeating them.

The dinner which I found most entertaining was the one to which she invited Madame de Gergy,[69] who came with the famous adventurer, the Count of Saint-Germain.[70] Instead of eating he talked from the beginning to the end of dinner; and I listened with the greatest attention, for no one was a better talker. He made himself out to be a prodigy in everything, he aimed to amaze, and he really amazed. His tone was peremptory, but no one took it amiss, for he was learned, speaking all languages well, a great musician, a great chemist, with an attractive face and the ability to win the friendship of all women, for at the same time that he gave them paints which beautified their complexions he persuaded them to believe, not that he could make them younger—for that, he said, was impossible—but that he could keep them in their present condition by means of a water which cost him a great deal but which he gave them as a present. This very strange man, who was born to be the most arrant of impostors, would say, without being challenged and as if in passing, that he was three hundred years old, that he possessed the universal medicine, that he could do whatever he pleased with nature, that he melted diamonds and out of ten or twelve small ones made a big one no less in weight and of the finest water. These things were trifles for him. Despite his egregious boasting, his eccentricities, and his obvious lies, I could not bring myself to consider him insolent, but I did not consider him worthy of respect; I found him astonishing despite myself, because he astonished me. I shall speak of him again when the time comes.

After Madame d'Urfé had introduced me to all these people I told her that I would dine with her whenever she wished, but always with no one else present except her relatives and Saint-Germain, whose eloquence and extravagant boasting amused me. When he dined, as he often did, at the best houses in Paris he never ate anything. He said that his life depended on his diet, and people willingly put up with him, for his tales were the spice of the dinner.

I had come to know Madame d'Urfé thoroughly, while she, on her side, believed that I was a genuine adept under the mask of a man of no consequence; but she was confirmed in this chimerical opinion five or six weeks later when she asked me if I had decoded the manuscript which contained the procedure for the Great Work. I told her that I had and hence had read it and that I would return it to her, giving her my word of honor that I had not copied it.

"I found nothing new in it," I said.

"You will excuse me, Monsieur, but without the key I consider the thing impossible."

"Shall I name your key to you, Madame?"

"Please do so."

I thereupon give her the word, which belonged to no language, and I see that she is surprised. She said that it was too much, for she believed that she alone possessed the word, which she kept in her memory and had never written down.

I could have told her the truth, which was that the same calculation by which I had managed to decode the manuscript had taught me the word, but I took it into my head to tell her that a Genius had revealed it to me. It was this false confidence which put Madame d'Urfé in my power. On that day I became the arbiter of her soul, and I abused my ascendancy. Every time I recollect it I feel sorry and ashamed, and I am doing penance for it now through the obligation I have assumed to tell the truth in writing my memoirs.

Madame d'Urfé's great chimera was believing in the possibility of conversing with what are called "elemental spirits." [71] She would have given everything she possessed to acquire the art; and she had known impostors who had swindled her by making her believe they could set her on the right road. Confronted with me, who had given her such a clear proof of my knowledge, she thought she had reached her goal.

"I did not know," she said, "that your Genius had the power to force mine to reveal his secrets."

"He did not have to use force, for he knows everything by virtue of his own nature."

"Then does he know what secret I lock in my soul?"

"Certainly, and he must tell it to me if I question him."

"Can you question him whenever you please?"

"Whenever I have paper and ink; and I can even let you question him yourself by telling you his name. My Genius is named Paralis.[72] Write a question addressed to him, as if you were putting it to a mortal; ask him how I was able to decode your manuscript and you shall see how I will make him answer you."

Trembling with joy, Madame d'Urfé writes her question; I put it into figures, then into a pyramid as always, and I make her obtain the answer, which she herself puts into letters. She finds only consonants, but by a second operation I make her obtain the vowels, which she combines with the consonants, and she has a perfectly clear answer which surprises her. She sees before her eyes the word which was required to decode her manuscript. I left her, taking with me her soul, her heart, her mind, and all her remaining common sense.

CHAPTER VI

Madame d'Urfé's mistaken and contradictory notions as to my power. My brother marries; plan conceived on his wedding day. I go to Holland on a financial mission for the government. I am given a lesson by the Jew Boas. Monsieur d'Affry. Esther. Another Casanova. I meet Teresa Imer again.

PRINCE TURENNE having recovered from the smallpox, the Count of La Tour d'Auvergne had left him, and, aware of his aunt's interest in the abstruse sciences, he was not surprised to find that I had become her only friend. I enjoyed his presence at our dinners, as I did that of all her relatives, whose courteous manner toward me delighted me. They were her brothers Monsieur de Pontcarré and Monsieur de Viarmes,[1] who had just been elected Provost of the Merchants,[2] and his son, whom I believe I have mentioned.[3] Madame du Châtelet was her daughter; but since a suit made them irreconcilable enemies she was never present.[4]

La Tour d'Auvergne having had to rejoin his Boulognese regiment in Brittany at this time, we[5] dined together, with no other company, nearly every day. Madame's servants considered me her husband; they said that I must be, thinking it the explanation for the long hours we spent together. Believing that I was rich, Madame d'Urfé supposed that I had taken a post in the Military School lottery only as a mask.

According to her, I not only possessed the stone but could converse with all the elemental spirits. Hence she believed that I had the power to turn the world upside down and determine the fortunes of France for good or evil, and she attributed my need to remain unknown only to my justified fear of being arrested and imprisoned, for that, she insisted, would necessarily follow as soon as the Ministry managed to learn who I was. These wild ideas came from the revelations which her Genius made to her at night and which her heated imagination made her believe were real. Setting them forth to me in perfect good faith one day, she said her Genius had convinced her that, since she was a woman, I could not give her the power to converse with the Geniuses, but that, by an operation which I must certainly know, I could make her soul pass into the body of a male child born from a philosophical union between an immortal and a woman or between a man and a female being of divine nature.

In lending my support to the lady's crazy notions I did not feel that I was deceiving her; for that was already done, and I could not possibly disabuse her. If in strict honesty I had told her that all her notions were ridiculous, she would not have believed me; so I took the course of drifting with the tide. I could not but enjoy letting myself be considered the greatest of all Rosicrucians and the most powerful of all men by a lady who was allied to the greatest houses in France and who, in addition, was even richer from her investments than from a yearly income of eighty thousand livres which she received from an estate[6] and from the houses she owned in Paris. I clearly saw that, if the need arose, she could refuse me nothing, and though I had laid no plan to gain possession of her wealth either in whole or in part, I did not have the strength of mind to renounce my power over her.

Madame d'Urfé was a miser. She spent barely thirty thousand livres[7] a year, and she invested her savings on the Exchange and doubled them. A broker brought her royal securities when they were at their lowest price and sold them for her when they went up. In this way she had greatly augmented her portfolio. She told me several times that she was ready to give all that she had to become a man and that she knew it depended on me.

I told her one day that it was true I could perform the operation, but that I could never bring myself to do it because I would have to take her life.

"I know that," she answered, "and I even know the kind of death to which I must submit, and I am ready."

"And what kind of death, Madame, are you pleased to believe it may be?"

"It is," she answered eagerly, "the same poison which killed Paracelsus."

"And do you believe that Paracelsus attained hypostasis?"[8]

"No. But I know the reason. He was neither man nor woman, and it is necessary to be completely one or the other."

"That is true; but do you know how the poison is made? And do you know that it cannot be made without the help of a salamander?"[9]

"That may be so, but I did not know it. I beg you to ask the cabala if there is anyone in Paris who possesses the poison."

I immediately thought that she believed she possessed it herself; and, not having hesitated to say so in my answer, I pretended to be astonished. It was she who was not astonished, and I saw her triumph.

"You see," she said, "that all I need is the child containing the male word[10] drawn from an immortal creature. I have been informed that it depends on you, and I do not believe you can lack the necessary courage because of a mistaken pity you may feel for my old carcass."

At these words I rose and I went to the window of her room, which gave onto the quay, and remained there for a quarter of an hour reflecting on her idiocies. When I returned to the table at which she was sitting she looked at me closely and said with deep feeling:

"Is it possible, my dear friend? I see you have been weeping."

I let her believe it, I sighed, I took my sword, and I left. Her carriage, which was at my disposal every day, was at the door, awaiting my orders.

My brother had been received into the Academy[11] by acclamation after exhibiting a painting he had made in which he depicted a battle and which gained the approbation of all the connoisseurs. The Academy itself wanted to own it and gave him the five hundred louis he asked for it. He had fallen in love with Corallina and would have married her if she had not been guilty of an infidelity which offended him so greatly that, to end any hope she might have of making it up, within less than a week he married a dancer[12] who appeared in the ballets at the Comédie Italienne. The wedding party was given by Monsieur de Saincy, bursar in charge of vacant ecclesiastical benefices,[13] who was very fond of the girl and who in gratitude for my brother's chivalry in marrying her got all his friends to order paintings from him, which paved the way to the considerable fortune he made and the great fame which he came to enjoy.

It was at my brother's wedding that Monsieur Kornmann, discoursing to me at length about the great scarcity of money, urged me to speak with the Comptroller-General concerning a way to remedy the situation. He said that by giving royal securities at a reasonable price to a company of brokers in Amsterdam it would be possible in exchange to acquire some other power's notes, which, not being discredited as France's were, could easily be realized. I asked him not to mention it to anybody, promising him that I would act.

No later than the next day I mentioned it to my patron the Abbé, who, considering it an excellent speculation, advised me to go to Holland [14] myself with a letter of recommendation from the Duke of Choiseul [15] to Monsieur d'Affry,[16] who could be sent several millions in royal paper to discount as I saw best. He told me to go at once and discuss the matter with Monsieur de Boulogne, and above all not to appear to be feeling my way. He assured me that, as soon as it became clear that I was not asking for any money in advance, I would be given all the letters of recommendation I wanted.

I was instantly enthusiastic. That same day I saw the Comptroller-General, who, considering my idea excellent, told me that the Duke of Choiseul would be at the Invalides[17] the next day and that I should lose no time before going to him to discuss the matter and give him the note he would write to him. He promised me he would have the Ambassador supplied with twenty millions in securities, which in any case could always return to France. I said somberly that I hoped not, if no more than a reasonable price was asked. He replied that peace was about to be made,[18] and in consequence I must dispose of them only at a very small loss and in that respect I should depend on the Ambassador, who would have all the necessary instructions.

I felt so flattered by a mission of this nature that I did not sleep all that night. The Duke of Choiseul, who was famous for moving rapidly, had no sooner read Monsieur de Boulogne's note and listened to me for five minutes than he had a clerk write a letter to Monsieur d'Affry in my behalf, which he read over and signed without reading it to me; after having it given to me sealed, he wished me a good journey. On the same day I obtained a passport from Monsieur de Berkenrode,[19] took leave of Manon Balletti and all my friends except Madame d'Urfé, with whom I was to spend the whole of the next day, and authorized my faithful clerk to sign the tickets at my office.

A month earlier a very pretty and decent girl, a native of Brussels, had been married under my auspices to an Italian named Gaetano, a dealer in secondhand goods. I had been her sponsor. The brute ill-treating her in his jealous rages, and the unhappy beauty constantly coming to me with her complaints, I had several times made peace between them. They came expecting me to give them dinner on the very day I was packing to leave for Holland. My brother and Tiretta were with me, and as I was still living in a furnished room I took them all to dinner with me at Landelle's,[20] where the food was excellent. Tiretta was in his carriage; he was ruining the ex-Jansenist,[21] who was still in love with him.

At dinner Tiretta, who was handsome and loved to clown and who had never seen the beautiful Fleming, began flirting with her outrageously. She was delighted, and we would have laughed and all would have gone well if her husband had been reasonable and polite; but, jealous as a tiger, the wretch was sweating blood. He did not eat, he kept turning white, he looked daggers at his wife, and he refused to take it as a joke. Tiretta made fun of him. Foreseeing unpleasant scenes, I tried to moderate his excessive high spirits, but in vain. An oyster dropped onto Madame Gaetano's beautiful bosom, and Tiretta, who was sitting beside her, quickly put his lips to it and sucked it in. Gaetano rose in a fury and slapped his wife so vindictively that his hand bounced back from her face to her neighbor's. Roused to rage, Tiretta seized him by the waist and stretched him out on the floor, and since, being unarmed, he took his vengeance only with his fists, we let him continue; but the waiter came up, whereupon the jealous husband left. His wife, her face disfigured by tears and blood—for she was bleeding from the nose, as was Tiretta—asked me to take her somewhere, for she thought her life would be in danger if she went home. I quickly got her into a hackney coach, leaving Tiretta with my brother. She asked me to take her to an old attorney, a relative of hers, who lived on the fourth floor of a six-story house on the Quai de Gesvres.[22] After hearing the whole unhappy story he said to me that, being poor, he could do nothing for the unfortunate girl, but that he would do everything if he had only a hundred écus. I gave them to him, and he assured me that he would set about ruining her husband, who would never be able to find out where she was. She told me she was sure he would do all that he had promised, and after expressing all her gratitude she let me go. On my return from Holland my reader will learn what became of her.

After I assured Madame d'Urfé that I was going to Holland for the good of France and that I would be back at the beginning of February, she asked me to sell some shares in the East India Company of Gothenburg[23] for her. She had sixty thousand francs' worth of them, and she could not sell them on the Paris Exchange because there was no money there; in addition she could not obtain the interest on them, which amounted to a considerable sum since it had been three years since any dividends had been declared. When I consented to do her the service she had to make me the owner of the shares through a bill of sale, which she did in due form on the same day, the transaction being certified by Tourton & Baur,[24] Place des Victoires. Back at her house I offered to give her an undertaking in writing to pay her the value of her shares on my return, but she refused. I left her, gratified to see not the slightest sign of suspicion on her face.

After obtaining a bill of exchange for three thousand florins[25] on the Jew Boas,[26] the court banker at The Hague, from Monsieur Kornmann, I set out; in two days I reached Antwerp, where I took a jacht,[27] which the next day brought me to Rotterdam, where I slept. On the day after I went to The Hague, where I put up at Jacquet's inn, the "English Parliament."[28] On the same day, which was Christmas Eve, I called on Monsieur d'Affry just when he was reading the letter from the Duke of Choiseul informing him about me and the business in hand. He made me stay for dinner with Monsieur Kauderbach,[29] Resident for the King of Poland and Elector of Saxony, and he encouraged me to do my best, saying, however, that he doubted if I would succeed because the Dutch had good reason to believe that peace would not be made very soon.

On leaving the Embassy I took a carriage to the house of the banker Boas, whom I found at table with all his ugly and numerous family. After looking at my bill of exchange he said that only that day he had received a letter from Kornmann praising me. He asked me why, since it was Christmas Eve, I was not going to rock the Infant Jesus to sleep; I answered that I had come to celebrate the Feast of the Maccabees[30] with him. He and his whole family applauded my answer, and he begged me to accept a room in his house. Accepting his offer, I at once sent word to my valet to come to the house with my luggage, and when I took leave of Boas after supper I asked him to find me some good piece of business by which I could make eighteen or twenty thousand florins during the short time I intended to stay in Holland. He answered seriously that he would think it over.

The next morning after I had breakfasted with him and his family he said that he had found what I wanted and took me to his study, where, giving me three thousand florins in gold and notes, he said that there was nothing to stop me from making twenty thousand florins in a week, as I had told him I wanted to do the evening before. Greatly surprised, for I had only been joking, at how easy it was to make money in that country, I thank him for his kind interest and I hear him out.

"Here," he says, "is a note which I received day before yesterday from the Mint. It informs me that four hundred thousand ducats[31] have just been struck and that the Mint is prepared to sell them at the current price of gold, which, fortunately, is not very high at the moment. Each ducat is worth five florins, two and three-fifths stuivers.[32] Here is the rate of exchange at Frankfort on the Main. Buy the four hundred thousand ducats, take or send them to Frankfort, obtaining bills of exchange on the Bank of Amsterdam,[33] and there you have just what you asked for. You make one and one-ninth stuiver per ducat, which yields you twenty-two thousand two hundred and twenty-two of our florins. Obtain possession of the gold today, and in a week your profit will be liquid. There you are."

"But," I answered, "will the directors of the Mint not demur at entrusting me with such a sum, which comes to over four million livres tournois?"[34]

"Certainly they will, if you do not buy the ducats for cash or give an equal amount in good paper."

"My dear Monsieur Boas, I have neither that much money nor that much credit."

"Then you will never make twenty thousand florins in a week. Judging from the proposal you made me yesterday evening, I thought you were a millionaire. I will have one of my sons make the transaction today or tomorrow."

After giving me this sound lesson Boas went to his office and I went to dress. Monsieur d'Affry went to the "English Parliament" to return my visit and, not finding me there, wrote me a note asking me to call on him to hear what he had to tell me. I went there, I dined with him, and I learned directly from the letter he had just received from Monsieur de Boulogne that he was not to let me dispose of the twenty millions he was to receive except at a loss of eight percent, for peace was on the verge of being made. He laughed at the idea and I did likewise. He advised me not to discuss my business with Jews, the most honest of whom was only the least dishonest, and he offered me a letter of recommendation in his own hand to Pels,[35] of Amsterdam, which I gratefully accepted; and to assist me in the matter of my Gothenburg shares he introduced me to the Swedish Ambassador.[36] He, in turn, sent me to Monsieur D. O.[37] I left on the day after St. John's Day[38] because of the convocation of the most zealous Masons in Holland. The person who invited me to attend it was Count de Tott,[39] brother of the Baron who failed to make his fortune in Constantinople. Monsieur d'Affry presented me to Her Highness the Regent, mother[40] of the Stathouder,[41] whom I thought too serious for his age, which was then only twelve. She kept dozing off. She died not long afterward, and her brain was found to be swimming in water. There I also saw Count Philipp of Sinzendorf,[42] who was looking for five millions for the Empress and who easily obtained them at five percent interest. At the theater I met a Minister of the Porte[43] who had been a friend of Monsieur de Bonneval's,[44] and I thought I should see him die from laughing before my eyes. Here is the rather comical incident:

The play being given was the tragedy Iphigenia.[45] The statue of Diana was in the center of the stage. At the end of one act Iphigenia entered followed by all her priestesses, who as they passed the statue all bowed low to the goddess. The candle-snuffer, a good Dutch Christian, comes out and makes the same bow to the statue. The parterre and the boxes burst out laughing, and so do I, but not hard enough to die of it. When, as in duty bound, I explained the joke to the Turk he fell into such a fit of laughter that he had to be carried to his inn, the "Prince of Orange."[46] Not to laugh at the thing at all would have proved one stupid, I admit; but one had to have a Turkish sense of humor to laugh at it so hard. Yet it was a great Greek philosopher[47] who died laughing when he saw a toothless old woman eating figs. Those who laugh much are better off than those who laugh little, for gaiety unloads the spleen and generates good blood.

Two hours before reaching Amsterdam in my two-wheeled post chaise with my servant sitting behind, I meet a four-wheeled carriage, drawn by two horses like mine and also carrying a master and servant. The driver of the four-wheeled carriage wanted my driver to make way for him, mine protested that if he did he would upset me in the ditch, but the other insisted. I address the master, a handsome young man, and ask him to order his driver to make way for me.

"I am posting, Monsieur," I say, "and furthermore I am a foreigner."

"Monsieur, here in Holland the post has no special rights,[48] and if you are a foreigner you must admit that you have no greater claim than mine, since I am in my own country."

At that I get out in snow halfway up my boots, and holding my drawn sword I tell the Dutchman to get out or to make way for me. He replied, with a smile, that he had no sword and that in any case he would not fight for such a silly reason. He told me to get back in my chaise, and he made way for me. I arrived at Amsterdam about nightfall and put up at the "Star of the East."[49]

The next day I went to the Exchange and found Monsieur Pels, who said that he would give thought to my chief business, and a quarter of an hour later I found Monsieur D. O., who at once arranged for me to speak with a broker from Gothenburg, who wanted to discount my sixteen shares on the spot, giving me twelve percent interest. Monsieur Pels told me to wait and assured me that he would get me fifteen percent. He gave me dinner, and seeing me delighted with the excellence of his red Cape wine,[50] he laughed and said that he made it himself by mixing Burgundy with Malaga. The next day I dined at the house of Monsieur D. O., who was a widower of forty and whose only daughter, Esther,[51] was fourteen. She was a beauty except that her teeth were not good. She was the heir to all the wealth of her amiable father, who adored her. With her white complexion, her black hair, which she wore unpowdered, and her eloquent, very large black eyes, she made a great impression on me. She spoke French very well; she played the harpsichord with great delicacy, and was passionately fond of reading. After dinner Monsieur D. O. showed me his house, which was not occupied, for after his wife's death he had chosen an apartment on the ground floor in which he was very comfortable. The apartment he showed me was a suite of six or seven rooms which contained a treasure in antique porcelain; the walls and the casements were entirely covered with marble plaques, each room in a different color and with floors of the same under magnificent Turkish carpets made to order for the particular rooms. The large dining room was entirely covered with alabaster, and the tables and buffets were of cedarwood. The house was entirely covered with marble plaques on the outside too. One Saturday I saw four or five housemaids washing those splendid walls; what made me laugh was that the maids all had very wide panniers, which obliged them to wear breeches, otherwise they would have afforded too interesting a sight to passers-by. After seeing the house we went downstairs, and Monsieur D. O. left me alone with his daughter in the anteroom in which he worked with his clerks; but that day there was no one there. It was New Year's Day.

After playing a sonata for harpsichord, Mademoiselle

O. asked me if I was going to the concert. I replied that nothing could persuade me to go to it since I was with her.

"Are you thinking of going to it, Mademoiselle?"

"I should like nothing better than to go to the concert, but I cannot go all by myself."

"I should be very happy to escort you, but I dare not hope as much."

"You would be doing me a great favor, and I am certain that if you make the offer to my father he will not refuse you."

"Are you certain?"

"Perfectly certain; since he knows you, he would be guilty of rudeness; I am amazed that you could fear it; my father is most polite; I see that you do not know Dutch customs. In this country unmarried girls enjoy a decent freedom; they lose it only when they marry; go to him, go to him."

I go in to Monsieur D. O., who was writing, and ask him if he will do me the honor of letting me escort his daughter to the concert.

"Have you a carriage?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"Then I need not order mine. Esther?"

"Yes, Father."

"You may get dressed. Monsieur Casanova is kind enough to take you to the concert."

"Thank you, dear Papa."

After kissing him she goes to dress, and an hour later she appears with joy on her countenance. I could only have wished she had used a little powder; but Esther was proud of the color of her hair, which made her complexion look even whiter. A transparent black fichu covered her bosom, which it revealed as just beginning to develop and too firm.

We go downstairs, I offer her my hand to help her into the carriage, and I wait, supposing that a maid or a governess will attend her; but seeing no one I get in, very much surprised. Her lackey, after closing the door, gets up behind. I thought it impossible. Such a girl alone with me! I was struck dumb. I asked myself if I should remember that I was a great libertine or if I should forget it. Esther, all animation, said we were to hear an Italian singer with the voice of a nightingale, and seeing me speechless she asked me why. I beat about the bush, but finally said that I thought her a treasure of which I did not deserve to be the guardian.

"I know," she said, "that in the rest of Europe girls are not allowed to go out alone with men, but here we are taught to behave ourselves, and we are certain that if we do not we will contrive our own unhappiness."

"Happy the man who will be your husband, and happier still if you have already chosen him!"

"Oh, it is not for me to choose him, that lies with my father."

"And if the man he chooses is not the man you love?"

"We are not allowed to love a man before we know he is to be our husband."

"Then you love no one."

"No one, and what is more I have not yet felt tempted to."

"Then may I kiss your hand?"

"Why my hand?"

She drew it away, she gave me her lips, and modestly returned my kiss with one which went to my heart, but I stopped at that when she told me she would do the same in her father's presence whenever I wished.

We arrived at the concert, where Esther found a quantity of young ladies who were friends of hers, all daughters of wealthy businessmen, some of them pretty, some ugly, and all eagerly asking her who I was. All she could tell them was my name, but she became animated when she saw a beautiful blonde nearby; she asked me if I thought her attractive; I answered, of course, that I was not attracted by blondes.

"Even so, I shall introduce her to you, for she may be a relative of yours; her name is the same, and here is her father. Monsieur Casanova," she said to him, "I beg to introduce Monsieur Casanova, a friend of my father's."

"Is it possible? I hope," he said, "I may be your friend too, but perhaps we are relatives. I am of the Naples family."

"Then we are relatives, though very distant ones, for my father was from Parma. Have you your genealogy?"

"I must have it somewhere; but to tell the truth I set little store by it, for in this country no one considers such trifles."

"Nevertheless, we can amuse ourselves with it for a quarter of an hour, and then laugh at it and keep it to ourselves. Tomorrow I shall have the honor of calling on you, and I will bring you a tree of my ancestors. Would it displease you to find the founder of your line among them?"

"I should be delighted, Monsieur, and I shall have the honor of calling on you myself at your lodging tomorrow. May I ask if you have a business establishment at home?"

"No, I am in finance and at present in the service of the French ministry. I am on a mission to Monsieur Pels."

Monsieur Casanova then beckoned to his daughter, who came at once and whom he introduced to me. She was Esther's intimate friend; I sat down between the two of them, and the concert began. After a fine symphony, a concerto for violin, and another for oboe, the Italian singer who was so highly praised under the name of Trenti appeared, taking her place behind the musician at the harpsichord. Great was my surprise when in this so-called Madame Trenti I saw Teresa Imer,[52] wife of the dancer Pompeati, whom the reader may remember.

I had known her eighteen years earlier, when old Senator Malipiero had given me a caning when he caught me in some childish naughtiness with her, and I had seen her again at Venice in 1753, where we had made love once or twice, not as children but as real lovers. She had left for Bayreuth, where she was mistress to the Margrave;[53] I had promised to visit her there; but C. C. and the nun M. M.[54] had not left me time for it. Then I was confined under the Leads, and I had heard no more of her. My surprise was great to see her now at a concert in Amsterdam. I said nothing, listening to an aria which she sang with the voice of an angel, preceded by a recitative which began: Eccoti giunta al fin, donna infelice ("You have come at last, unhappy woman").[55]

The applause would not end. Esther told me that no one knew who the woman was, that there were countless stories about her, that she was very badly off, and that she lived by traveling to every city in Holland and singing at public concerts, the only payment she received being what the audience put into a silver plate which she carried through all the rows at the end of the concert.

"Does she find her plate well filled?"

"Not at all, for everyone here has already paid for his ticket. So she does well if she takes in thirty or forty florins. Tomorrow she will be at the concert at Leiden and the next day at The Hague and the day after that at Rotterdam, then she comes back here; she has been leading this life for more than six months now, and people are always delighted to hear her."

"Has she no lover?"

"They say she has young men in every city, but that instead of their giving her money she spends it on them, for they haven't a sou. She never wears anything but black, not only because she is a widow[56] but because of some great blow she says she has suffered. You will see her going through our row in half an hour."

Keeping my hands in my muff, I counted out twelve ducats, wrapped them in paper, and waited with my heart beating in a way which made me smile, since I could see no good reason for it.

As she went through the row in front of mine I saw that she was very much surprised when she caught sight of me; but I at once looked away and began talking with Esther. When she stopped in front of me I put the little roll on her plate without looking at her, and she moved on. But I looked closely at a little girl of four or five years who was following her and who, when she reached the end of the row, came back and kissed my hand. I was extremely surprised when I saw that the child had precisely my features. I managed to hide it, but the little girl stood there staring at me.

"Would you like some bonbons, pretty child?" I said. "Take the box too."

So saying I gave her the full box, which was only tortoise shell, but I would have given it to her if it had been gold. At that she left, and Esther laughed and said the child was the image of me.

"A striking likeness," added Mademoiselle Casanova.

"Chance," I said, "often produces resemblances for no reason at all."

After the concert I left Mademoiselle Esther O. with her father, whom we had met there, and I went to the "Eastern Star," where I was lodging. I had ordered a dish of oysters and I was about to eat them before going to bed when I saw Teresa and the little girl appear in my room. I rose to give her the ecstatic embrace which the occasion demanded, whereupon she saw fit to sink into a chair in a faint, perhaps real, perhaps feigned. As it might be genuine, I was willing to play the expected part in the scene, and I revived her with cold water and making her smell eau de Luz.[57] Restored to her senses, she began staring at me without a word. I asked her if she wanted supper, and she answered yes. I quickly ordered three places set, and we were served the usual sort of supper except that it kept us at table until seven o'clock in the morning doing nothing but tell each other our good and bad fortunes. She was acquainted with most of my recent vicissitudes, and I knew nothing of hers. So it was she who talked for five or six hours on end. Sophie[58] (for such was the name of her daughter) slept soundly on my bed until daylight. Teresa kept the most important of her disclosures, and the one which was of greatest concern to me, for the end. She said that Sophie was my daughter, and she took from her pocket the baptismal certificate which showed the date of her birth. We had been lovers in Venice at the beginning of the Fair of the Ascension in 1753, and Sophie was born at Bayreuth the end of that year; she had now just turned six. I said that I was convinced of it, and that since I was in a position to provide her with the best education I was ready to take care of her; but she replied that she was her jewel and that I would tear her soul from her body if I took her away; instead, she offered me her son, who was twelve years old and whom she did not have the means to bring up properly.

"Where is he?"

"He is boarding at Rotterdam, or I had better say in pawn there, for the man with whom he is staying will never give him to me unless I pay him all I owe him."

"How much do you owe?"

"Eighty florins. You have given me sixty-two, give me four more ducats, and my son is yours and I shall be the happiest of mothers. I will bring him to you at The Hague next week, since you say you have to go back there."

"Yes, my dear Teresa. Instead of four ducats, here are twenty. We will meet again at The Hague."

The transports of her gratitude and the joy which flooded her soul were excessive; but they did not have the power to reawaken my old fondness, or, rather, the old hankering I had had for her, for I had never loved her passionately. She embraced me for more than a quarter of an hour, with increasing demonstrations of the most ardent desire, but in vain; I returned her caresses without ever giving her the proof she sought that they came from the same source as that to which Sophie owed her birth. Teresa melted into tears, then she sighed, took her daughter, and left, after reminding me that we were to meet again at The Hague and that she would leave at noon.

Teresa was two years older than I, she was pretty, blonde, full of intelligence and talent; but her charms were no longer the same, for I should have felt their power. The story of all that had happened to her during the six years after she left Venice for Bayreuth would be worthy of my reader's attention, and I should be glad to write it if I remembered all its details. Convicted of infidelity by the amorous Margrave because of a Monsieur de Montperny,[59] she had been turned out; she had separated from her husband Pompeati and had gone to Brussels with a lover, where for a few days she had taken the fancy of Prince Charles of Lorraine,[60] who gave her a special patent granting her the direction of all theatrical performances throughout the Austrian Netherlands. With this patent she had embarked on the most extensive enterprises which had led her to spend enormous sums, so that in less than three years, after selling all her diamonds, her laces, her wardrobe, and everything she owned, she had been obliged to go to Holland to avoid being sent to prison. Her husband had killed himself in Vienna[61] during a fit of madness brought on by intestinal pains; he had opened his abdomen with a razor and had died tearing out his entrails.

The business I had in hand did not allow me to go to bed. Monsieur Casanova came to drink coffee with me and invited me to dinner, arranging to meet me at the Amsterdam Exchange,[62] which is an amazing institution to any thinking foreigner. Millionaires who look like yokels are very numerous there. A man who has only a hundred thousand florins is so poor that he does not dare do business under his own name. Monsieur D. O. invited me to dine next day at a small house he had on the Amstel; and Monsieur Casanova treated me very well. After reading my genealogy, which had stood me in such good stead at Naples, he went for his, which he found to be exactly the same, but, completely unimpressed by the fact, he only laughed—quite unlike Don Antonio in Naples, who took it with the utmost seriousness and gave me such excellent proof that he did so. However, he offered me his services and his advice in anything to do with business if I needed them. I thought his daughter pretty, but I was not struck either by her charms or her intelligence; my mind was occupied with Esther, whom I mentioned several times at table, until finally I forced Mademoiselle Casanova to tell me she was not pretty. A girl who knows she is pretty triumphs when she can silence a man who speaks in favor of one of her contemporaries who has indubitable defects. Nevertheless, the girl was Esther's intimate friend.

After dinner Monsieur D. O. told me that if I would sell my shares at fifteen percent above par, he would take them himself and I would be under no expense for either a broker or a notary. I agreed, and after turning them over to him I asked him for payment in a bill of exchange on Tourton & Baur in livres tournois and to my order. After calculating the daler[63] of the Bank of Sweden at eight livres ten sous in accordance with the rate at Hamburg, he gave me a sight bill of exchange for seventy-two thousand francs, whereas at five percent[64] I expected to receive only sixty-nine thousand. It was six percent, which won me great esteem from Madame d'Urfé, who perhaps did not expect such honesty from me. Toward evening I went with Monsieur Pels to Zaandam[65] in a boat set on a sledge with sails. I found the journey extraordinary and most entertaining. We got there surprisingly fast with a wind which took us along at fifteen English miles an hour. It is impossible to imagine a conveyance more comfortable or steadier or freer from danger. There is no one who would not be glad to take a trip around the world in such a carriage over a frozen sea, but with a stern wind, for that is the only possible course, the rudder having no effect. What greatly pleased me was the perfect timing with which two sailors lowered two sails when, having come close to the island, they had to stop the ship. This is the only moment when one may feel afraid, for the ship continued on its way for over a hundred paces even after the sails were lowered, and if there had been a delay of only a second the violence of its collision with the shore would have smashed it to pieces. We ate perch and could not take a walk because of the high wind; but I went there once again, and I say nothing about it because everyone knows the wonders of Zaandam, the hotbed of all the rich merchants who, in time, become millionaires at Amsterdam. We went back to Monsieur Pels's house in a two-horse sleigh which belonged to him. He kept me for supper, and I did not leave him until midnight. He said, with the honesty which was displayed on his countenance, that since I had become his friend and Monsieur D. O.'s I would not need the services of the Jews in my principal business but should apply directly to them.

The next morning, with the snow falling in great flakes, I went early to Monsieur D. O.'s, where I found his daughter in a very good humor. In her father's presence she began by rallying me on having spent the night at my inn with Madame Trenti.

Monsieur D. O., after saying that I need not defend myself because anyone was entitled to love talent, asked me to tell him who the woman was. I said she was a Venetian whose husband had recently killed himself, and that it was almost six years since we had last seen each other.

"The sight of your daughter," said Esther, "must have surprised you."

I replied that the child could not be mine, since her mother's husband was still alive at the time; but she continued to discuss the resemblance and to joke about my having fallen asleep the evening before when I supped at Monsieur Pels's.

"I envy anyone," she said slyly, "who has the secret of getting a good sleep, for of late I never fall asleep until I have courted it for a long time yet dreaded it, for when I wake, instead of finding my mind freer, I find it stupefied and weighed down by the indifference which comes from fatigue."

"Try, Mademoiselle, spending the night listening to the long story of some man in whom you are interested, but from his own lips. You will fall happily asleep the night after."

"Such a person does not exist. I think I need books, and the help of someone who knows them to find me interesting ones. I like history and travels, but I have to be sure that what I read is not invented. If anything makes me suspect it, I stop reading at once."

I promised to bring her some books the next day before I left for The Hague; she accepted my offer, congratulating me on the prospect I had of seeing Madame Trenti again at The Hague.

Esther's frankness set me on fire, and Monsieur D. O. laughed heartily at the way his daughter was calling me to account. At eleven o'clock we got into a sleigh and went to the small house, to which she had told me that Mademoiselle Casanova would also come with her fiancé. I saw her look pleased when I assured her that nothing could interest me more than herself.

We saw the two of them coming to meet us covered with snow. We get out; we enter a room to take off our furs; and I notice that the fiancé, after looking at me for a moment, whispers to his intended. She laughs, she goes and says something to Esther, who goes and tells her father, who laughs even more. They were looking at me, I was sure that it was about me they were talking; I pretended indifference, but that was no reason for me not to join them. Indeed, good manners demanded it.

"There may be some mistake," said Monsieur D. O.; "we really must look into it. Did anything out of the ordinary," he said, addressing me, "happen to you on your journey from The Hague to Amsterdam?"

At this question I looked at the fiancé, and I at once guessed what it was all about.

"Nothing out of the ordinary," I replied, "except meeting a fine fellow who wanted to see my carriage overturned, and I believe I see him here."

The laughter redoubled, and we embraced; but after he told the whole story in all its details Mademoiselle Casanova told him sharply that he should have fought. Esther disagreed, saying that he had shown more courage by listening to reason, and Monsieur D. O. declared that he was strongly of her opinion; but the refractory girl, after airing some romantic notions, became deliberately sulky with her lover. I chided her for it, which pleased Esther.

"Come, come," said the charming Esther gaily, "let us put on skates and lose no time amusing ourselves on the Amstel, for I fear the ice will melt."

I did not want to ask her to excuse me. Monsieur D. O. leaves us. Mademoiselle Casanova's fiancé puts skates on me, and the young ladies are ready, wearing short skirts and armed with black velvet drawers to guard against mishaps. We go down to the Amstel, and, since I was a complete novice at the sport, the reader can imagine that, having fallen abruptly on the hard ice at least twenty times, I thought I would end by breaking my back; but not a bit of it, I felt ashamed to leave off, and I stopped only when we were called in to dinner. When we got up from table I felt as if I were paralyzed in every limb. Esther gave me a jar of ointment and assured me that if I had myself rubbed when I went to bed I would feel perfectly well in the morning. She was right. Everyone laughed; I let them laugh; I realized that the whole skating party had been got up only to make me a laughingstock, and I saw nothing wrong in that. I wanted to bring Esther to love me, and I was sure that so much submission and obligingness on my part could not but set me on the road. I spent the afternoon with Monsieur D. O., letting the young people go back to the Amstel again, where they enjoyed themselves hugely until twilight.

We talked of my twenty millions, and I learned from him that I should never succeed in discounting them except with a mercantile company which would give me other papers in exchange, and that even by such a transaction I must be prepared to lose heavily. When I told him that I would like to make the transaction with the East India Company of Gothenburg he said that he would speak to a broker and that Monsieur Pels could be very useful to me.

When I woke in the morning I thought I was done for. My last vertebra, which is called the os sacrum, seemed to be in a thousand pieces. Yet I had had myself rubbed with almost all the ointment Esther had given me. I did not forget her wishes. I had myself driven to a bookseller's, where I bought all the books I thought might entertain her. I sent them to her, asking her to send me back all the ones she had read. She did so promptly, and, thanking me profusely, asked me to come and kiss her before leaving Amsterdam if I wanted to receive a nice present.

I went there very early, leaving my post chaise at her door. Her governess took me to her bed, where I found her in a merry mood, with a complexion of lilies and roses.

"I am certain," she said, "that you would not have come if I had not used the word 'kiss.' "

So saying, she surrendered all the charms of her face to my eager lips. Glimpsing the pink buds of her young breasts, I was about to lay hold of them, but as soon as she saw it she stopped laughing and defended herself. She said that I was well advised to go and amuse myself at The Hague with Madame Trenti, in whose care I had left a most precious pledge of my affection. I assured her that I was going to The Hague only to talk business with the Ambassador, and that she would see me again five or six days later, in love only with her. She answered that she relied on my word, and when I left her she granted me such a sweet kiss that I felt certain she would grant me everything on my return. I left very much in love and reached Boas's house at suppertime.

CHAPTER VII

My luck in Holland. I return to Paris with young Pompeati.

AMONG THE letters I received at the post I found one from the Comptroller-General which told me that twenty millions in royal securities were in the hands of Monsieur d'Affry, who would not deliver them at more than an eight percent loss; and another from my patron the Abbé de Bernis which advised me to make the most advantageous deal I could with them and to be sure that when the Ambassador communicated it to the Minister he would be ordered to consent to the transaction, provided that not less was offered than could be obtained on the Exchange at Paris.

Boas, astonished by the profitable sale I had made of my sixteen Gothenburg shares, told me he would undertake to get the twenty millions discounted for me in shares of the Swedish East India Company if I would persuade the Ambassador to sign an agreement in which I would undertake to deliver the French royal securities at a ten percent loss, taking the Swedish shares at fifteen percent above par, as I had sold my own sixteen. I would have consented if he had not stipulated that I give him three months and that my contract could be changed if peace was made. I saw at once that I would do well to go back to Amsterdam, and I would have gone if I had not given La Trenti my word that I would wait for her in The Hague. She arrived from Rotterdam the next day and wrote me that she expected me for supper. I received her letter at the theater. The servant who brought it said that he would take me to her lodging as soon as the play was over. After sending my lackey back to Boas's house, I went.

I found this most unusual woman on the fifth floor of a dilapidated house with her daughter and her son. In the middle of the room there was a table covered with a black cloth on which stood two candles. Since The Hague was a court city I was richly dressed. The woman, clad in black with her two children, made me think of Medea.[1] Nothing could be prettier than the two young creatures. I fondly embraced the boy, calling him my son. His mother told him that from that moment on he was to consider me his father. He recognized me as the man he had seen at Venice in May 1753, in Signora Manzoni's house, and I was very much pleased. His stature was short, he seemed to have an excellent constitution, he was well built, and his delicate features bespoke intelligence. He was thirteen years old.

His sister stood there motionless, seemingly waiting for her turn to come. Having taken her on my lap, I could not have enough of covering her with kisses. For all her silence, she enjoyed seeing that she interested me more than her brother did. She had on only a very light petticoat. I kissed every part of her pretty body, delighted to be the man to whom the little creature owed her existence.

"Isn't this the same gentleman, dear Mother, whom we saw at Amsterdam and who people thought was my father because I look like him? But that's not possible, because my father is dead."

"True," I said, "but I can be your fond friend. Do you want me?"

"Oh, my dear friend! Let's give each other a good hug!"

After the laughter which was to be expected, we sat down at table. The heroine gave me a choice supper and excellent wine. She had not, she said, treated the Margrave better at the suppers for two with which she entertained him. Wanting to know the character of her son, whom I had decided to take with me, I talked only with him. I discovered that he was false, secretive, always on his guard, always preparing his answers in advance, and hence never giving such answers as would have come from his heart if he had followed its bidding. All this, however, was accompanied by a show of politeness and reserve which he thought was bound to please me. I told him quietly that his calculated manner might be all very well at the proper time and place, but that there were moments when a man could not be happy unless he was unconstrained and that it was only then that he would be seen to have a lovable nature, if indeed it was such. At that his mother, thinking to praise him, said that his principal quality was discretion; that she had taught him to be discreet always and in everything, and hence she was not hurt by his habit of being as reserved with her as he was with everyone else. I told her to her face that it was abominable, and that I could not imagine how a father could have any fondness—let alone a predilection—for a son who never spoke out.

"Tell me," I said to the boy, "if you feel able to promise me that you will have complete confidence in me and will under no circumstances keep any secrets from me or leave anything unspoken between us."

"I promise you," he answered, "that I will die sooner than tell you a lie."

"That is his character," his mother interrupted; "such is the horror of lying that I have inculcated in him."

"That is all very well," I answered, "but you could teach your son a different road to happiness. Instead of showing him the ugliness of falsehood, you could show him the beauty of truth. It is the only way to make oneself lovable, and in this world to be happy one must be loved."

"But," he answered, with a sly smile which I did not like and which enchanted his mother, "aren't not lying and telling the truth the same thing?"

"Certainly not, for you would only have to tell me nothing at all. The thing is to disclose your soul, to tell me everything that goes on within you and around you, and to reveal to me even what might make you blush. I will help you to blush, my dear son, and before very long you will find yourself in no danger of it; but when we know each other better we shall soon see if we suit each other, for I could never consider you my son without loving you tenderly, and I will never permit you to call me father unless I see that you love me as you might love your closest friend; as for knowing you, I will undertake to do that, for you will never be able to hide the least of your thoughts from me; but if I find it out despite you, I shall love you no longer and you will be the loser. You shall come to Paris with me as soon as I finish my business in Amsterdam, where I am going tomorrow. When I return I hope I shall find that your mother has taught you the rudiments of a new system of conduct."

I was amazed to see my daughter, who, having listened to everything I had said to her brother without batting an eye, was making vain efforts to hold back her tears.

"Why are you crying?" said her mother; "it's stupid."

Small Nécessaire Suspended from Belt

At that the child burst out laughing, threw herself on her neck, and kissed her. I saw beyond doubt that her laughter had been as false as her feeling tears had been natural.

"Do you want to come to Paris with me too?" I asked her.

"Yes, my dear friend, but with Mamma, for without me she would die."

"What if I ordered you to go?" said her mother.

"I would obey, but away from you how could I live?"

Thereupon my dear daughter pretended to cry. That she was pretending was obvious. Even Teresa must have known it, and I took her aside and told her that if she had brought up her children to be actors she had succeeded, but that in polite society they were monsters in embryo. I stopped reproaching her when I saw her crying, but real tears. She asked me to stay at The Hague a day longer; I told her I could not, and I left the room to go somewhere; but I was very much surprised on my return to hear Sophie say to me that if she was to believe I was her friend she must have a proof of it.

"What proof, my little darling?"

"Coming to supper with me tomorrow."

"I cannot, for since I have just refused the same thing to your mother she would be offended if I granted it to you."

"Oh no—for it was she who just told me to ask you."

We laughed; but when her mother called her a little fool and her brother added that he would not have committed such an indiscretion, I clearly saw the distress of her soul in the little girl's face. I hastened to reassure her, not caring if I displeased her mother by giving her a taste of new moral principles, to which she listened with wonder. I ended by promising her I would come to supper with her the next day, but on condition that she would give me only one bottle of Burgundy and three dishes.

"For you are not rich," I said.

"I know it, my dear friend, but Mamma said that you would pay for everything."

At this answer I had to hold my sides, and her mother, despite her annoyance, had to do the same. The poor woman, artful though she was, took Sophie's ingenuousness for stupidity. It was intelligence, it was a diamond of the first water which only needed someone to polish it. She said that the wine cost her nothing, that a certain V. D. R.,[2] a young man who was the son of a burgomaster of Rotterdam, provided her with it, and that he would sup with us the next evening if I had no objection. I answered, with a laugh, that I would even be glad to see him. I left after devouring my daughter with kisses. I wished that her mother would give her to me, but it was no use my asking, for I saw that she regarded her as a resource for her old age. This is the usual attitude among adventuresses, and Teresa was nothing else. I gave the mother twenty ducats to spend on dressing my adopted son and Sophie, who, in an outburst of gratitude, flung herself on my neck. Joseph wanted to kiss my hand, but I warned him that in future he was not to show his gratitude to me only by kisses. When I started to go downstairs she showed me a little room in which her children slept. I saw her meaning, but I was far from having any of my old hankering for her. Esther completely occupied me.

The next day at Teresa's I found young V. D. R. A handsome youth of twenty-two, simply dressed, neither cold nor warm, neither polite nor impolite, with no social grace. He had every right to be Teresa's lover, but none to treat me cavalierly. When she saw that he wanted to play the "man in possession" and that he offended me she took a high tone with him. After criticizing the poorness of the dishes and praising the excellence of the wines he sent her, he departed, leaving us at dessert. I, in turn, left her at eleven o'clock, assuring her that I would see her again before I set out. A Princess Galitzin,[3] née Kantemir, had invited me to dinner.

The next day I received a letter from Madame d'Urfé, who sent me twelve thousand francs in the form of a bill of exchange on Boas, saying very generously that since her shares had cost her only sixty thousand francs she did not want to profit from them. This present of five hundred louis[4] pleased me. All the rest of her letter was filled with fantasies. She said that her Genius had told her that I would come back to Paris with a boy born from philosophical intercourse and that she hoped I would take pity on her. Strange coincidence! I laughed in anticipation of the effect which the appearance of Teresa's son would have on her soul. Boas thanked me for my willingness to let him pay me my bill of exchange in ducats. Gold in Holland is a commodity. Payments are made in paper or in silver. At the moment no one wanted ducats because the agio[5] had gone up to five stuivers.

After dining with Princess Galitzin I went for my redingote and then went to the coffeehouse to read the gazettes. I saw V. D. R., who, about to begin a game of billiards, whispered to me that I might well bet on him.

This friendly advance pleased me. I thought he was sure of his skill, and I began betting; but after he lost the third game I bet against him without his knowledge. Three hours later he stopped, having lost thirty or forty games, and, thinking that I had always bet on his side, he expressed his regret. I saw that he was surprised when, showing him thirty or forty ducats, I said that, being a little doubtful of his confidence in his own skill, I had won them by betting against him. All the players laughed; he could not stand a joke; he took great offense at my jibes; he left in a rage; and a moment later I went to Teresa's because I had promised her I would. I was to leave for Amsterdam the next day. She was expecting V. D. R., but she stopped expecting him when I told her how and why he had left the billiard room in a rage. After spending an hour with Sophie in my arms, I left her, assuring her that we would meet again in three or four weeks. On my way back to Boas's alone, with my sword under my arm, I am suddenly attacked in the brightest moonlight by V. D. R. He says he is curious to see if my sword is as sharp as my tongue. I try vainly to calm him by talking reasonably, I do not unsheathe though he has his bare sword in his hand, I say that he should not take mere jests so hard, I beg his pardon, I offer to put off my departure and beg his pardon at the coffeehouse. Not a bit of it—he is determined to kill me, and to persuade me to draw my sword he gives me a blow with the flat of his. It is the only blow I have received in my entire life. I finally draw my sword, and, still hoping to make him listen to reason, I fence with him, giving ground. He takes it for fear, and he gives a lunge which makes my hair stand on end. He pierced my cravat on the left, his sword veering off—four lines farther in, and he would have cut my throat. In my terror I jumped to one side, and, determined to kill him, I wounded him in the chest and, being sure of it, I invited him to stop. Saying that he was not yet dead, he came after me like a madman; I touched him three or four times in succession. At my last thrust he jumped back, saying that he had had enough and only begged me to leave.

I was glad when, starting to wipe off my sword, I saw that the point of it was very little stained. Boas had not yet gone to bed. When he had heard the whole story he advised me to leave for Amsterdam at once, despite my assuring him that the wounds were not mortal. My chaise being at the harness-maker's, I set off in a carriage belonging to Boas, leaving my servant orders to start the next day and bring my baggage to Amsterdam, at the "Second Bible,"[6] where I put up. I arrived there at noon, and my servant at nightfall. He had no news to tell me; but what pleased me was that nothing was heard of the matter at Amsterdam until a week later. Though simple enough, the thing could have done me harm, for the reputation of being a brawler is no way to please financiers with whom one is about to conclude profitable business.

As far as appearances went my first visit was to Monsieur D. O., but in reality it was Esther who received the homage of it. The way I had parted from her had set me on fire. Her father was not there; I found her writing at a table; she was entertaining herself with a problem in arithmetic; to divert her I made two magic squares; they delighted her; in return she showed me some trifles which I already knew and in which I pretended to be interested. My good Genius put it into my mind to perform the cabala for her. I told her to write a question asking something she did not know and was curious about, assuring her that by means of a certain calculation she would receive a satisfactory answer. She laughed, and she asked why I had come back to Amsterdam so soon. I show her how to construct pyramids with numbers drawn from words, and all the other ceremonies; then I have her extract a numerical answer herself, which I have her translate into the French alphabet, and she is astonished to read that what has brought me back to Amsterdam so quickly is love. All wonder, she says it is astonishing even if the answer is untrue, and she wants me to tell her what masters can teach such a wonderful calculation. I say that those who know it can teach it to no one.

"Then how do you know it?"

"I learned it by myself from a manuscript which my father left me."

"Sell me the manuscript."

"I have burned it. I am at liberty to teach it to only one person, but not until I reach the age of fifty. If I teach it before then I risk losing it. An elemental spirit who is attached to the oracle would leave it. I learned all this from the same manuscript."

"Then you can find out all the greatest secrets in the world?"

"I should have that privilege if the answers weren't in most cases very obscure."

"As it doesn't take long, would you have the kindness to extract the answer to another question for me?"

She then asked what her destiny was to be, and the oracle answered that she had not yet taken the first step on the road to it. All wonder, Esther calls her governess and thinks she will amaze her by showing her the two oracles; but the good Swiss woman sees nothing extraordinary in it. In her impatience she calls her a fool. She begs me to let her put another question, and I encourage her. She asks what person in Amsterdam loves her most, and, using the same method, she finds the answer that no one loves her more than the person to whom she owes her existence. The poor, intelligent girl then tells me with the utmost seriousness that I have made her miserable, for she will die of grief if she cannot learn the calculation. I do not answer, and she sees me downcast. She writes a question, hiding the paper with her beautiful hand. I get up to leave her free; but while she is constructing the pyramid I glance at the paper as I walk by, and I read her question. After doing everything I had taught her to do, she says that I can extract the answer without having to read her question. I agree, and she blushes and asks me to do her the favor. I consent, but on condition that she will not ask me to do her the same favor again. She promises. Since, having read her question, I know that she asked the oracle's permission to show her father all the questions she put, I produce the answer that "she will be happy if she never keeps anything which is important to her a secret from her father." At that she oh'd and ah'd, finding no words strong enough to show me her gratitude. I left her to go to the Exchange, where I talked at length with Monsieur Pels about my chief business.

The next morning a handsome and very gentlemanly man came bringing me a letter from Teresa in which she introduced him to me, assuring me that if I had any business to transact he could be useful to me. His name was Rigerboos.[7] She said that V. D. R.'s five wounds were all slight, that I had nothing to fear, that no one knew anything of the affair, and that there was nothing to stop me if I needed to go back to The Hague. She said that Sophie talked about me from morning to night, and that when I came back I would be much better pleased with her son. I asked Monsieur Rigerboos to give me his address, assuring him that if the occasion arose I should have perfect confidence in his probity. A moment after he left I received a note from Esther in which she asked me, in her father's name, to come and spend the whole day with her, unless some important business prevented me. I answered that except for a transaction of which her father knew, my only important business in the world would be whatever I could do to conquer her heart. I promised to go.

I went there at dinnertime. Esther and her father were busily examining the calculation which drew rational answers from the pyramid. Her father embraced me, with joy painted on his noble countenance, saying that he was fortunate to have a daughter who had deserved my attention. When I answered that I adored her he encouraged me to kiss her, and Esther gave a cry and literally sprang into my arms.

"I have attended to everything," said Monsieur D. O., "and I have the whole day to myself. I have known from childhood, my dear friend, that the science of which you are in possession exists in the world, and I was acquainted with a Jew who made a great fortune by it. He said, as you do, that he could impart it only to one person, upon pain of losing it himself. But he put it off so long that he died without being able to impart it to me. It was a high fever which deprived him of the power. Permit me to tell you that if you do not know how to profit by your skill, you do not know what you possess. It is a treasure."

"My oracle, Monsieur, answers very obscurely."

"The answers my daughter has shown me are perfectly clear."

"It seems she is fortunate in her questions, for the answers depend upon that."

"We shall see after dinner if I have the same good fortune, if you will be so good as to work with me."

At table we talked of other things entirely, for there were some employees present, and among them his head manager, an ugly, coarse fellow, who I thought had notions about Esther. After dinner we withdrew, and, with only Esther present, Monsieur D. O. took two very long questions from his pocket. In one he wanted to know how he should go about obtaining a favorable decision from the States-General [8] in a business matter which was of great consequence to him and of which he gave the details. I answered this question very obscurely and very quickly, leaving it for Esther to put it into words; when he asked his second question I took a notion to answer it clearly. He asked what had been the fate of a ship which was known to have sailed from the East Indies on a certain date, but what had become of it was not. It should have arrived two months since; he wanted to know if it was still in existence or if it had perished, and where and how. No one had ever had any news of it. The company which owned it would be satisfied with an insurer who would give them ten percent, but they found no one. What made it almost certain that the ship was lost was a letter from an English captain who testified that he had seen it go down.

The gist of my answer, which I was stupid enough to give without apprehending any ill consequences, was that the ship still existed and had suffered no damage, and that trustworthy news of it would arrive within a week. So it was that, wanting to raise my oracle's reputation sky-high, I risked its losing it entirely. But I should have done none of this if I had guessed what Monsieur D. O. would do in consequence of my oracle. He went pale for joy. He told us that it was of the utmost importance to speak of the matter to no one, for he was planning to go and insure the vessel at the best rate possible. Aghast, I told him that I did not answer for the truth of the oracle and that I should die of mortification if I were the cause of his losing a large sum. He asked me if the oracle sometimes deceived me, and I answered that it often led to mistakes by being equivocal. Esther, seeing my uneasiness, begged her father to take no steps in the matter.

Monsieur D. O. remained lost in thought, then spoke at length, reasoning erroneously on the so-called power of numbers, and told his daughter to read him all the questions she had asked. There were six or seven of them, all short and all of a nature to be answered plainly or equivocally or humorously. Esther, who had constructed all the pyramids, shone by extracting the answers with my all-powerful help. Her father, in ecstasies at seeing her so clever, thought that she would succeed in mastering the oracle, and Esther herself made bold to believe it. After spending seven hours discussing all the answers, which were acclaimed as divine, we supped. Monsieur D. O. invited me to dine at his house on the Amstel, which I already knew. I accepted with pleasure.

Returning to my lodging, I passed a house where there was dancing, and, seeing people going in and out, I wanted to see what was doing. It was a musicau[9]—a dark orgy in a place which was a veritable sewer of vice, a disgrace to even the most repellent debauchery. The very sound of the two or three instruments which made up the orchestra plunged the soul in sadness. A room reeking with the smoke of bad tobacco, with the stench of garlic which came from the belches emitted by the men who were dancing or sitting with a bottle or a pot of beer to their right and a hideous slattern to their left, presented my eyes and my thoughts with a distressing image which showed me the miseries of life and the level of degradation to which brutishness could reduce pleasures. The crowd which gave life to the place was composed entirely of sailors and others of the common people, to whom it seemed a paradise which made up to them for all that they had suffered on long and painful voyages. Among the prostitutes I saw there I found not one with whom I could possibly have diverted myself for a moment. A shady-looking man who might be a tinsmith and who had the manners of a boor came and asked me in broken Italian if I wanted to dance for a sou. I declined. He pointed out a Venetian woman who was sitting there, saying that I could take her to a room upstairs and drink with her.

I approach, I think I recognize her, but the gloomy light of four unsnuffed candles does not let me make out her features. Impelled by curiosity, I sit down beside her and ask her if it is true that she is a Venetian and if it has been long since she left her native country. She answers that it has been about eighteen years. I am brought a bottle, I ask her if she wants to drink, she says yes, adding that I can go upstairs with her. I answer that I haven't time, I hand over a ducat in payment, I am given the change, which I put into the hand of the poor devil of a creature, who offers me a kiss which I refuse.

"Do you like Amsterdam better than Venice?" I ask her.

"In my own country I didn't follow this accursed trade. I was only fourteen, and I lived with my father and mother."

"Who seduced you?"

"A courier."

"In what contrada[10] of Venice did you live?"

"I didn't live in Venice but on an estate in Friuli not far from there."

An estate in Friuli, eighteen years, a courier—I am moved, I look at her closely, and I recognize Lucia[11] of Pasiano, but I am careful not to change my attitude of indifference. Far more than age, debauchery had withered her face and all its appurtenances. Lucia, fond, pretty, ingenuous Lucia, whom I had loved so much and whom I had spared out of delicacy, in such a state, ugly, repellent, in a brothel in Amsterdam! She drank without looking at me and without caring to know who I was. I did not feel curious to learn her story, I even thought I knew it. She said that she lived in the musicau and would give me pretty girls if I came to see her. I gave her two ducats and quickly left. I went to bed overwhelmed with sorrow. I thought I had spent a day of ill omen, remembering Monsieur D. O. too, who because of my silly cabala might be going to lose three hundred thousand florins. The thought, which made me despise myself, boded ill for the affection which Esther inspired in me. I foresaw her becoming my implacable enemy together with her father. A man cannot love except with the hope of being loved. The sight of Lucia in the musicau left an impression on me which brought me the most ominous dreams. I considered myself the cause of her misfortune. She was only thirty-two, and I foresaw a horrible future for her.

After tormenting myself and not sleeping, I get up, I order a carriage, and I put on a fine suit to go and make my bow to Princess Galitzin, who was lodging at the "Star of the East." She had gone to the Admiralty. I go there and find her in the company of Monsieur de Reischach[12] and Count de Tott, who had just received news of my friend Pesselier,[13] at whose house I had met him. I had left him very ill when I departed from Paris.

Leaving the Admiralty, I dismiss my carriage and my lackey, ordering him to be at Monsieur D. O.'s house on the Amstel at eleven o'clock. I go there on foot, and, dressed as I am, I find some of the Dutch populace hooting and whistling at me. Esther sees me from the window, a cord is pulled on the second floor, the door opens, I go in, close it behind me, and at the fourth or fifth step on my way up a wooden staircase my foot strikes against something yielding. I look, and seeing a green portfolio I stoop to pick it up, but I awkwardly give it a push, and it drops under the staircase through an opening which had been made in the front of the next step, apparently to give light to the place under the stairs. I do not stop but go on up. I am received as usual, and I explain the reason for my elaborate dress. Esther laughs at my looking like a different person, but I have the impression that they are gloomy. Esther's governess comes in and speaks to them in Dutch. I see Esther look distressed, then go and give her father a hundred caresses.

"I see," I say to him, "that some misfortune has befallen you; if my presence incommodes you, permit me to withdraw at once."

He answers that the misfortune is not great and that he has resigned himself to it, since he is rich enough to bear it with equanimity.

"I have lost," he said, "a quite well-furnished portfolio, which, if I had used my common sense, I would have left at home, for I had no need for it until tomorrow. I can only have lost it in the street—how, I don't know. It contains some sizable bills of exchange, on which I can stop payment, but also some English bank notes, of which the bearers can make what use they please. Let us thank God for all things, my dear Esther, and pray to him to keep us in health and to preserve us from still greater misfortunes. I have suffered worse blows in my life, and I have borne up. So let us say no more of this incident, which I will regard as a small bankruptcy."

I remained silent, with joy in my soul. I was sure that the portfolio was the one I had pushed through the opening, so it was not lost; but I at once thought that I would not let them recover it without some cabalistic trappings. The chance was too good a one for me to fail to use it and give my hosts a great example of the infallibility of my oracle. The idea having put me in a good humor, I said countless things which made Esther laugh and told her stories which ridiculed the French, whom she detested.

We dined very choicely and drank of the best. After coffee I said that if they liked cards I would play; but Esther said it would be a pity to waste time at that.

"I can't get enough of pyramids," she said. "May I ask who has found my father's portfolio?"

"Why not?" I said. "It's a simple question."

She framed it very briefly and the answer which came out, equally brief, told her that no one had found her father's portfolio. She ran and embraced her father, whom the answer had made sure that his portfolio would come back to him; but she was first surprised, then laughed a great deal, when I told her that any hope she had that I would go on working was vain unless she gave me at least as many caresses as she had given her dear father. At that she gave me a quantity of kisses, and she extracted the pyramid from the question which asked where the portfolio was. I elicited the words: "The portfolio dropped through the opening in the fifth step of the staircase."

D. O. and his daughter rise, greatly relieved, they go down, and I follow them. He himself shows us the opening through which the portfolio must have passed. He lights a candle, then enters a storeroom, goes down an underground staircase, and with his own hands picks up the portfolio, which was lying in water exactly under the opening in the stair. We go back up and spend an hour in the most serious discussion of the divinity of the oracle and its ability to make its possessor the happiest of men. Opening the portfolio, he showed us forty Exchequer bills for a thousand pounds sterling[14] each, of which he presented two to his daughter and two to me; taking them with one hand, I gave them to the beautiful Esther with the other, telling her to keep them for me. She would not consent until I threatened not to work with the cabala for her again. To Monsieur D. O. I said that I wanted nothing from him but his friendship. He embraced me and promised I should have it to the last day of his life.

By making Esther the custodian of twenty-two thousand florins, I was certain to bind her to me. The girl had a witchery in her eyes which intoxicated me. I said to her father that the business I had most at heart was to negotiate the twenty millions at little loss. He answered that he hoped to satisfy me, but that since he would often need me with him, I should come to lodge in his house. Esther added her solicitations to his, and I accepted, taking great care to conceal all the satisfaction I felt but at the same time showing them all the gratitude I owed them.

He then went to his study to write, and, left alone with Esther, I said that I felt ready to do anything for her which lay in my power but that first of all she must give me her heart. She said that the moment when I could ask her father for her hand would come when I was staying in their house. I assured her that she would have me there the next day.

Coming back, Monsieur D. O. said that the next day we would hear a great piece of news on the Exchange. He said that he would himself take over the supposedly lost ship for three hundred thousand florins—and let them call him a fool!

"I should really be a fool," he added, "if, after all that I have seen of the divinity of the oracle, I had doubts. I will make three millions; and if I lose it will not ruin me."

Esther, dazzled by the recovered portfolio, told her father that he must act at once, and for my part I could no longer retreat. Seeing me gloomy, Monsieur D. O. assured me that he would be no less my friend if the oracle proved to be fallacious. I asked him to let me question the oracle again before he risked such a large loss, and I saw that they were both delighted by my zeal for the good of their house.

But here is yet another incident which will make some of my readers incredulous or incline them to condemn me as a thoughtless and even dangerous person. I did everything myself—the question, the pyramid, and all the rest—refusing to let Esther take any part in it. I was delighted to be in time to prevent such a slaughter and determined that I would prevent it. A double meaning, which I could bring from my pen, would have discouraged them both, and since I had it in my head I thought I had expressed it perfectly in numbers on the paper which lay before me. Esther, who had the alphabet by heart, quickly translated it into words and amazed me when she read my answer. She read these words: "In such a case as this, there is nothing to fear. Your regret would be too painful." Nothing more was needed. Father and daughter together ran to embrace me, and Monsieur D. O. said that when the ship appeared he would owe me a tenth of his profit. Surprise prevented me from answering him and expressing my gratitude, for I felt certain that I had written "believe" [croire], not "fear" [craindre]. I could no longer draw back.

The next day I went to stay with them in a charming suite of rooms, and on the day after that I took Esther to a concert, where she rallied me on La Trenti's not appearing at it. The girl possessed me entirely, but since she constantly refused to yield to the essential purpose of my caresses she kept me languishing.

Four or five days later Monsieur D. O. communicated to me the decision reached at a conference he had held with Pels and the heads of six other banking houses concerning my twenty millions. They offered ten millions in cash and seven in obligations yielding five and six percent, with a deduction of one percent for brokerage fees. In addition they waived all claim to the twelve hundred thousand florins which the French East India Company[15] owed to the Dutch East India Company. I sent copies of the decision to Monsieur de Boulogne and Monsieur d'Affry, demanding a prompt answer. The answer I received a week later from Monsieur de Courteuil by order of Monsieur de Boulogne was that such terms were unacceptable and that I had only to return to Paris if I could not do better, and I was again told that peace was imminent. But Monsieur D. O.'s confidence had increased extraordinarily some days before this answer arrived. The Exchange itself had received trustworthy news that the ship in question was at Madeira. Four days earlier Monsieur D. O. had bought it with all its cargo for three hundred thousand florins. What a pleasure it was when we saw him come into our room with a look of triumph which confirmed the news! He said that he had already insured it from Madeira to Texel[16] for a trifle, and that a tenth of the profit was at my disposition. But what astonished me was these exact words, with which he ended his discourse:

"You are now rich enough to establish yourself in our country with the assurance of becoming immensely wealthy in a few years simply by using your cabala. I will be your agent. Let us make one household, and if you love my daughter I give her to you if she wants you."

Joy shone in Esther's eyes, but in mine she could see only my surprise, which was so beyond measure that it left me dumb and as if stupefied. After a long silence I entered upon a wiredrawn analysis of the feelings appropriate to the situation, ending by saying that though I adored Esther I must go back to Paris before coming to a resolve; I said I was sure that I would be able to decide my fate when I returned to Amsterdam. My answer won their approval and we spent the day in high spirits. The next day Monsieur D. O. gave a splendid dinner for his friends, who only said, amid good-natured laughter, that he had learned before anyone else that the ship was at Madeira, though no one could imagine how he had come to know it.

A week after this lucky incident he gave me an ultimatum on the business of the twenty millions, the upshot of which was that France would lose only nine percent on the sale of the twenty millions, on condition that I could not demand any brokerage fees from the purchasers. I sent accurate copies of this proposal to Monsieur d'Affry by express messenger, asking him to transmit them at my expense to the Comptroller-General together with a letter in which I warned him that the transaction would fall through if he let a single day pass before giving Monsieur d'Affry whatever powers he needed in order to give me the authority to contract. I appealed with no less urgency to Monsieur de Courteuil and the Duke, informing them all that I was to be given nothing but that I would conclude the transaction nevertheless, being certain that I would be reimbursed for my expenses and that what was due me as broker would not be refused me at Versailles.

As it was Carnival,[17] Monsieur D. O. saw fit to give a ball. He invited all the most distinguished men and women in the city. I will tell my reader only that the ball was sumptuous, as was the supper. Esther danced all the contradances with me with every possible grace, and shone arrayed in the diamonds of her late mother.

We were spending the whole of every day together, in love and unhappy because abstinence tormented us. Esther would only go so far as to permit me some little theft when I went to breakfast with her. She was generous only with her kisses, which, instead of calming me, made me frantic. She told me, like all the supposedly decent girls in the universe, that she was sure I would never marry her if she let me do whatever I wanted to her. She did not think I was married, for I had assured her too often that I was a bachelor, but she had no doubt that I had some strong attachment in Paris. I admitted it, and I assured her that I was going to free myself completely so that I could be bound to her until death by the most solemn of ties. Alas! I was lying, for she could not be separated from her father, who was only forty, and I could not imagine it possible that I should settle permanently in such a country.

Ten or twelve days after sending the ultimatum I received a letter from Monsieur de Boulogne in which he said that the Ambassador had received all the necessary instructions to enable me to conclude the business, and the Ambassador told me the same. He warned me to look to my arrangements, for he would not deliver the royal securities except upon receiving 18,200,000 francs in currency.

The sad moment of parting having thus come, we did not try to restrain our tears. Esther gave me the equivalent of the two thousand pounds sterling I had left with her on the day the portfolio was found, and her father, in accordance with my instructions, gave me one hundred thousand florins[18] in bills of exchange on Tourton & Baur and on Pâris de Montmartel [19] and a receipt for two hundred thousand florins which authorized me to draw on him until the entire amount was exhausted. When I left, Esther presented me with fifty shirts of the finest linen and fifty Masulipatam[20] handkerchiefs.

It was not love of Manon Balletti but a stupid vanity, a wish to cut a figure in Paris, which made me leave Holland. The fifteen months I spent under the Leads were not enough to cure the defects of my character. "Destiny" is a word without meaning; it is we who make our destiny, despite the maxim of the Stoics: Volentem ducit, nolentem trahit ("[Fate] leads the willing, drags the unwilling").[21] I am too self-indulgent if I apply it to myself.

After vowing to Esther that I would see her before the end of the year I left with a commissioner of the company which had bought the French securities and, reaching The Hague, went to stay with Boas, who received me with mingled astonishment and admiration. He said I had performed a miracle and that I should hurry on to Paris, if only to enjoy the incense of congratulations. He said, however, that he was sure I could not have done what I had done unless I had convinced the company beyond doubt that peace was on the verge of being made. I replied that I had not convinced them, but that peace would certainly be concluded. He said that if I could obtain for him a positive written assurance from the Ambassador that peace would be made he would present me with fifty thousand florins in diamonds. I replied that the Ambassador's certainty on the subject could not be greater than mine but that, even so, I considered it still only a moral certainty.

The next day I concluded everything with the Ambassador; and the commissioner returned to Amsterdam.

I went to supper at Teresa's, who showed me her children very nicely dressed. I told her to go to Rotterdam the next day and wait for my arrival there to entrust her son to me, for to avoid talk I did not want to take charge of him in The Hague.

From one of Boas's sons I bought a pair of diamond earrings and several fine stones for forty thousand florins. I had to promise him that I would stay with him when I came back to The Hague, but I did not keep my word.

At Rotterdam Teresa bluntly told me that she knew for certain I had made half a million in Amsterdam and that her fortune would be assured if she could leave Holland and set herself up in London. She got Sophie to tell me that my good fortune had been the result of her prayers to God. All this made me laugh. I gave her a hundred ducats and told her that I would arrange to have her paid another hundred when she wrote to me from London. I saw that she thought the amount small, but I did not let that persuade me to give her more. She waited until I had got into my chaise to ask me for another hundred ducats, and I whispered to her that I would give her a thousand on the spot if she would let me have Sophie. After thinking for a moment she said no. I left after giving my daughter a watch. I reached Paris on the 10th of February,[22] and I took a fine apartment in Rue Comtesse-d'Artois near the Rue Montorgueil.[23]

DURING THE short journey I came to the conclusion that my newly adopted son's soul was not as attractive as his person. What his mother had chiefly instilled by the education she had given him was discretion. This quality in her son was the one which her own interest demanded that he should possess above all others; but the unschooled boy carried it too far; he combined it with dissimulation, suspicion, and false confidences. Not only did he not say what he knew, he pretended to know what he did not know; to be successful, he felt that he must be impenetrable, and to that end he had acquired the habit of imposing silence on his heart and never saying anything which he had not framed in his mind beforehand. He thought he was being prudent when he gave a false impression. Incapable of friendship, he became unworthy to win friends.

Foreseeing that Madame d'Urfé would count on the boy for the accomplishment of her chimerical hypostasis and that the more I made his birth a mystery, the more her Genius would lead her to invent wild fantasies, I ordered him to conceal nothing about himself if a lady to whom I would present him showed any curiosity about his circumstances when she was alone with him. He promised to obey me. He had not been expecting that I would order him to be sincere.

My first visit was to my patron,[1] whom I found entertaining a large company; among them I saw the Venetian Ambassador,[2] who pretended not to know me.

"How long have you been in Paris?" asked the Minister, taking my hand.

"No time at all. I have just got out of my post chaise."

"Then go to Versailles, you will find the Duke of Choiseul and the Comptroller-General there. You have performed miracles, go and be adored. Come to see me afterward. Tell the Duke that I have sent Voltaire a passport in which the King appoints him a gentleman-in-ordinary."[3]

One does not go to Versailles at noon, but this was the way Ministers talked when they were in Paris. It was as if Versailles were at the other end of the street. I went to Madame d'Urfé's.

The first thing she said to me was that her Genius had told her she would see me that very day.

"Kornmann," she said, "told me yesterday that what you have done is incredible. I am sure it was you who discounted the twenty millions. Securities have gone up, and within the week there will be a circulation of at least a hundred millions. Forgive me for having ventured to make you a present of twelve thousand francs. It is nothing."

I saw no need to tell her that she was wrong. She sent word to the porter to close the door to everyone, and we began talking. I saw her tremble with joy when I coolly told her that I had brought a twelve-year-old boy with me, whom I meant to bring up in the best boarding school in Paris.

"I will put him in Viar's,"[4] she said, "where my nephews are. What is his name? Where is he? I know what the boy is. I cannot wait to see him. Why did you not come straight here?"

"I will present him to you day after tomorrow, for tomorrow I shall be at Versailles."

"Does he speak French? Until I have made all the arrangements for his schooling, you simply must leave him with me."

"We will discuss it day after tomorrow."

After stopping at my office, where I found everything in order, I went to the Comédie Italienne, where Silvia was playing.[5] I found her in her dressing room with her daughter. She said she knew I had done very well with my business in Holland, and I saw that she was surprised when I said that I had worked for her daughter. The girl blushed. After saying that I would go to supper with them I took a place in the amphitheater. What a surprise! In one of the first-tier boxes I see Madame XCV[6] with all her family. Here is the story.

Madame XCV, of Greek origin, was the widow of an Englishman to whom she had given six children, four girls[7] and two boys. On his deathbed, unable to resist his wife's tears, he declared himself a Roman Catholic; but since his children could not inherit a capital of forty thousand pounds sterling which he had in England except by declaring themselves Anglicans, she had just come from London, where she had attended to all that.[8] It was at the beginning of the year 1758.[9]

In the year 1753 I fell in love with her eldest daughter[10] at Padua, where I acted in a play with her, and six months later at Venice Madame XCV saw fit to exclude me from her society. Her daughter made it possible for me to bear the affront calmly by a charming letter, which I still cherish; besides, being then in love with M. M. and C. C., I easily forgot her. The girl, though only fifteen[11] years old, was a beauty, and to the charms of her figure she added those of a cultivated mind, the spell of which is often more powerful. The Chamberlain to the King of Prussia, Count Algarotti,[12] gave her lessons, and several young patricians hoped to conquer her heart; the one who seemed to have the preference was the eldest son of the Memmo di San Marcuola[13] family. He died four years ago as Procurator of San Marco.

The reader can imagine my surprise when, five years later, I saw the whole family. Miss XCV [14] recognizes me instantly, she points me out to her mother, and the latter at once beckons to me with her fan. I went to her box at once.

She receives me by saying that we are no longer in Venice, that she is heartily glad to see me again, and that she hopes I will often come to call on her at the Hôtel de Bretagne[15] in the Rue Saint-André-des-Arts, where she is staying. Her daughter treats me to the same compliment with even greater insistence; she looks a goddess, and it seems to me that after a sleep of five years my love wakes again with an increase in power equal to that which the object before my eyes had gained in the same period of time.

They tell me that they expect to spend six months in Paris before going back to Venice; I reply that I intend to make my residence in Paris, that I have just returned from Holland that day, that I am obliged to spend the next day at Versailles, and that they will see me the day after that at their lodging, eager to offer them any services in my power.

"I have heard," says Miss XCV, "that what you have done in Holland must make you dear to France, and I have always hoped to see you; and your prodigious escape gave us the greatest pleasure, for we were always fond of you. We learned the details of it from a sixteen-page letter you wrote to Signor Memmo, which made us shudder and laugh. As for what you accomplished in Holland, we heard of it yesterday from Monsieur de la Pouplinière."[16]

The Farmer-General himself, whom I had first met at his house in Passy[17] seven years earlier, now entered the box. After congratulating me briefly, he said that if I could obtain twenty millions for the East India Company[18] in the same way, he would have me made Farmer-General. He advised me to get myself naturalized as a French citizen before it became generally known that I must be worth at least half a million.

"You cannot have made less."

"The business, Monsieur, will ruin me if I am denied my brokerage fee."

"You are right to speak out. Everyone is eager to make your acquaintance, and France is indebted to you, for you have made securities rise."

It was at supper at Silvia's that my soul reveled in delight. I was made as much of as if I had been a son of the house, and on my side I convinced the whole family that I wanted to be regarded as such. It seemed to me that I owed all my good fortune to their influence and their unfailing friendship. I made the mother,[19] the father, the daughter, and the two sons[20] promise to accept the presents I had for them. Since the richest one was in my pocket, I presented it to the mother, who immediately gave it to her daughter. It was a pair of earrings which had cost me six thousand florins. Three days later I gave her a small chest in which she found two pieces of superb calencar,[21] two of very fine linen, and trimmings of the Flemish needlepoint known as "English point." I gave Mario, who liked to smoke, a gold pipe, and my friend[22] a handsome snuffbox. I gave a watch to the Cadet,[23] of whom I was inordinately fond. I shall have occasion to speak of this youth, whose qualities made him superior to his station in every respect. But was I rich enough to give such substantial presents? No, and I knew it. I made them only because I was afraid I should not become rich enough. If I had been sure of it, I would have waited.

I set out for Versailles before dawn. The Duke of Choiseul received me pen in hand as he had before; his hair was being dressed. This time he laid down his pen. After a brief compliment he said that if I felt I was capable of negotiating a loan of a hundred million florins at four percent, he would give me a recommendation which would do me honor. I answered that I might consider it after I learned what recompense for what I had already done would be given me by way of encouragement.

"Everyone says you have made two hundred thousand florins."

"Saying it means nothing unless it is proved. I can claim the brokerage fee."

"True. Go and state your case to the Comptroller-General."

Monsieur de Boulogne stopped the work he was doing to receive me graciously, but when I told him he owed me a hundred thousand florins, he smiled.

"I know," he said, "that you are the holder of bills of exchange to your order for a hundred thousand écus."

"That is true, but what I own has nothing to do with what I did. I have proof of it. I refer you to Monsieur d'Affry. I have an infallible plan for increasing the King's revenues by twenty millions without causing any complaint among those who will provide them."

"Execute it, and I will have the King himself give you a pension of a hundred thousand francs and a patent of nobility if you will become a French citizen."

I went to the private apartments, where Madame la Marquise was having a ballet rehearsed. She greeted me as soon as she saw me and said that I was a clever negotiator whom the gentlemen "down there"[24] had not properly appreciated. She still remembered what I had said to her at Fontainebleau eight years earlier. I replied that all good things came from "up there," and that I hoped to share in them through her kind offices.

Back in Paris I went to the Hôtel de Bourbon to inform my patron of all the results of my journey. He advised me to be patient and to continue to do well; and, when I mentioned that I had seen Madame XCV at the theater, he said that La Pouplinière was going to marry her eldest daughter.

The news when I reached my lodging was that my son had left.

"A great lady," said my hostess, "came to call on the Count" (he had immediately been dubbed Count) "and took him away with her."

I pretended to be pleased, and I went to bed. The next morning very early my clerk brought me a letter. It was from the old attorney who was the uncle of the girl whose sponsor I had been when she married Gaetano and whom I had helped to escape from him.[25] He asked me to come and speak with him at the Palais[26] or to tell him where I would be during the day. I went to the Palais.

He told me that his niece had been obliged to take refuge in a convent, where she had instituted proceedings against her husband with the help of a Councilor of the Parlement who was paying all the expenses of the case; but that they absolutely needed me, Count Tiretta, and the servants who had witnessed the scene, to prove the truth of the accusation. I managed all this very easily, and three or four months later the whole affair was ended by a fraudulent bankruptcy[27] on Gaetano's part, which forced him to leave France. I will relate at the proper time and place where I found the wretch three years later. As for his wife, she remained in Paris, happy with her good friend the Councilor, and perhaps she is still living there. I have completely lost sight of her.

Leaving the Palais, I called on Madame XXX, in order to see Tiretta. He was not there. She was still in love with him. I left my address for him, and I went to the Hôtel de Bretagne, in the same street, to make my first call on Madame XCV. The woman did not like me, but she received me very cordially. At Paris, and rich, I seemed another person to her. She had with her an old Greek named Zandiri, brother to Signor Bragadin's major-domo, who had just died; I expressed my condolences, and he made no reply. But the whole family avenged me for the man's stupid stiffness. Miss, her sisters, and her two brothers, the elder of whom was fourteen, covered me with caresses. But the levity of the elder brother surprised me. He was impatient to come into his inheritance so that he could devote himself to the wildest profligacy.

Miss XCV, as I have described her for my reader, combined with an easy manner a cultivated mind, which she never paraded except when the occasion warranted it and then without the slightest pretension. It was difficult to be near her and not fall in love with her; but, as I came to know some weeks later, being in no degree a flirt, she never allowed the slightest hope to spring up in those who had not had the good fortune to please her. She could be cold without being impolite, and so much the worse for those whose eyes her coldness did not open. During an hour which I spent alone with her she bound me in her chains, I told her so, and she showed that she was pleased. She took the place in my heart which Esther had occupied only a week earlier; but she would not have conquered it if Esther had been in Paris. My attachment to Silvia's daughter was of a kind which did not prevent me from falling in love with another woman. Unless it receives a certain amount of food, a libertine's love very quickly becomes cold, and women know this when they have a little experience. The Balletti girl was a complete novice.

Signor Farsetti,[28] a Venetian nobleman, Commander of the Order of Malta,[29] a man of letters with an interest in the abstruse sciences and a fair poet in Latin verse, arrived at one o'clock. Dinner was about to be served. Madame XCV had a place set for him at once; and since I was to dine with Madame d'Urfé I declined the honor. Signor Farsetti, who had known me well in Venice, only gave me a glance. He smiled when Miss praised my courage. She said that I had forced all Venetians to esteem me, and that the French wanted me to become their fellow citizen. He asked me if my position as a collector for the lottery paid me well.

"Enough," I answered, "to keep my clerk happy."

At Madame d'Urfé's I found my supposed son in her arms. She outdid herself in excuses for carrying him off, but I laughingly turned them aside. I told the little man that he must regard Madame as his queen and always open his heart to her. She told me she had made him sleep with her, but that she would have to forgo the pleasure if he would not promise to be better behaved in future. I thought it sublime, and I saw the young man blush. He asked her to tell him how he had offended her.

She said that Saint-Germain would dine with us; she knew that the adept amused me. He came, he sat down at the table—not to eat but to talk, as he always did. He brazenly related incredible stories, which we had to pretend we believed because he said that he had been either an eyewitness or the chief actor in them; but I could not keep from bursting out laughing when he told of something which had happened to him when he dined with the Fathers of the Council of Trent.[30]

Madame was wearing a large armed magnet[31] hanging from her neck. She claimed that at one time or another it would draw lightning down on her and thus she would go to the sun.

"There can be no doubt of it," said the impostor; "but I am the only person on earth who can give magnets a strength a thousand times greater than the usual run of physicists give them."

I said coldly that I would wager twenty thousand écus that he would not even double the strength of the one Madame was wearing. Madame prevented him from accepting the wager, and she told me privately afterward that I would have lost because Saint-Germain was a magician. I said she was right.

A few days later the self-styled magician left for Chambord,[32] one of the royal castles, where the King had given him an apartment and a hundred thousand francs so that he could work without interruption on the dyes which were to make all the cloth manufactories in France prosperous. He had won over the King by installing a laboratory at Trianon for him which often amused him, for he suffered from boredom everywhere except when he was hunting; it was the Marquise who had introduced the adept to him to teach him chemistry; for after he had presented her with the water of youth she believed everything he said. This miraculous water, taken in the quantity he had prescribed for her, did not, the worshiper of truth admitted, have the virtue of restoring youth, for that was impossible, but it had the virtue of preventing old age by keeping the body in statu quo for several centuries. She had told the monarch that she really felt she was not aging.

The monarch showed the Duke of Zweibrücken[33] a diamond of the first water weighing twelve carats which he wore on his finger and which he was convinced he had made himself, having been initiated into the magisterium[34] by the impostor. He said that he had melted twenty-four carats of small diamonds which had become one, and that it had later been reduced to twelve when it was polished on the wheel. Thus convinced of the adept's knowledge, he had given him the same lodging at Chambord which he had given the illustrious Maréchal de Saxe[35] for his lifetime. I heard this story from the Duke's own lips when I had the honor to sup with him and the Swedish Count of Lewenhaupt[36] at Metz at the "King Dagobert" inn.[37]

Before leaving Madame d'Urfé I told her that the boy might be the person to assure her rebirth, but that she would spoil everything if she did not wait until he had reached puberty.

She sent him to board at Viar's, giving him all kinds of teachers and the name of Count d'Aranda, despite the fact that he was born in Bayreuth[38] and that his mother had never had the slightest acquaintance with any Spaniard of that name. I did not go to see him until three or four months after he was well settled there. I was always afraid I might be subjected to some affront because of the name the visionary Marquise had given him without my knowledge.

Tiretta came to see me in a fine carriage. He said that the lady wanted to marry him, but that he would never agree even though she had offered him all her wealth. He could have gone to Treviso with her, paid his debts, and lived very well there. His destiny prevented him from following my good advice.

Having made up my mind to take a country house, I decided on "Little Poland"[39] after looking at several. It was well furnished, a hundred paces beyond the Madeleine barrier.[40] The house was on a little hill near the "Royal Hunt"[41] and behind the Duke of Gramont's[42] garden. The name the owner had given it was "Airy Warsaw."[43] It had two gardens, one of which was on the level of the second floor, three master's apartments, a stable for twenty horses, baths, a good cellar, and a large kitchen with all the necessary pots and pans. The owner of the house was known as the "Butter King,"[44] and this was the name he always signed. Louis XV himself had given it to him one day when he had stopped at his establishment and found his butter excellent. He rented me his house for a hundred louis a year and gave me an excellent female cook, known as "the Pearl,"[45] to whom he consigned all his furniture and the tableware I should need for six persons, undertaking to furnish me as much of it as I wanted at one sou per ounce. He also promised to furnish me all the wines I should order from him at less than the price in Paris, since he could obtain them from outside. Everything was cheaper beyond the barriers. He also promised me cheaper fodder for my horses, and in fact everything, since whatever entered Paris had to pay and, being there, I was in the country.

In less than a week I acquired a good coachman, two carriages, five horses, a groom, and two good footmen in half-livery. Madame d'Urfé, for whom I gave my first dinner, was delighted with my house. She took it all as if it had been done for her, and I let her believe it. I also let her believe that young Aranda belonged to the Great Order,[46] that his birth was the result of an operation unknown to the world, that I was only his guardian, and that he would die without ceasing to live. All this came out of her own brain, and the best thing I could do was to agree with her; but she maintained that she knew nothing except from the revelations of her Genius, who spoke to her only at night. I escorted her home, and I left her supremely content.

About this time Camilla[47] sent me the ticket for a small terna she had won at my office, asking me to come to supper with her and bring the money. It was a thousand écus. At the supper, at which I found all her pretty fellow actresses present with their lovers, I was persuaded to go to the ball at the Opéra,[48] where I had scarcely arrived before I lost all my companions in the crowd. Not being masked, I was attacked by a female black domino,[49] who, telling me in falsetto a quantity of things about myself which were true, made me curious to know who she was. I managed to persuade her to come to a box with me. When she raised her mask I was surprised to see Miss XCV. She said she had come to the ball with one of her sisters, the elder of her brothers, and Signor Farsetti, and that she had eluded them to change her domino in a box. She laughed, imagining their uneasiness. She had no idea of relieving them from it until the end of the ball. Finding myself alone with her and in a position to keep her with me all through the ball, I began talking to her of my old flame and of the strength with which it had been rekindled. She received my words kindly; she did not refuse my embraces; and the few obstacles she put in the way of whatever I tried to do assured me that my happiness was only deferred. Delicacy obliged me not to insist, and she showed that she was grateful to me.

I told her I had heard at Versailles that she was to become the wife of Monsieur de la Pouplinière. She answered that people believed it, that her mother wanted it, and that the old Farmer-General expected it, but that she would never consent.

"He guarantees me a dower of a million," she said, "in case I become a widow without children, and his whole estate if I give him a child; but I do not want to make myself miserable with a man whom I dislike when I am no longer mistress of my heart. I love a man in Venice, and my mother knows it; but she insists that the man I love would not be a suitable husband for me. She would rather see me married to Signor Farsetti, who would give up his cross,[50] but I loathe him."

"Has he already spoken?"

"In unmistakable terms, and the indications of my dislike which I constantly give him do not abash him. He is a contemptible visionary, malicious and jealous, who once at table hearing me speak of you as you deserve saw fit to tell my mother she should not receive you."

I offered to serve her unhesitatingly in any way in which she thought I could be of use. She answered with a smile that she would consider herself only too happy if she could count on my entire friendship; and taking fire at that, I said that I had fifty thousand écus at her service and that I was ready to risk the clearest danger to my life in order to win rights over her heart. At this avowal she showed me the fondest gratitude, clasping me in her arms and joining her lips to mine. It would have been base in me to attempt anything further at such a moment. She asked me to come and see her often, assuring me that we would spend hours alone together; it was all that I could want. I promised I would dine with her the next day. So we parted.

After spending an hour in the ballroom, following her everywhere at a distance and congratulating myself on having become so thoroughly her friend, I went to Little Poland. It took me only a quarter of an hour. I was living in the country, and in a quarter of an hour I could be anywhere I pleased in the city. My coachman drove like the wind, my horses being of the kind called enragés[51] and not intended to be spared. Such horses, cast-offs from the King's stable, were a luxury. When he drove one of them to death for me I replaced it for two hundred francs. One of the greatest pleasures in Paris is driving fast.

Having promised to dine with Miss, I slept only a few hours. I went out lightly clad, I walked through the Tuileries, crossed the Pont Royal, and appeared before Madame XCV covered with snow, which was falling that day in great flakes. She received me with a laugh, saying that her daughter had told her that she had driven me wild at the ball and that I was to dine with her.

"It is Friday," she said, "and you will have to fast, but we have some excellent fish. Meanwhile, go and see my daughter, who is still in bed."

She was sitting up writing, and she put down her pen when she saw me. She said she was only staying in bed because she was lazy and it gave her more freedom. She was going to have some broth, for, not liking fast-day dishes, she did not intend to get up even to go to the table. Unembarrassed by her sister's presence, she took from her portfolio a letter in verse which I had written her when her mother had closed her door to me. She recited it to me from memory, and then was moved to shed a few tears.

"This fatal letter," she said, "which you entitled 'The Phoenix' [52] has decided my destiny and will perhaps be the cause of my death."

I had named it "The Phoenix" because, after lamenting my sad fate, I predicted in the tones of a bard that she would give her heart to a man who would have so many qualities that he could justly be called a phoenix. I devoted a hundred lines to describing such physical and moral qualities as really represented a perfect being worthy to be adored. It was the portrait of a god.

"Well," the tender Miss XCV went on, "I fell in love with this imaginary being, and, sure that he must exist, I spent six months looking for him everywhere and stopping when at last I thought I had found him. We loved; I gave him my heart, and we did not separate until I left Venice, four months ago. We stayed in London[53] until the end of the year and we have already been here for six weeks. I have received only one letter from him, but it is not his fault. I am kept under constraint, and I can neither receive letters from him nor write to him."

This narrative confirmed me in my philosophy. The most decisive actions of our lives arise from very trifling causes. My verse epistle was only a poetical extravaganza, and the being whom I portrayed in it was above humanity; but she thought such a being possible, and she fell in love with him in advance. When she thought she had found him it was not hard for her to find in him all the qualities she wanted him to possess, since it was she herself who gave them to him; and it was all up with her. But for my letter, none of all this would have happened. All things are linked together, and we are the instigators of events in which we are not actors. Hence anything important which happens to us in this world is only what is bound to happen to us. We are but thinking atoms, which move where the wind drives them.

We were summoned to table and we ate a choice dinner with the ocean fish which La Pouplinière had sent. Madame XCV, being Greek and extremely superstitious, could not fail to be a bigot. The alliance between God and the devil is infallible in the head of a vain, weak, voluptuous, and timid woman. A priest had told her that converting her husband would assure her of eternal salvation, for in the Scriptures God promised in unmistakable terms animam pro anima ("a soul for a soul")[54] to anyone who converted a heretic. Having converted her husband, she was convinced that she was safe; she had nothing more to do. However, she fasted on Friday, but she was the gainer by it. She liked fish better than meat.

After dinner I went back to Miss's bedside, where she proved to be a match for me until nine o'clock, during which time I was always able to subjugate my desires.

Since I was conceited enough to believe that hers were no less violent than mine, I did not wish to be the weaker.

Not having seen Farsetti, I suspected a break; but I was mistaken. She told me that nothing could persuade the visionary to leave his house on a Friday.

He had seen in his horoscope that he was to be murdered on that day, so his good sense decreed that he should seclude himself. Everyone laughed at him; but he was right nevertheless. He died in his bed four years ago[55] at the ripe age of seventy. He believed he thus proved that a man's destiny depends on good conduct, prudence, and taking precautions to avoid the evils which he has foreseen. The reasoning is excellent—except in the case of the evils foretold in a horoscope if we assume that a horoscope is what the astrologers want us to believe it is; for either the evils foretold can be avoided, and then the horoscope becomes puerile, or it is the voice of destiny, and then they are inevitable. Hence the Chevalier Farsetti was a fool if he thought he had proved anything. He would have proved something to a few limited minds if he had gone out every day and someone had killed him. Pico della Mirandola,[56] who believed in astrology, said: Astra influunt non cogunt ("The stars influence, they do not force").[57] I have no doubt of it. But should one have believed in astrology if Signor Farsetti had been murdered on a Friday? Certainly not, even so.

The Count of Égreville had introduced me to his sister the Countess du Rumain,[58] who, having heard of my oracle, had long wanted to meet me. In a few days I gained the friendship of her husband as well and of her young daughters, the eldest of whom, who bore the name Coëtanfao,[59] later became the wife of Monsieur de Polignac.[60] Madame du Rumain was more beautiful than pretty. She was loved for the sweetness of her character, her frankness, and her eagerness to use her influence on behalf of her friends. With her imposing height of five and a half feet, she awed all the Parisian magistrates to whom she applied. At her house I met Madame de Valbelle,[61] Madame de Roncherolles,[62] Princess Chimay,[63] and several other ladies who were the delight of what was called "good society" in Paris. Though Madame du Rumain did not dabble in the abstruse sciences, she needed my oracle even more than Madame d'Urfé did. She was useful to me in a disastrous situation, of which the story follows.

On the next day but one after my long conversation with Miss XCV, my valet told me that a young man wished to deliver a letter to me personally. I have him shown in and I ask him who gave him the letter; he answers that I will know when I have read it. He says he has been ordered to wait for my reply. I open it, and I find this:

"At two hours after midnight I need to sleep. What prevents nature from granting me that sad comfort is a burden which weighs on my soul; it is a secret of which I shall feel that I am relieved when it is no longer a secret to you, my only friend at this moment. I am pregnant, and my situation drives me to despair. I bring myself to write you this because I feel that I could never bring myself to tell it to you. A word in reply."

My surprise only allowed me to write her these few words: "I will call on you at eleven o'clock."

A misfortune cannot be called very great unless it turns its victim's brain. Her entrusting such a confidence to writing showed me that poor XCV's wavering reason stood in need of help; and I was very glad that she had thought of me rather than anyone else, even if it meant that I would be ruined with her. Can one think otherwise when one loves? But what imprudence in the step she had taken! One must either speak or remain silent. The feeling which makes the victim of a misfortune prefer writing to speech can only derive from false shame (malus pudor),[64] which at bottom is nothing but pusillanimity. If I had not been in love with Miss, I should have found it easier to refuse her my help by letter than by word of mouth. But I was in love with her. "She must be counting on that," I said to myself, and the certainty nearly made me cherish her misfortune. If I could succeed in remedying it, I saw that I was sure of my reward, of the reward which is—alas!—the only goal of any man who loves.

I arrived to find her at the door of the hotel.

"You are going out? Where?"

"To mass at the Augustinians."[65]

"Is it a saint's day?"

"No, but my mother insists on my going every day. Give me your arm. We will talk in the cloister."

Her chambermaid remains in the church, and we go into the cloister.

"Have you read my letter?"

"Yes. Here it is. I return it to you. Burn it."

"I don't want it. You can burn it yourself. I am four months[66] gone with child, I am sure of it. I am in despair. I put myself in your hands. You must procure me an abortion."

"It is a crime."

"I know that, but it is no worse than killing oneself. Either an abortion or I will take poison. I have the poison ready. So, my only friend, you have become the arbiter of my destiny. Are you displeased that I preferred you to the Chevalier Farsetti?"

Seeing that I am aghast, she stops, draws her hood forward, and wipes away some tears. My heart bleeds.

"Crime or no crime, my dear Miss, abortion is not in our power. If the means used to bring it about are mild their effect is doubtful. If they are violent they threaten the pregnant woman's life. I will never take the risk of becoming your murderer; but I will not abandon you. Your honor is as dear to me as your life. Calm yourself, and from this moment imagine that it is I who am in your situation. Be sure that I will find a way out for you and that you will not take poison. Know in the meanwhile that I had no sooner read your letter than my first wholly involuntary reaction was to feel glad that you had chosen me before anyone else in a matter of such importance. You were not wrong. There is not a physician who knows this subject better than I do, and not a man in Paris who loves you better and who is more eager than I am to be useful to you. You shall begin at the latest tomorrow taking the drugs I will bring you, and I warn you that you cannot be too careful about secrecy, for it is a matter of breaking the severest laws. It is an infringement which is punished by death. Have you perhaps already confided in your chambermaid, in one of your sisters?"

"In no one, my dear friend, not even in him who is the cause of my misfortune. I shudder when I think what my mother would say, would do to me if she learned my condition, if she could guess it from watching my figure."

"Your figure is beyond suspicion, it is slim."

"It will become less and less so, and for that reason we must make haste. You shall find me a surgeon who does not know me, and take me to him when I am supposed to be at mass. I will let myself be bled as often as you want."

"I will not take that risk. The surgeon might betray us. I will bleed you myself. It is perfectly easy."

"I am grateful to you. I already seem to feel that you have restored me to life. The favor I ask of you is to take me to a midwife whom I could consult. We can easily go there the first evening there is a ball at the Opéra[67] without letting anyone see us when we leave the ballroom."

"There is no need for that, my dear. It is risky."

"Not at all, for in this vast city there are midwives everywhere, and we cannot possibly be recognized since we can even go masked. Do me this favor. The advice of a midwife can only be useful to me."

I did not have the strength of mind to refuse her the favor; but I made her consent to our waiting for the last ball,[68] where the crowd would make it easier for us to slip away unnoticed. I promised I would go to it in a black domino and wearing a white Venetian mask with a rose painted under my left eye. When she saw me go out she was to follow me and get into the same hackney coach she had seen me enter. All this was done; but we will return to it later.

I dined with her and the family, indifferent to the presence of Farsetti, who dined there too and who had seen me come back from mass with her. We never spoke to each other; but I disdained him.

But here is an enormous mistake[69] which I made, which I have to confess, and for which I have not yet forgiven myself.

Having promised Miss that I would accede to her wish and take her to a midwife, it is certain that if I had been wise myself[70] I ought to have taken her to a respectable woman, for it was only a matter of consulting her on the regimen a pregnant woman should follow and of obtaining some other innocent information. But not a bit of it. I pass through the narrow Rue Saint-Louis on my way to the Tuileries, I see La Montigny[71] going into her house with a pretty woman whom I do not know, I am seized with curiosity, I stop the coach, get out, and go up. After amusing myself for a time, since I am still thinking of Miss XCV I ask the procuress to give me the address of a midwife, as I need to consult one on some matter. She directs me to a house in the Marais,[72] the home, she says, of the cleverest of all midwives. She tells me several of her exploits, which show me that she is a criminal; but no matter, it was enough for me to know that I was not going to her on any illicit business. So I took down her address and, since I would have to go there at night, I went the next day to reconnoiter the door of her house.

Miss at once began taking the drugs which I did not fail to bring her, all of them potent to weaken and destroy what Love, Nature's master, had created; but seeing no effect from them she could not wait to talk with the midwife; the night of the last ball arrived, and, as we had arranged, she recognized me, followed me, entered the same hackney coach, and in less than a quarter of an hour we got out a hundred paces from the house in which the infamous creature lived. We see a woman of fifty,[73] who, showing every sign of being delighted by our visit, immediately offers us her services.

Miss tells her she thinks she is pregnant and has come to consult her about what she can do to conceal her pregnancy as much as possible until her time comes. The hussy replies with a laugh that she can tell her without beating around the bush that she will be very easy to abort and that she will accommodate her for fifty louis, half to be paid at once to buy the necessary drugs and the other half after she has had a successful miscarriage.

"Since I trust your honesty, you shall trust mine, give me the twenty-five louis now, and come or send tomorrow for the drugs and instructions for using them."

She then brusquely pulled up her client's skirt, who gently asked me not to look at her, and, after feeling her, lowered the curtain, saying that she could not be further along than the fourth month. She told us that if her drugs had no result, she would suggest other procedures, and that in any case she would return our money.

"I have no doubt of it," I answered; "but be so good as to tell me what the other procedures are."

"I will teach you how to kill the fetus, which then can only decamp."

I could have answered her that it was impossible to kill the child without mortally injuring the mother; but I did not want to argue with the infamous creature. I told her that if Madame decided to take her remedies I would come the next morning with the money to buy them. I gave her two louis, and we left.

Miss XCV told me she was sure the woman was a scoundrel and that she firmly believed the fetus could not be killed without endangering the mother, and hence she had confidence in no one but me. Saying that she felt cold, she asked me if we had time to make a quick fire at Little Poland, which she wanted to see. This sudden whim surprised and pleased me. On a very dark night she could see nothing of a country house except its interior, but I was far from raising any objection. I thought that the moment of my happiness was at hand.

I change coaches in the Rue de la Ferronnerie,[74] and a quarter of an hour later I am at my door. I give a master's ring, and "the Pearl" comes to open the door saying, as I very well knew, that there was no one at home. I tell her to light a fire and give us something to eat with a bottle of champagne. An omelet.

"Excellent, an omelet," said Miss gaily.

So there we are, in front of the fire, and I with my love in my arms, who seems to enjoy my transports and who does not tell me to restrain myself until she sees I have reason to think I am about to reach the summit of triumph. I have no difficulty in restraining myself, certain that after our little supper she will oppose no obstacle to my victory. Everything promised as much, her manner, her sweetness, her face which shone with gratitude, and her fond and languishing eyes. I was annoyed that she could think I could demand favors as rewards. I was magnanimous enough to want only love.

And now we have finished the bottle, we rise, and, half pleadingly, half using gentle force, I drop onto the bed, holding her in my arms; but she opposes my intention, first by honeyed words, then by too serious remonstrances, and finally by defending herself. That ends it. The mere idea of violence revolts me. I begin to plead my cause, sounding every note. I speak as a lover given hope, then deceived, then scorned. I say I am disabused, and I see that she is mortified. I then go down on my knees before her, I ask her to forgive me, and I hear her saying in the saddest voice that, since she is not mistress of her heart, she is more to be pitied than I am; then, melting into tears, she lets her head sink on mine, and our lips meet. The play is over. The idea of renewing the assault does not enter my mind except to be disdainfully rejected. After a long silence, of which we were both in the greatest need, she in order to still the feeling of shame which overwhelmed her, I to give my reason time to calm feelings of anger which I thought well justified, we resumed our disguises and went back to the Opéra. It was she who, on the way, went so far as to tell me that she would have to renounce my friendship if I set that price on it. I answered that feelings of love must yield to a sense of honor, and that her honor no less than mine obliged me to be her constant friend, if only to convince her that she did me an injustice by refusing me favors of which I was not unworthy, and that I would die before I would again attempt to gain them.

We parted at the Opéra, where the immense crowd hid her from my sight in a minute. She told me the next day that, even so, she had spent the whole night dancing as hard as she could. She hoped that violent motion might be the medicine she needed.

I went home in a very bad humor, seeking vainly for reasons which might justify a refusal I could never have expected. I could not conclude that Miss's action had been just and reasonable except by piling sophism on sophism. Simple common sense was enough to show me that I had been insulted, despite all imaginable conventions and all the prejudices which custom or education could enforce in civilized society. I thought of the witticism credited to Populia,[75] who had never allowed herself to be unfaithful to her husband except when she was pregnant. Non tollo vectorem, she said, nisi navi plena ("I do not take a passenger unless the ship is full").[76] It angered me that I had been shown beyond doubt that I was not loved, and I felt that it would be shameful in me if I continued to love an object which I could no longer hope to possess. I went to sleep resolved to avenge myself and to abandon her to her fate despite the heroism she would credit me with if I acted otherwise. My true honor demanded that I be duped by nothing.

When I woke in the morning I was calm and, consequently, in love. My final resolve was to continue to give her all the help in my power, displaying indifference to what she did not believe she was free to grant me. I knew how difficult it was to play this role well, but I had the courage to play it.

CHAPTER IX

I continue my intrigue with the attractive Miss XCV. Vain attempts to bring on an abortion. The aroph. Miss runs away and enters a convent.

I WENT to see her every morning, and since I was really concerned over her condition, she could not take my eagerness to help her out of her difficulty for anything but what it was. No longer seeing me in love with her, she could attribute it only to pure sympathy. So far as I could see, she approved of the change in me, but her approval might be only apparent. I knew that, even if she did not love me, seeing me resign myself so easily must have irritated her. One morning, congratulating me on having got the upper hand of my passion, she added with a laugh that my passion and my desires could not be very strong if I had succeeded in conquering them in less than a week. I answered deprecatingly that I owed my cure to my self-esteem.

"I know," I said, "that I am worthy to be loved, and when I saw that you did not recognize it I became indignant. Do you know the effect of indignation?"

"Very well. It is followed by scorn of the object which has aroused it."

"That is saying too much. Mine was followed by an examination of my conduct and a plan for revenge."

"What kind of revenge?"

"Forcing you to esteem me and at the same time convincing you that I can do without your treasures. I have already become accustomed to seeing them without wanting to possess them."

"And I suppose you think my esteem gives you your revenge; but you are mistaken, for I esteemed you a week ago no less than I do today. I never for a moment believed you capable of abandoning me as punishment for having refused to yield to your ardor, and I congratulate myself on having seen you for what you are."

She then spoke of the opiate which I was having her take and of which she wanted me to increase the dose since she saw no effect from it, but I did not respond; for I knew that taking more than half a dram of the remedy might kill her; nor would I consent to her being bled a third time. Her chambermaid, whom she had just let into the secret, had had her bled by a surgeon who was her lover. I having then told Miss that she should be generous with such people, and she having replied that she had no money, I offered her some. She said she would accept fifty louis, for which she would account to me, and that she needed the amount for her brother Richard.[1] Not having them with me I sent them the next day with a note in which I asked her to turn to no one except myself for anything she needed. But her brother thought I was the man to do him an even more considerable service.

He called on me the next morning to thank me and to beg my help in a serious situation. He showed me a chancre of a very ugly kind, which he had acquired from going all by himself to a place of ill fame. He asked me to speak to his mother and persuade her to have him treated, complaining that Signor Farsetti, after refusing him four louis, had washed his hands of the matter. I did as he asked, but when I told his mother what the trouble was she said it was better to leave him with the chancre he had, which was his third, for she was sure that after he was cured of it he would simply go and get another. I had him cured at my expense; but his mother was right. At the age of fourteen his profligacy knew no bounds.

Having now entered on her sixth month, Miss XCV was in despair; she would no longer leave her bed, and she made me miserable. Believing that I was no longer in love with her, she showed me and made me touch her hips and her belly to convince me that she could no longer let anyone see her. I played the role of midwife, displaying complete indifference to her charms and not letting her see a trace of my feeling; but I was at the end of my rope. She talked of taking poison in a tone which made me tremble. I was in the most agonizing of quandaries when Fortune extricated me in a way which proved to be high comedy.

Dining alone with Madame d'Urfé, I asked her if she knew a sure way to bring on an abortion. She answered that Paracelsus's aroph[2] was infallible and not at all difficult, and, seeing that I was interested, she went and fetched a manuscript, which she handed me. It called for preparing an unguent of which the ingredients were powdered saffron, myrrh, and a number of others, and the vehicle honey. The woman who hoped to empty her womb was to put a dose of this opiate on the end of a cylinder of the proper size and insert it into her vagina in such a way as to stimulate the round piece of flesh at the top of her such-and-such. The cylinder must at the same time stimulate the channel leading to the closed door of the little house which sheltered the little enemy whose departure was sought. This procedure, repeated three or four times a day for six or seven days, so weakened the little door that it finally opened and the fetus tumbled out.

Laughing heartily at the prescription, whose absurdity was instantly apparent to common sense, I gave Madame back her precious manuscript and I spent two hours reading the always astonishing Paracelsus and then Boerhaave,[3] who discusses aroph like a reasonable man.

At home by myself the next day and thinking of Miss XCV, I decided to communicate this prescription for producing abortion to her, hoping that she might need my help in introducing the cylinder.

Calling about ten o'clock and finding her in bed as usual and depressed because the opiate I was having her take produced no effect, I spoke to her of Paracelsus's aroph as of an infallible topical remedy for weakening the ring of the womb. It was on the spur of the moment that it occurred to me to tell her that the aroph had to be mixed with sperm which had not lost its natural heat for a single instant.

"It is necessary," I said, "for the sperm to touch the ring immediately upon coming out. Repeating the procedure three or four times a day for five or six days, the little door is obliged to open and the fetus to come out perforce of its own weight."

After making certain that she understood the thing thoroughly and showing her the apparently sound physiological reasons for using the remedy, I said that, her lover being absent, she needed to have a friend who would live in the house with her, and whom no one could suspect, to administer the amorous remedy to her three or four times a day. She could not keep from laughing at the idea. She asked me seriously if it was a joke, and I finally saw that she had no more doubts when I offered to bring her the manuscript in which the whole theory of what I had just told her was set forth.

She did not urge me to bring it when I said that the manuscript was in Latin; but I saw that she was persuaded when I told her about the wonders of aroph and what Boerhaave said about it.

"Aroph," I said, "is a great specific for bringing on menstruation."

"And menstruation," she[4] replied, "cannot appear as long as a woman is pregnant, so aroph is an infallible remedy for bringing on an abortion. Do you know how to make it?"

"It is perfectly easy. There are five ingredients, which are powdered and put in honey or butter. It is an unguent which, when it touches the ring, must find it in amorous excitement."

"Then I should think the person who administers it must be in love too."

"Of course, unless he is a being who has so much the nature of a donkey that he does not need to love."

She remained thoughtful for a full quarter of an hour. Though she was very intelligent, the candor of her soul prevented her from suspecting a fraud. Astonished on my side that I had rattled off this nonsense with all the earmarks of truth yet completely on the spur of the moment, I said nothing.

Breaking the silence at last, she said sadly that she could not think of using the remedy, which, however, she considered admirable and natural. She asked me if compounding aroph took a long time, and I answered that it would take only two hours if it was possible to obtain English saffron,[5] which Paracelsus preferred to that from the East.

Her mother, accompanied by the Chevalier Farsetti, came and interrupted our conversation. She asked me to stay for dinner, and I accepted when Miss told me she would dine at the table too. She came to it with the figure of a nymph. I could not believe she was pregnant, much as she had tried to convince me of it. Signor Farsetti sat down beside her, and her mother took a place beside me. Miss, who was thinking of aroph, took it into her head at dessert to ask her table companion, who boasted that he was a great chemist, if he knew of it.

"I even believe," he replied, "that I know it better than anyone."

"What is its use?"

"Your question is too indefinite."

"What does the word 'aroph' mean?"

"It is an Arabic word. You must go to Paracelsus for that."

"It is neither Arabic," I said, "nor of any language. It is a word which hides two others: aro: aroma; ph: philosophorum."

"Is it Paracelsus," Farsetti replied cuttingly, "who made you so learned?"

"No, sir; it was Boerhaave."

"Permit me to laugh, for Boerhaave nowhere says that; but I like a doughty quoter."

"Laugh as much as you please; but here is the touchstone. I never misquote."

So saying, I throw my purse, which is full of louis, on the table. Farsetti says in a scornful tone that he never wagers. Miss laughs and tells him it is the sure way never to lose. I put my purse back in my pocket, and pretending a need, I go out and send my lackey to Madame d'Urfé's to fetch the volume of Boerhaave in which I had read the statement the evening before. I return to the table, and I keep the company amused by my remarks until my lackey brings me the book. I immediately find the place, and I invite Signor Farsetti to see that I had not misquoted. Instead of looking he gets up and leaves. Madame says that he has gone away angry and will not come back; Miss offers to wager that he will come back the next day, and she would have won. After this incident the man became my inveterate enemy, as he always showed me he was when occasion served.

We all went to Passy to a concert given by La Pouplinière, and we stayed for supper. I found Silvia there, and her daughter, who was sulky with me; she was justified, I could not see her every day, but I did not know what to do about it. The man who kept the company entertained, and who ate nothing, was the adept Saint-Germain. Everything he said was empty boasting, but everything was courteous and witty. I have never in my life known a cleverer and more persuasive impostor.

I spent the whole of the next day at home, answering a great many questions sent me by Esther, but very obscurely in all cases when they touched on business. Aside from my fear of compromising my oracle, I shuddered at the thought that, by misleading her father, I might jeopardize his financial position. He was the most honest millionaire in all Holland. As for Esther, she was now only a fond memory to me.

Miss XCV occupied me completely, and despite my seeming indifference I was only too certain that I loved her and that I could not be happy except by becoming her lover with no reservations. But I was miserable when I thought of the situation I should be in when she could no longer hide her big belly from her family. I repented that I had told her about aroph; seeing that she had let three days go by without mentioning it to me, I thought I had aroused her suspicions and that the esteem she had felt for me had changed to scorn. The supposition had humiliated me; I no longer had the courage to call on her, and I do not know if I should have brought myself to do so if she had not written me a note in which she said she had no friend but myself and that she asked no other proof of my friendship except my coming to see her every day, if only for a moment. I took her my answer in person, assuring her that my friendship was constant and that I would never abandon her. I had hoped that she would bring up the subject of aroph, but in vain. At that I concluded that she had not believed any of it and that I could no longer count on it. I asked her if she would like me to invite her mother and the whole family to dinner at my lodging, and she answered that it would please her.

The dinner was very animated. I invited Silvia and her daughter, an Italian musician named Magali,[6] with whom one of Miss's sisters was in love, and La Garde,[7] the basso profundo, who frequented the best society. I had never seen Miss XCV gayer than she was that day. When she left me about midnight she told me to come to her early the next day because she had something very important to discuss with me.

Far from failing to appear, I went there at eight o'clock in the morning. She told me she was in despair because La Pouplinière wanted to conclude the marriage and that her mother was pressing her. She was to sign the contract and a tailor was to come and take her measurements to make bodices and all kinds of clothes for her. She said—and she was right—that it was impossible the tailor would not see she was pregnant. She would rather kill herself than either marry when she was pregnant or confess to her mother. I urged it on her that any course was preferable to the dreadful course of suicide, and that in any case it was in her power to get rid of La Pouplinière simply by revealing her condition to him. He would laugh and make the best of it, he would keep her secret and would say no more about marrying her.

"And after that would I be much better off?"

"I undertake to bring your mother round."

"You do not know her. Honor would oblige her to get me out of sight; but she would make me suffer torments to which the most painful death is preferable. But why have you stopped talking about aroph? Is it all a joke?"

"I believe it is a reliable remedy, but what is the use of my talking to you about it? Consider the delicacy which prevents me from doing so. Confide your condition to your lover in Venice, and I undertake to have your letter delivered to him by a trustworthy man in five or six days. If he is not rich I will give you a purse full of gold, so that he can come here immediately and save your honor and your life by administering the aroph to you himself."

"It is an admirable plan and generous on your part; but it is not in the realm of possibilities, and you would agree if you knew all. But suppose that I could bring myself to receive aroph from some man who was not my lover, tell me how I could do it. Even if my lover himself were hidden in Paris he could not spend seven or eight days with me as freely as it seems he would have to do to follow the prescription exactly. So you see there is no use thinking of this remedy any more."

"Then to save your honor you would consent to give yourself to another man?"

"Certainly, if I were sure no one knew about it. But where is such a man to be found? Do you think I could go looking for him, or that it would even be easy to find him?"

Her last words petrified me, for she knew that I loved her. I clearly saw that she wanted me to ask her to make use of my person. Despite my love I could not bring myself to risk a humiliating refusal which would have been an atrocious insult; and besides, I could not believe she was capable of affronting me in this fashion. To force her to speak out, I rose to leave, saying in a sad and pathetic tone that I was more unhappy than she.

She stopped me, asking me how I could say I was more unhappy than she, which left me no alternative to saying, in a rather resentful tone, she had shown me clearly enough that she despised me so greatly that in her present need she would reject my services in favor of those of some unknown man, whom, I added, I had no intention of finding for her. She answered that I was cruel and unjust, that I did not love her to begin with, that I wanted her cruel situation to serve my triumph, which she could only regard as a revenge.

So saying, she turned away to shed tears which touched me; but I let no time pass before I dropped to my knees before her.

"Knowing that I adore you," I said, "how can you suppose that I entertain plans of revenge, and how can you think that I do not feel it when you tell me clearly that, your lover being away, you cannot see what man would help you out of your difficulty?"

"Could I count on you after my refusals?"

"So you think that a true lover could cease to love because of a refusal which may even spring from virtue? Permit me to tell you that at this happy moment I am certain that you love me and that you are sorry I may suppose you would never have made me happy except for the need under which you are laboring."

"You are, my dear friend, the faithful interpreter of my feelings; but it remains to be seen how we can be together with all the freedom we must have."

"I will rack my brains for the answer, and in the meanwhile I will compound the aroph."

Compounding it did not trouble me, for I had already decided that it should be nothing except honey; but I had to spend several uninterrupted nights with her, and that was difficult. I was sorry I had made the stipulation, and I could not think of retracting it. One of her sisters slept in the same room with her, and I could not consider making her spend nights away from the hotel. Chance, as it nearly always did, came to my rescue.

A natural need having made me go up to the fifth floor, I run into the kitchen boy, who tells me not to go to the toilet because someone is there.

"But you have just come out of it."

"Yes, but I only started in."

"Very well, I will wait."

"I beg you not to wait."

"You've been having fun with a girl. I want to see her."

"She won't come out, because you know her. She has locked herself in."

I go to the door and through a crack I see Magdelaine,[8] Miss's chambermaid. I reassure her; I promise her I will be discreet, and I ask her to open the door, my need being urgent. She opens, I give her a louis, and she runs away. After doing my business I go down, and halfway downstairs I find the kitchen boy, who laughs and says I ought to make Magdelaine give him twelve francs.[9] I promise him a louis if he will tell me everything, and he admits that he sees her in the garret, where he spends nights with her, but that the mistress, having put game there three days before, had locked the door. I make him take me there, and I see through the keyhole that the game left room for a mattress, I give the kitchen boy the louis I had promised him, and I go away to ripen my plan. I thought that Miss, if she took Magdelaine into her confidence, could easily come up and spend the night with me in the garret. On the same day I procured a picklock and several skeleton keys, and in a tin box I put several doses of the supposed aroph. I mixed honey with powdered stag's horn.

The next morning I went to the Hôtel de Bretagne, where I immediately had the pleasure of unlocking and locking the garret without needing to use the picklock. I entered Miss's room carrying the key, and in a few words told her my whole plan, showing her the prepared aroph. She said that since she could not leave her room except by passing through the small room in which Magdelaine slept, we should have to let her into our secret and that she left it to me to win her over by the means one uses with all servants. What troubled us was the kitchen boy, who, if he managed to find out what was afoot, might decide to do us harm. On that score I had to consult Magdelaine. I left her,[10] promising that I would act and would keep her informed of everything through the chambermaid.

As I went out I told the latter that I would wait for her in the cloister of the Augustinians, having to talk with her on an important matter, and she came. After understanding the whole plan perfectly and assuring me that her own bed would be in the garret at the appointed hour, she showed me that we could not do without the kitchen boy, and that prudence itself obliged us to let him into the secret. She answered for his fidelity and said that I should leave her to deal with him. So I gave her the key and six louis, saying that everything must be ready for the next day and that she must make arrangements with Miss. A chambermaid who has a lover is never so happy as when she is given a role which puts her own mistress in her power.

The next day at Little Poland the kitchen boy appeared before me; I was expecting as much. Before he spoke I told him he must beware of my servants' curiosity and refrain from coming to my house except when necessary. He promised he would be cautious, and he told me nothing new; as Magdelaine had assured me, everything would be in readiness in the garret the next day, as soon as the whole family had gone to bed. He gave me the key to the garret, saying that he had obtained another for himself, and admiring his foresight I gave him six louis, which had more effect than all my words.

The next morning I saw Miss only for a moment, to tell her that she would find me in the garret at ten o'clock, and I was there punctually, sure that no one had seen me either enter the hotel or go up to the garret. I was wearing a redingote. I had my box of aroph, a reliable flint and steel, and a candle in my pocket. Besides the mattress I found cushions and a good blanket, which was needed since the weather was cold and we had to spend hours there.

At eleven a slight noise causes me a palpitation which always seems a good augury. I go out, I grope my way to Miss and whisper a few words of a sort to reassure us both. Then I show her into our hiding place, shut the door, and barricade it. I quickly light my candle and she appears uneasy; she says that the light may betray us to someone going to the toilet. I reply that we must take the risk, since in the dark she cannot crown me with the aroph in the necessary manner. She agrees, saying that we will blow out the candle immediately afterward. We undress very fast, entirely dispensing with the preliminaries which always precede the performance when love leads up to it. Both of us concentrating on our roles, we play them to perfection. In our utter seriousness we appeared to be a surgeon getting ready to perform an operation and the patient who submits to it. Miss was the operating surgeon. She sets the open box at her right, then lies down on her back, and, spreading her thighs and raising her knees, arches her body; at the same time, by the light of the candle, which I am holding in my left hand, she puts a little crown of aroph on the head of the being who is to convey it to the orifice where the amalgamation is to be accomplished. The astonishing thing is that we neither laughed nor felt any desire to laugh, so engrossed were we in our roles. After the insertion was completed, the timid Miss blew out the candle, but two minutes later she had to let me light it again. The thing had been done to perfection so far as I was concerned, but she did not feel sure about herself. I obligingly said that I did not mind repeating the performance. My formal tone made us both laugh, and she had no difficulty in crowning me again, after seeing that some of the aroph had changed color very slightly from the amalgamation.

This second time the application of the remedy took a quarter of an hour, and she assured me that it had been perfect. I was certain of it. She showed me, with an expression which spoke love and gratitude, that the amalgamation had been twofold, for what she had contributed to it was clearly visible. She said that since our work was not yet over we would do well to sleep.

"You see," I said, "that I am not in need of it," and she surrendered. Another preparation, another combat to the most successful conclusion, which was followed by a longish sleep.

A reflection on our resources which pleased me decided her to husband my strength. We had to preserve ourselves for the nights to come. She went down to her room, and at daybreak I left the hotel with the help of the kitchen boy, who made me slip out by a door I did not know of.

Toward noon I paid Miss a visit. She talked to me reasonably, and she outdid herself in thanks which really exhausted my patience.

"I am amazed," I said, "at your not understanding that your thanks are degrading to me and prove either that you do not love me or that, if you love me, you suppose my love is not equal to yours."

She admitted that I was right, and we became emotional; but we had to save ourselves for the night. My situation was peculiar. Though I loved her I could not be sorry that I had deceived her. It was a slight revenge which I owed to my self-esteem. She on her side said that she was punished for the wrong she had done me when she had refused to yield to my fond entreaties, since I now had a reason to doubt her love. What I really won from her during the nights we spent in vain efforts to bring on an abortion was her promise to think no more of suicide and, whatever the outcome might be, to entrust herself to me and be guided entirely by my advice. She told me several times during our nocturnal dialogues that she felt happy and that she would not cease to feel so even if the aroph should have no effect; but despite this magnanimous sentiment, she continued to hope that it would, and she never stopped applying it to our two selves until the last night of our combats. At our final parting she said that all we had done would seem more apt to engender a superfetation in her organ than to bring it to a repugnance whose consequence would be to make it cast out the fruit of which it was the repository. No one could reason more logically.

Having lost her last hope of bringing on an abortion, and unable to delay any longer in signing the contract of marriage with La Pouplinière and receiving the tailors, she told me she had decided to run away, and she laid it on me to find the means. It became my sole preoccupation. The decision was taken in principle; but I was not willing either to risk being convicted of abducting her or to take her out of the kingdom. Neither of us had ever thought of uniting our destinies by marriage.

With this flea in my ear, I went to the Concert Spirituel [11] at the Tuileries. The piece was an anthem, with words by the Abbé de Voisenon set to music by Mondonville,[12] the proper title of which was "The Israelites on Mount Horeb." [13] It was a new work. It was I who had given the idea for it to the amiable Abbé, who had written it in charming irregular verse. Getting out of my carriage in the Cul-de-sac Dauphin,[14] I see Madame du Rumain getting out of hers alone. She congratulates herself on having met me there; she says she is going to hear the new piece, that she has reserved two seats, and that I would be doing her a favor if I would occupy one of them. Such an invitation being an honor of whose value I was thoroughly aware, I accept. In Paris people do not chatter when they go to a theater to hear music; so Madame would not have inferred from my silence that I was melancholy; but she guessed it after the concert from my countenance, on which she saw my depression and the sorrow which wrung my soul. She asked me to come and spend an hour at her house to obtain answers to three or four questions which deeply concerned her and to do it quickly because she was going out to supper.

It was all done in half an hour; but the charming woman could not help asking what was the matter with me.

"You are," she said, "quite unlike yourself; you must certainly be fearing some great misfortune; you have some very difficult decision to make. I do not wish to pry into your affairs; but if I can be of use to you at Court, speak, all my influence is at your disposition; you will find me ready to move heaven and earth and even to go to Versailles myself tomorrow morning if the matter is urgent; I have every Minister's ear. Confide your troubles to me, my dear friend, and if I cannot[15] relieve you of them, at least let me share them with you, you can rely on my discretion."

This little discourse seemed to me veritably a voice from Heaven, a command from my Genius to speak freely to this paragon among women who had seen into my soul and who let me know, in unmistakable terms, all the interest she took in me. After looking at her without answering but with eyes in which she could not but see gratitude:

"Yes, Madame," I replied, "I am in the most critical of situations and perhaps on the verge of ruin; but what you have just so openly said to me leads me to hope. I shall now inform you of my painful quandary, entrusting you with a secret which honor makes inviolable; but, certain of your discretion, I do not hesitate to reveal it to you. If you honor me with advice I promise to follow it, and I swear that no one shall ever know I had it from you."

After this short exordium, which gained me all her attention, I told her the whole story in detail, concealing neither the young lady's name nor any of the circumstances which made it my duty to find some way of saving her. However, I did not tell her the too comical story of the aroph, but I confessed that I had given her drugs to bring on an abortion.

After spending a quarter of an hour in silence she rose, saying that she must now go to Madame de la Marck's,[16] among other things to speak with the Bishop of Montrouge,[17] but that she hoped she could be of use to me.

"Meanwhile," she said, "please come to see me day after tomorrow at eight o'clock, and be so good as not to take any step until we have talked. Good-by."

She left me with relief in my soul, and I determined to do whatever she told me to do.

The Bishop of Montrouge, to whom she had to speak concerning a matter of which I knew, was the Abbé de Voisenon, who was so called because he went there very often. It was an estate near Paris which belonged to the Duke of La Vallière.[18]

The next day I told Miss XCV only that I hoped to bring her good news in two or three days. I did not fail to call on Madame du Rumain on the following day at the appointed hour. The porter told me, with a smile, that I should find the doctor there; but when I appeared he left. It was Herrenschwandt,[19] whom all the pretty women in Paris wanted to have—the same whose role the unfortunate poet Poinsinet[20] took in The Circle, a one-act play which had a great success in Paris.

Madame du Rumain began by telling me that she had solved my difficulty and that it was now my part to keep her intervention an inviolable secret.

"Yesterday," she said, "I went to C . . .[21] and I told the Abbess,[22] who is an intimate friend of mine, the whole story. She will receive the young lady into her convent and will give her a lay sister who will serve her in everything, even during her confinement. The young lady is to go alone with a letter which I will give you and which she will send in to her. She will be at once taken in and lodged, she is to receive no visitors and no letters except those which pass through her hands, and she[23] undertakes to send her answers only to me, for you realize she must correspond with no one except you. Hence she will never write to you except through me. You will do likewise, and all the addresses will be left blank. However, I had to tell the Abbess the young lady's name, but I did not tell her yours and she did not ask to know it. Inform her of all this, and when she is ready come and tell me, and I will give you the letter. She must take with her only what she absolutely needs—no diamonds or jewelry of any value. I can also assure you that the Abbess will see her from time to time, and that she will be friendly and will supply her with all sorts of decent books. As for the lay sister who will wait on her, she is not to confide anything to her. Inform her of all this. After she is delivered the young lady will go to confession in preparation for making her Easter communion, and the Abbess will give her a formal certificate which will obviate any difficulties when she appears before her mother, who will be only too glad to see her; and there will be no more question of the marriage, which she will give as the only cause of her running away of her own free will."

After outdoing myself in thanks and praising her prudence, I asked her to give me the letter at once, since there was no time to lose. Here is the short letter which she wrote for me:

"The young lady who brings you this letter, my dear

Abbess, is the one about whom I spoke to you. She wishes to spend three or four months under your protection in your convent to recover her peace of mind, perform her devotions, and be certain that when she returns to her home there will be no more question of a marriage which she loathes and which is the cause of her present decision to absent herself from her family for a time.''

She gave it to me unsealed so that Mademoiselle could read it. The Abbess was a princess; in the extremity of my gratitude I went down on my knees before the lady, who was also useful to me later, as I will relate when the time comes.

Leaving Madame du Rumain's, I went to the Hôtel de Bretagne, where Miss had only time to tell me that she was engaged all day and that she would come to the garret at eleven o'clock, where we should have all the time we needed to talk. It was charming, for I foresaw that after that day I should not again have an opportunity to hold her in my arms. I spoke to Magdelaine, who undertook to warn the kitchen boy, and everything was in readiness.

I repaired to the garret at ten o'clock, and at eleven I saw Miss, and after giving her the letter to read I put out the candle and we spent the night like real lovers without any further thought of aroph.

I repeated exactly to her all the instructions I had received from the lady, whose name she made no objection to my concealing. I told her that she must leave the hotel at eight o'clock with her bundle, take a hackney coach, and go to the Place Maubert,[24] where she would dismiss it. There she must take another to the Porte Saint-Antoine,[25] and from there go in yet another to the convent of which I gave her the name. I begged her not to forget to burn all the letters she had received from me and to write to me as often as possible, sealing her letters, but always leaving the outside blank. I ended by Casanova's Thoughts on the "Cabalistic Treasure" making her accept two hundred louis, urging it upon her that she might need them though we could not then see how. She wept when she thought of the dangerous situation in which she was leaving me; but I reassured her by saying that I had plenty of money and very powerful protectors. After concerting these measures, we parted. She promised to set out on the next day but one, and I promised to go to the hotel on the day after her flight, pretending to know nothing about it, and to write her whatever was said.

Her future worried me. She was intelligent; but without experience intelligence often does more harm than good. I waited in a hackney coach at the corner of a street, where I saw her arrive, get out at an alley, pay, and dismiss the coach. A minute later I saw her emerge with her hood over her head and get into another coach, which at once drove off. Thus assured that she would faithfully carry out the rest of my instructions, I went about my business.

The next morning—it was Quasimodo Sunday[26]—I felt that I must not fail to go to the Hôtel de Bretagne. Since I went there every day I could not stop going without confirming the suspicions of which I must have become the object. But what a painful task! Obliged to appear gay and untroubled amid a family whom I was sure to find distraught and sad!

I went at the hour when the whole family would be at table, so I walked straight into the dining room. I enter, smiling and gay as ever, and I take a seat half behind Madame. I pretend not to have noticed either her surprise or her flushed face. A minute later I ask her where Miss is; she looks at me and does not answer.

"Is she ill perhaps?"

"I have no idea."

Her curt tone decides me to appear serious, I assume a pensive air, and I remain there for a good quarter of an hour without speaking. I finally break the silence by rising and asking her if I can serve her in any way. She declines very coldly. I leave and go to Miss's room, where I find Magdelaine alone. I ask her, with a wink, where her mistress is, and she begs me to tell her myself if I know.

"Did she go out alone?"

"I have no idea, but they say you know everything. Please leave me."

Pretending to be astonished, I slowly leave the house and get into my carriage, very glad to have got through this burdensome task. I decide that the natural thing for me to do will be not to appear again before the lady, who must know that she has received me very badly, and that, guilty or innocent, I must have been aware of it.

Very early on Tuesday I saw a hackney coach stop at my door and Madame XCV and Signor Farsetti get out of it. I go to meet them, I thank them for having come to breakfast with me and ask them to sit down by a good fire. Madame replies that she has not come for breakfast but to talk with me on an urgent matter. She sits down, and Signor Farsetti remains standing. I reply that I am entirely at her service.

"I have come to ask you to restore my daughter to me if she is in your custody, or to tell me where she is, in which case I will attend to it myself."

"Madame, I know nothing of her, and I am amazed that you should suspect me of a crime."

"I do not accuse you of an abduction, I am not here to reproach you with crimes or to threaten you; I have come to ask you to show me your friendship. Help me to recover her this very day; I am sure that you know all; you were her only friend; she spent two or three hours with you every day; it is impossible that she should not have confided everything to you. Take pity on a heartbroken mother. All will be saved, for no one knows anything yet. Her honor will not suffer."

"I understand all that, Madame, but I repeat that I know nothing about her."

She then went down on her knees to me, melting into tears, while Farsetti told her she should be ashamed to humiliate herself before a man of my kind.

"Explain," I said to him, rising, "what you mean by 'my kind.' "

"It is certain that you know everything."

"Only fools are certain. Leave, and wait till I come. You will see me in a quarter of an hour."

I pushed him by the shoulders, and he left, telling Madame to follow him, but she stayed behind to calm me, saying that I must forgive a man who loved her enough to marry her.

"I know that, but your daughter loathes him, even more than she does the Farmer-General." [27]

"She is wrong; but there will be no more question of her marrying him. You know everything, for you gave her fifty louis, without which she could not have gone anywhere."

"That is not true."

"It is true. Here is a piece of your letter."

She handed me a scrap of the letter I had written Miss when I sent her the fifty louis which the elder of her two brothers needed. These are the words which could be read:

"I hope that these paltry fifty louis may convince you that I will never spare anything, even my life, to make you sure of my affection."

"Since I am obliged to admit," I said, "that I sent her this money, I will also tell you that I supplied her with it only to pay the debts of your elder son. He received it, and he has thanked me for it."

"My son?"

"Yes, Madame."

"Then I will now make you full atonement."

With that she goes down to the courtyard, where Farsetti was waiting for her, and makes him come upstairs to learn from my own lips that the fifty louis I had sent had been for her son; but he has the impudence to tell me that it was beyond belief. I laugh in his face, and I ask Madame to verify the fact, assuring her that I had always tried to persuade her daughter to marry La Pouplinière.

"How dare you say that," Farsetti interrupts me, "when in your letter you speak of your affection?"

"I admit," I replied, "that I loved her and that, hoping for the honor of cuckolding her husband, I was laying the foundations for it. My love, criminal or not, was the theme of what I said during all the hours I spent with her. If she had confided to me that she wanted to run away, either I would have dissuaded her or I would have gone with her, for I was, as I still am, in love with her. I would never have given her money to go away without me."

"My dear Casanova," Madame then said, "I will believe you are innocent if you will join me in finding her."

"I am perfectly ready, Madame, and I promise to begin making inquiries today."

"When you learn anything, come and tell me."

In accordance with this promise I did not find it hard to call the next morning on Monsieur Chaban, the chief clerk in the police office, and urge him to investigate the girl's flight. I innocently thought that my taking this step would only serve to make me even safer. The man, who was thoroughly imbued with his profession and who had liked me ever since Silvia had introduced me to him at her house five or six years earlier, began to laugh when he learned to what matter I desired him to give his attention. He asked me if I really wanted the English girl's whereabouts discovered. On my side I had no difficulty in seeing that he was only trying to worm information out of me. I had no further doubt of it when, on my way out, I met Signor Farsetti.

I went the next morning to report on my as yet unsuccessful effort to Madame XCV. She replied that her own investigation had been more successful than mine, and that if I would go with her to the house in which her daughter then was, she was sure I could persuade her to come home. I answered most calmly that I was ready to go anywhere with her. Taking me at my word, she rose, put on her tippet, and, handing me a card, told me to order my coachman to drive to the address on it.

Cruel moment for me! My palpitating heart seemed to be bursting from my breast. I expected to see the address of the convent where Miss was. I do not know how I should have managed it, but I certainly would not have gone there.

My soul returned to its seat when I read "such-and-such an alley off the Place Maubert."

I give the appropriate order to my coachman; we get out at the alley; and, by exercising great politeness, I give the poor mother the satisfaction of taking her to visit every room, front and back, on every floor. At the end of this strange and useless search I saw that she was unhappy but satisfied and close to begging my pardon. She had learned from the hackney coachman who had driven her daughter that he had let her out at this alley. She told me that the kitchen boy at the hotel had said he had been to my lodging twice with letters, and that Magdelaine said nothing except that she was certain Miss loved me as I loved her.

After taking Madame XCV home I called on Countess du Rumain to tell her all that had happened and to write a long letter to the young recluse.

Three or four days later Madame du Rumain gave me the first of her letters, in which she told me of the peace which her soul was enjoying and her extreme gratitude for all that I had done for her. She praised the Abbess and the lay sister and told me the names of the books she had been given, all of them to her taste. She paid six francs a day, and she had given the lay sister four louis, promising her the same amount each month. What she did not like was that the Abbess had asked her never to leave her room.

But what pleased me even more was the letter from the Abbess to the Countess. She spoke in the highest terms of the unfortunate beauty, praising her sweetness, her intelligence, her dignity, and her manners. She promised she would go to see her every day. Madame du Rumain's satisfaction delighted me. I gave her my letter from her to read, and I saw that she was even more content.

The only people who were not contented were Madame XCV, Farsetti, and the old Farmer-General, whose disaster was already the talk of reception rooms, the Palais-Royal, and every coffeehouse. I was given a share in it, but I did not care.

As for La Pouplinière, he so far resigned himself that he even made it the subject of a one-act play which he wrote himself and had performed at his little theater[28] in Passy. Such was his character. His device was a cock with the words Fovet et Favet ("He forwards and fosters"). Emblem of tolerance, of which, however, he gave a poor exhibition in the famous episode of the fireplace.[29] Three months after "the English girl," as everyone called her, disappeared, he sent one of his cronies to Bordeaux and there married by proxy a very pretty young lady, the daughter of a Capitoul.[30] At the end of two years[31] she gave him a son, who was born six months after his death. The avaricious harridan who was the rich man's heir accused the widow of adultery and had the infant declared illegitimate, to the shame of the Parlement which so adjudged him, and despite the laws of God and man, the entire nobility, and all the intelligent people in France, who had to tolerate the iniquity of this infamous judgment. The scandal was universal, and the innocent widow did not dare to appear anywhere after the incredible loss of a suit which added fresh opprobrium to the same Parlement, which in former times had declared legitimate a child born eleven months after the death of its father, that is of the widow's defunct husband.

A week or ten days after Miss's flight I entirely suspended my visits to her mother; the cold reception I found there decided me to take this course.

Further incidents. J. J. Rousseau. I establish a business. Castel-Bajac. An action at law is brought against me. Monsieur de Sartine.

A MONTH later there was no more talk of the matter, I thought it was over, but I was wrong. In the meanwhile I amused myself, and the pleasure I took in spending money lavishly kept me from thinking of the future.

The Abbé de Bernis,[1] on whom I called once a week, told me one day that the Comptroller-General [2] kept asking him for news of me and that I was making a mistake in neglecting him. He advised me to forget my claims and to lay before him the plan for increasing the revenue of the State concerning which I had spoken to him earlier. Since I set great store by the Abbé's advice, for I owed him my fortune, I went to the Comptroller-General and, full of confidence in his good faith, gave him my project. It was for a new law, to be registered by the Parlement, which would oblige every heir to an estate, except estates which passed from father to son, to cede the first year's income from it to the King. All gifts formally made before a notary inter vivos ("between living persons") would also be subject to the same law, which could not offend the recipients, for they had only to imagine that the testator had died a year later. The Minister[3] said that my project presented no difficulties; he put it in his secret portfolio and assured me that my fortune was made. A week later he was dismissed, and when I applied to his successor, Silhouette,[4] he coldly told me that he would have me informed if the occasion arose to promulgate the law. The law was instituted in France two years later, and I was laughed at when, saying that I was the originator of it, I asked to what recompense I was entitled.

Not long afterward, the Pope[5] having died, the succession was conferred on the Venetian Rezzonico,[6] who immediately bestowed a cardinalate on my patron De Bernis, whom the King exiled to Soissons two days after he gave him the cardinal's hat;[7] so I was left without a patron, but rich enough not to be troubled by the misfortune. The illustrious Abbé, then at the pinnacle of his fame for having destroyed all Cardinal Richelieu's[8] work by collaborating with Prince Kaunitz to transform the old hatred between the houses of Bourbon and Austria into a flourishing alliance, thus delivering Italy from the miseries of the war of which it became the theater each time there was a break between the two houses, which gained him the first nomination to a cardinalate made by a Pope who, as Bishop of Padua, had come to know all his merits—this noble Abbé, who died last year[9] at Rome, enjoying the particular esteem of Pius VI, was banished from Court for telling the King, who had asked his advice on the subject, that he did not consider the Prince of Soubise[10] the best man to command his armies. As soon as La Pompadour heard it from the King himself, she had power enough to ruin him. Everyone deplored his disgrace, but found comfort for it in verses. A strange nation, which ceases to feel its afflictions as soon as poems or songs make it laugh! In my day the authors of epigrams and songs which attacked the government and the Ministers were put in the Bastille; but that did not prevent the wits from continuing to amuse their particular circles—for in those days the word "club" was unknown—with their satirical jests. A man whose name I have forgotten appropriated the following verses from the younger Crébillon[11] about this time and let himself be sent to the Bastille rather than disavow them. Crébillon told the Duke of Choiseul that he had composed the verses, but that it was possible the prisoner had composed them too. This witticism by the author of The Sofa[12] raised a laugh, and nothing was done to him.

The illustrious Cardinal de Bernis spent ten years in his exile, procul negotiis ("far from business")[15] but not happy, as I learned from his own lips fifteen years later at Rome. It is said that there is more pleasure in being a minister than in being a king; but, caeteris paribus ("other things being equal"), I find nothing more idiotic than this dictum, if, as I ought to do, I consider it in my own case. It amounts to asking if independence is or is not preferable to dependence. The Cardinal was not recalled to Court, for there is no example of Louis XV's ever recalling a dismissed minister; but when Rezzonico[16] died he had to go to the conclave and for the rest of his life he remained the French Ambassador[17] in Rome.

About this time Madame d'Urfé took a fancy to make the acquaintance of J. J. Rousseau;[18] we went to Montmorency[19] to visit him, taking some music, which he copied wonderfully well. People paid him twice as much as they would have paid another copyist, but he guaranteed that there would be no errors. It was the way he made his living.

We found a man who reasoned well, whose manner was simple and modest, but who was entirely undistinguished either in his person or his wit. We did not find what is called a pleasant man. We thought him rather impolite, and it took no more for Madame d'Urfé to set him down as vulgar. We saw a woman[20] of whom we had already heard. She scarcely looked at us. We went back to Paris laughing at the philosopher's eccentricity. But here is a faithful account of a visit paid him by the Prince of Conti,[21] father of the Prince who was then known as the Count of La Marche.[22]

The charming Prince goes to Montmorency by himself, on purpose to spend a pleasant day talking with the philosopher, who was already famous. He finds him in the park, he accosts him and says he has come to dine and spend the day with him in unconstrained conversation.

"Your Highness will eat poor fare; I will go and order another place set."

He goes, he comes back, and after spending two or three hours walking with the Prince he conducts him to the room in which they are to dine. The Prince, seeing three places laid:

"Who," he said, "is the third person with whom you want me to dine? I thought we should dine alone together."

"The third person, Monseigneur, is another myself. It is a being who is neither my wife nor my mistress nor my servant nor my mother nor my daughter; and she is all those."

"I believe it, my dear friend; but since I came here only to dine with you, I will leave you to dine with all those other selves. Good-by."[23]

Such are the absurdities of philosophers when, trying to be remarkable, they only succeed in being eccentric. The woman was Mademoiselle Levasseur, whom he had honored with his name, except for one letter of it, under the mask of an anagram.[24]

About this same time I was present at the failure of a French comedy entitled Aristides' Daughter.[25] Its author was Madame de Graffigny.[26] That worthy woman died of grief five days after her play failed. I saw the Abbé de Voisenon in great distress; it was he who had encouraged her to have her play presented and who had perhaps worked on it, as he had on her Peruvian Letters and her Cénie.[27] Pope Rezzonico's mother died of joy[28] at this same time on seeing her son become Pope. Grief and joy kill more women than they do men. This shows that women are more sensitive than we are, but also weaker.

As soon as my supposed son was, according to Madame d'Urfé, well settled in Viar's boarding school, she insisted that I go with her to visit him. And to tell the truth, I was surprised.

A prince could not be better lodged, better treated, better dressed, or more respected by everyone in the establishment. She had given him all kinds of teachers, and a schooled pony so that he could learn equitation. He went by the name of Count of Aranda. A girl of sixteen or eighteen and very pretty, the daughter of Viar, proprietor of the school, never left him and announced herself as his young lordship's governess with every sign of satisfaction. She assured Madame d'Urfé that she took particular care of him, that when he woke she brought him his breakfast in bed, then dressed him, and did not leave him until she had put him to bed. Madame d'Urfé approved of all her attentions and assured her she was grateful. The little fellow could say nothing to me except that I had made his life happy. I decided to go back by myself one day to sound him out and learn on what terms he was with the pretty girl.

On the way back I told Madame that I was pleased with everything except the name Aranda, which might cause difficulties. She replied that the boy had said enough to show beyond doubt that he really had a right to bear the name.

"In my desk," she said, "I had a seal with the arms of that house; as soon as the boy saw them he seized on the seal and asked me how I happened to have the arms. I answered that I had them from the Count of Aranda himself, urging him to tell me how he could prove he was of the family; but he silenced me by saying that his birth was a secret he had sworn never to reveal to anyone."

Curious to discover the source of an imposture of which I should never have believed the young rascal capable, I went to see him by myself a week later. I found him with Viar, who, seeing that he addressed me with something very close to humility, must have thought that he belonged to me. Praising the young Count's talents in the highest terms, he said that he played the flute excellently, danced and fenced very nimbly, rode very well, and that no one was better at drawing all the letters of the alphabet. He then showed me some pens he had cut, with one, three, five, and up to eleven nibs, and urged me to examine him in heraldry, a science so necessary to a nobleman and of which no one had a better knowledge than he.

The boy then blazoned his arms in herald's jargon, which made me laugh for I knew almost none of the terms; but I took pleasure in seeing how skillfully he wrote freehand with his various pens, which simultaneously drew as many straight and curved lines as they had nibs. I told Viar that it was all very gratifying; and very much pleased, he left me alone with him. We went into the garden.

"May I ask," I said, "what this nonsense about your calling yourself Aranda is?"

"It is nonsense, but let it pass, I beg you, for I have to do it to inspire respect here."

"It is a lie which I cannot let pass, for it may have disagreeable consequences which will involve us all. It is an imposture, my friend, of which I did not believe you capable, a feather-brained whim which may become criminal and which I do not know how to make good and save your honor after all you have said to Madame d'Urfé."

I did not end my scolding until I saw him weep and heard him implore me. He said that he would rather endure the mortification of being sent back to his mother than the shame of having to admit to Madame d'Urfé that he had lied and having to give up the name which he had claimed as his own at school. He moved me to pity. I could really do nothing to mend matters short of sending him to live under another name fifty leagues from Paris.

"Tell me," I said, "and mind you tell me the truth, what exactly is the nature of the affection of the pretty young lady who lavishes such attentions on you."

"I think, my dear Papa, that this is a time for the discretion which you and my Mamma have so often recommended to me."

"So that is it! Your objection has told me everything; but there is no place for discretion in a confession."

"Well then, Mademoiselle Viar loves me and gives me proofs of it which leave me in no doubt."

"And you?"

"I love her too; and certainly it can't be wrong for me to return her affection—she's so pretty! and her sweetness and her caresses are such that I could be insensible to them only if I were made of marble or utterly ungrateful. I have told you the truth."

With this avowal, which had already corrupted me, the young man blushed furiously. I was too much interested to change the subject. The charming young girl, in love, demonstrative, holding the little fellow in her arms, making him return her ardors, rose into my mind to beg my indulgence, and she had no difficulty in gaining it. I needed to make him continue his narrative to learn if he had nothing to reproach himself with in the response which it seemed to me he could not but accord to so pretty a girl.

So, assuming that kindly manner in which there is no shadow of reproach:

"Then," I said, "you have become the charming girl's little husband?"

"She tells me so every morning and every evening, and then I enjoy seeing how happy it makes her when I call her my little wife."

"And you are not afraid someone will catch you?"

"That is up to her."

"You are in each other's arms as God made you?"

"Yes, when she comes to put me to bed, but she only stays an hour at most."

"Would you like her to stay longer?"

"Not really, because after I've made love I can't help falling asleep."

"I imagine she is your first mistress in the fine art of love."

"You may be sure of that."

"And if she becomes pregnant?"

"She has assured me it is impossible, and when she told me the reason she convinced me; but in a year or two we both think she would have to fear it."

"Do you think she has had another lover before you?"

"Oh no, I'm sure she hasn't."

This whole dialogue only had the effect of making me irretrievably in love with his young mistress. I left him after asking him at what hour she brought him his breakfast. I could neither disapprove nor put obstacles in the way of the mutual affection of their two young hearts; but I thought the least recompense they owed me for my tolerance was to let me witness their amorous ecstasies at least once.

A Bohemian count, of the Clary[29] family, who had come to me with a letter of introduction from Baron de Bavois,[30] and whom I saw nearly every day, was at that time so filled with the venomous juice which in Italy we call "the French disease" that he needed to go into seclusion for six weeks. I arranged for him to stay at the surgeon Faget's[31] for the sum of fifty louis, which I lent him, since, he said, he was then out of money because of the negligence of his cashier, who lived at Töplitz, to which principality he was the heir. It was untrue. Clary was a handsome man who lied from dark to dawn; but my friendship for him was such that I only pitied him. He lied every time he spoke, and not to deceive but from an unconquerable trait of his character. No man is more unhappy than a liar, especially if he is born a gentleman; and he can only lie if he lacks intelligence since he knows that, once he is discovered to be a liar, he can only be despised. His lack of intelligence consists in his believing that he has not been found out and in imagining that the things he comes out with will be taken for true if they merely appear probable. He does not know that despite their probability they do not have that stamp of truth which is strikingly and instantly apparent to anyone of intelligence. Yet the liar thinks he is far more intelligent than those who tell the truth, which according to him they would not do if they had the divine faculty of invention. Such a man was the unfortunate Count Clary, of whom I shall speak again and who came to a bad end. He was very lame; but since it was due to his hip he carried himself so well when he walked that I did not observe the very pardonable defect until three months after I first met him. I saw him limping as he walked in his room once when he thought he was alone; when he turned I asked him if he had hurt himself the day before, and he answered that he had, blushing to the ears. That time I could not condemn him for having lied. Walking without a limp was the lie which cost him the most effort, for on promenades and when he danced he was bathed in sweat. Being young and handsome, he did not want anyone to be able to say he had this defect. He liked gambling when he could improve upon luck, but in shady company, for among gentlemen he would not have had the courage to fight if there was a quarrel; then, too, his manners were not polished enough for him to figure in good society.

The style in which I lived in Little Poland made it famous. Everyone talked of the excellent table I kept. I had fowl fed on rice in a dark room; they were white as snow, with an exquisite flavor. To the excellence of the French cuisine I added whatever the other cuisines of Europe offered to tempt the most refined palates. My macaroni al sughillo,[32] my rice sometimes as pilau,[33] sometimes in cagnoni,[34] my olla podridas[35] were the talk of the town. I matched well-chosen guests with exquisite suppers, at which my company saw that my pleasure depended on the pleasure I provided for them. Ladies of distinction, all of them versed in love, came during the morning to walk in my garden with unseasoned young gallants who did not dare open their mouths and whom I pretended not to see; I gave them fresh eggs and butter which surpassed even the celebrated butter from Vambre.[36] These were followed by plenty of Zara maraschino,[37] than which none better was to be had anywhere. I often lent the unoccupied part of my house to some bigwig who came there to sup with a woman above suspicion. My house then became a sanctuary impenetrable even to myself. They knew that nothing escaped me; but the lady was grateful to me for pretending not to know her whenever I saw her.

Delighted with this life, and needing an income of a hundred thousand francs to maintain it, I often tried to think of some way to make it permanent. A man fertile in schemes whom I met at Calzabigi's seemed sent by Heaven to provide me with an income even above my hopes. He talked to me of the extravagant profits made by silk manufactories, and of those which could be made by a man who, having the necessary capital, would also have the courage to establish a manufactory of painted silks like those from Pekin. He showed me that, with perfect silks, pure colors, and our designers, who were better than any in Asia, there was a vast fortune to be made. He convinced me that, at a price a third less than was asked for those imported from China, such silks, which would be even more beautiful, would be preferred all over Europe, and that despite their being sold so cheaply the manufacturer would make a profit of a hundred percent. He definitely captured my interest when he told me that he was himself a designer and painter and that he was prepared to show me some samples of his talent. I told him to come and dine with me the next day, bringing his samples, and we would discuss the matter when I had seen them. He came, I looked at them all, and I was amazed. What won me over was the design and the beauty of the colors, of which he had the secret and which would resist rain. The beauty of the foliage in silver and gold surpassed what was admired in silks from China which were sold at very high prices in Paris and everywhere. I saw that the thing would be very easy once the design was applied to the fabrics, since the working girls I would hire and would pay by the day would only have to color it according to instructions and that they would produce as many pieces as I wanted in proportion to their number.

The idea of becoming the head of a manufactory[38] pleased me. I congratulated myself that I would become rich in a manner which would recommend me to the State. However, I decided not to make any move until I had first seen everything clearly, thoroughly investigated receipts and expenditures, and engaged or made sure of trustworthy persons upon whom I could rely, since my own part in the enterprise was to consist in my being furnished the accounts and seeing that everyone did his duty.

I arranged for my man to come and spend a week or so in my house. I wanted him to design and paint under my eyes on fabrics of all colors. He did it very rapidly, and he left me all that he had produced, saying that so far as the lastingness of the colors was concerned I could put the pieces he had painted to any test. I carried the samples in my pockets for five or six days, and I saw that all my good friends were delighted with their beauty and my project. I decided to establish the manufactory; and to that end I consulted my man, who was to be the director.

Having decided to rent a house in the Enclos du

Temple,[39] I went to the Prince of Conti, who, after praising my project warmly, promised me his patronage and any franchises I might want. In the house which I chose, the rent for which cost me only a thousand écus a year, I had a large room in which all my girls were to work, each at her own frame. I set apart another large room as a storehouse, and several other apartments on all the floors as lodgings for the more important employees and for myself when I wanted to stay there.

I divided my enterprise into thirty shares, of which I gave five to my painter and designer, keeping the other twenty-five to distribute proportionally among associates who would put up the capital. I gave one share to a doctor who furnished security for the position of storehouse keeper and who came to live in the building with his whole family, and I hired four lackeys, two maidservants, and a porter. I also had to give another share to a bookkeeper, who supplied me with two clerks and also came to live in the building. I did all this in less than three weeks, keeping several carpenters busy making closets in the storehouse and twenty frames in the large room. I left it to the director to find twenty girls to do the painting, whom I would pay every Saturday; and I put in store three hundred lengths of strong taffeta, gros de Tours,[40] and white, yellow, and green camlet,[41] to receive the painted designs, the choice of which I reserved to myself. I paid for everything in cash.

According to a rough calculation made with my director on the basis that sales of our product would not begin until the end of a year, I needed a hundred thousand écus, which I had. In any case I could sell shares at twenty thousand francs, but I hoped I should never have to sell any, for I was aiming at an income of two hundred thousand francs a year.

I saw that the enterprise would ruin me if sales proved insufficient; but how could I fear that, when I saw the beauty of my fabrics and heard everyone telling me that I should not sell them so cheaply? In less than a month I spent some sixty thousand francs establishing the firm, and I had undertaken to pay out twelve hundred francs a week. Madame d'Urfé laughed, believing that I was only doing it to put the curious off the scent and ensure my incognito. What pleased me very much, though it should have made me tremble, was the sight of twenty girls, all between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five, all of modest appearance and more than half of them pretty enough, listening attentively to the painter's instructions at their new work. The most expensive among them cost me only twenty-four sous a day, and they were all of good reputation, chosen by the director's wife, who was pious, and to whom I was very pleased to grant this satisfaction, sure that I should have her as my accomplice if I took it into my head to conquer one of the girls. But Manon Balletti shuddered when she saw me the master of this seraglio. She did not hide her displeasure, even though she knew that at nightfall they all went home to eat supper and sleep. But now for what dropped on me from the blue to shatter my peace of mind.

Miss XCV had been in the convent for three months and was nearing her time; we wrote to each other twice a week, and I felt perfectly easy about the matter. Monsieur de la Pouplinière having already married, when Miss came out of the convent she would go home, and there would be no more talk.

One day after dining at Madame d'Urfé's I took a stroll in the Tuileries. In the principal walk I see an elderly woman accompanied by a man dressed in black and wearing a sword, who stops and looks at me, then speaks to her. It is perfectly simple; I continue my stroll; but the next time around I see her again, closer to me and standing still to look at me, and I remember having seen the man who was walking with her at a gambling house, and that he bore the Gascon name of Castel-Bajac.[42] On my third time around I recognize the woman as the one to whom I had gone with Miss to consult her about her pregnancy. This convinces me that she has recognized me, but considering it of no significance I leave the garden and go elsewhere.

On the next day but one at eleven o'clock, just as I was getting into my carriage, I see a disreputable-looking man who hands me a paper and tells me to read it. Seeing an incomprehensible scrawl, I ask him to read it himself, and I hear that I am ordered to appear before the Commissary[43] that same day after dinner to answer a complaint lodged against me by the midwife so-and-so. He then leaves.

Unable to imagine what the harridan could be complaining of, and certain that she could not convict me of knowing her, I go to an attorney of my acquaintance and formally empower him to represent me. I inform him that I do not know, and have never known, any midwife in Paris. The attorney went to the Commissary and next day brought me a copy of the complaint.

She alleged that I had come to her on such-and-such a night with a lady five months pregnant, both of us wearing dominoes, which showed that we had come from the ball at the Opéra, and that I had demanded that she give me drugs to bring on an abortion, holding a pistol in my right hand and a roll of fifty louis in my left and ordering her to choose. Fear had made her answer that she did not have the necessary drugs ready, but that she would have them the next evening, whereupon I had left, promising to return. Believing that I would not fail to come, she had the next morning asked Monsieur de Castel-Bajac to hide in the room next to the one in which she would receive me, to protect her against violence, but she had not seen me again. She would not have put off lodging a complaint if she had known who I was. On the previous day she had recognized me in the Tuileries, and Monsieur de Castel-Bajac, who knew me, having told her my name and address, she had hastened to accuse me,[44] and she demanded that I be subjected to the full rigor of the laws. This was the satisfaction which her outraged honor led her to desire. Castel-Bajac's name was signed as witness.

My attorney said it was a libel without a shadow of probability and hence it was my part to see that the shameless midwife who was proceeding against me should be punished according to the laws. He said that I should take the case to the Criminal Lieutenant,[45] and I authorized him to do whatever he thought advisable. Four days later he came and told me that the magistrate wanted to speak with me privately at his own house at three o'clock in the afternoon.

I found a most amiable man. He was Monsieur de Sartine,[46] whom the King two years later[47] rewarded by naming him Lieutenant of Police. His former office was one which he sold, the latter an appointment which was not for sale. He immediately asked me to sit down.

"Monsieur," he said, "I have asked you to come here for our mutual advantage, since our interests are inseparable. In the matter of the criminal charge which has been brought against you, you are right to lodge a counteraccusation before me if you are innocent; but first of all you must make your innocence perfectly clear. I am ready to help you, my position as your judge set aside; but you must realize that your opponent cannot be found guilty of libel until convicted of it. I ask you to give me an extrajudiciary statement. Your case is already of the utmost gravity. It is of such a nature that despite your innocence you may feel that your honor demands a certain discretion from you. Your opponents will not respect your delicacy, and they will press you so hard that you will find yourself forced either to accept a verdict of guilty if you do not tell all or to fail in what you may consider your honor demands of you in order to prove your innocence. I now make you a confidence completely between ourselves. Know that, within certain limits, honor is so dear to me that I often defend it at the expense of the strict and rigorous rules of criminal justice. Pay me in the same coin; have confidence in me; tell me everything; give me all the information possible, and thus gain my friendship. If you are innocent I risk nothing, for being your friend can never prevent me from being an incorruptible judge; but if you are guilty I am sorry for you. I warn you that I will be just.''

After saying everything to him which a due regard for his noble offer prompted, I assured him that since I was not in a situation in which honor demanded discretion of me I had nothing to tell him extrajudicially. The midwife who was accusing me and whom I did not know could only be a criminal who had joined with a man of her own stamp to extort money from me.

''I am willing to believe it,'' he said; ''but if she is a criminal, hear how chance has favored her to make it a long and difficult task for you to prove your innocence. Mademoiselle XCV ran away three months ago. You were her intimate friend. No one knows where she is. You are suspected; from the moment she disappeared spies have been paid to follow your every step. The midwife, through the advocate Vauversin,[48] yesterday laid before me an indictment in which it is claimed that the pregnant lady you took to her is the lady who disappeared. The midwife says you were both wearing black dominoes; and it has already been ascertained that you both went to the ball in black dominoes on the night on which the midwife says you went to see her. These are only half-proofs, but they make one tremble.''

"What reason have I to tremble?"

"Because a false witness may be paid to swear that he saw you both leave the ball and get into a hackney coach, and a bribed coachman may even swear that he took you to the midwife's house. In that case I should have to begin by ordering your arrest to oblige you to name the person whom you took to the midwife's. You are accused of having subjected her to an abortion and, three months having elapsed, she is thought to be dead."

"I should be found guilty of murder, innocent though I am, and it is you who would sentence me to death. I am sorry for you."

"You are right to be sorry for me; but do not suppose that I would sentence you lightly. Indeed, I am certain that I would never sentence you to death if you are innocent; but you might languish for a long time in prison, innocent though you may be. You see now that this matter has become very serious in twenty-four hours and that in a week it may become terrible. What gained you my interest is the absurdity of the midwife's accusation, which made me laugh; but the rest, which complicates the matter, is grave. I see the likelihood of an abduction; I see love and honor imperiously commanding you to be discreet. I decided to talk with you. Tell me all, and I will spare you all the difficulties which you must expect even though you are innocent. Tell me all, and be sure that the young lady's honor will not suffer. But if you have the misfortune to be guilty of the crimes with which you are charged, I advise you to take measures which it is not for me to suggest to you. I warn you that in three or four days I will have you summoned to the court record office,[49] where you will see me only in my capacity of judge."

Petrified by this harangue, which revealed all the danger of my situation and showed me beyond doubt that I must put the highest value on the worthy man's offer, I said sadly that, completely innocent though I was, I must avail myself of his kindness in respect to the honor of Miss XCV, who had committed no crime yet whom this foul accusation put in danger of seeing her reputation besmirched.

"I know," I said, "where she is, and I can assure you that she would never have left her mother if she had not tried to force her to marry the Farmer-General."

"But he is married;[50] let her return to her home, and you are safe, unless the midwife persists and proves that you induced an abortion."

"Alas, Monsieur, there is no question of abortion; but other reasons prevent her from returning to her family. I cannot tell you more without a consent which I shall try to obtain. I can then give you all the information to which your noble character entitles you. Grant me the honor of a second hearing in this place day after tomorrow."

"I understand; I will hear you with pleasure, and I thank you no less than I congratulate you. Good-by."

Seeing that I was on the brink of ruin, I felt that I was ready to leave the kingdom rather than betray my unhappy darling's secret. I would gladly have hushed up the affair with money if I had been in time. It was obvious that Farsetti had played the principal part, and that he had never ceased to pursue me and to pay the spies who followed me everywhere. It was even he who had set the advocate Vauversin on me. I saw that I must tell Monsieur de Sartine everything; but I could not do that until I had obtained Madame du Rumain's permission.

CHAPTER XI

I am examined. I give the court record clerk three hundred louis. The midwife and Castel-Bajac are sent to prison. Miss gives birth to a boy and obliges her mother to make me amends. My case is quashed. Miss leaves for Brussels and goes with her mother to Venice, where she becomes a great lady. My working girls. Madame Baret. I am robbed, imprisoned, and set free. I leave for Holland. Helvétius' Esprit. Piccolomini.

I WENT to her the next morning very early. Since the matter was urgent I had her waked, and I gave her an account of all the circumstances. She said it was no time for hesitation, that the Criminal Lieutenant must be informed in full, and that she would go and speak to him herself. She immediately wrote him that she would come to speak with him about an important matter at three o'clock that afternoon, and he answered that he would expect her. She went, she told him the whole story, she said that she[1] was on the eve of being confined and that after her confinement she would go back to her mother, but without confessing to her that she had been pregnant. She assured me that I had nothing more to fear; but that, since the case would continue, I would be summoned to the court record office on the next day but one. She advised me to go and see the record clerk[2] and find some excuse for giving him money.

I was summoned and I appeared. I saw Monsieur de Sartine sedentem pro tribunali ("sitting as judge"). At the end of the hearing he said that he was obliged to issue a writ of summons for me. He warned me that I must not leave Paris nor could I marry while it ran, since any criminal prosecution carried with it the suspension of the right to make civil contracts. At my examination I acknowledged that I had gone to the ball wearing a black domino on the night named in the action, but I denied all the rest. In regard to Miss XCV I said that neither I nor any member of her family had ever thought that she was pregnant.

Since as a foreigner I had to fear that Vauversin would obtain a writ for my arrest by accusing me of preparing to flee, I made it my excuse to pay a visit to the record clerk and place in his hands, without asking for a receipt, three hundred louis as a guarantee for the court costs if I should have to pay them. He advised me to demand the same guarantee of the midwife, and I instructed my attorney to attend to it; but this is what happened four days later.

As I was taking a walk on the rampart opposite the Rue du Temple[3] a Savoyard approached me and put a note in my hands. I read, and I find that a person who is waiting in an alley fifty paces away wishes to speak with me. I order my carriage, which was following me, to stop, and I go to the alley.

Great was my surprise when I saw Castel-Bajac. He immediately said that he had only a few words to say to me and that we could be sure that no one saw us.

"I have come," he said, "to offer you a sure way of ending a case which must be worrying you and costing you a great deal of money. The midwife is certain that it is you who came to her with a pregnant woman, and she is now sorry to have been the reason for your being accused of abducting her. Give her a hundred louis and she will tell the record clerk she was mistaken. You need not pay the amount until afterward. Come with me to talk with the attorney Vauversin and he will persuade you. I know where he is. Let us go. Follow me at a distance."

· Delighted to see how easily the scoundrels were about to betray themselves and curious to learn how they would go about it, I followed the man to the fourth floor of a house in the Rue aux Ours,[4] where I found the advocate Vauversin. As soon as he saw me he came to the point. He told me that the midwife would appear at my lodging with a witness to tell me to my face that I had been at her house with a pregnant woman, and that she would not recognize me. In his opinion this would be enough to make the Criminal Lieutenant stop all proceedings and would put me in a position to defeat the young lady's mother in court. Considering the scheme well conceived, I told him that I would make myself available at my house in the Enclos du Temple every day until noon. He then said that the midwife needed a hundred louis, and I promised to give them to him whenever she had filed a statement of her mistake at the court record office; and he replied that she would take my word for it but that I must first pay a quarter of the amount, which he was to receive for his expenses and his fee. I stated that I was ready to pay it if he would give me a receipt, and on this question we had a long discussion; but in the end he gave me the receipt with the most complete guilelessness, and I counted him out twenty-five louis. He said that he would secretly advise me how to counter all Madame XCV's proceedings, even though she was his client, since he believed I was innocent. I said I hoped he would continue his good offices, and I went home and wrote an account of the whole incident and immediately sent it to Monsieur de Sartine.

Three days later my valet tells me that a woman is there with a man and asks to speak with me. I come out, I ask her what she wants, and she answers that she wants to speak with Monsieur Casanova.

"I am he."

"Then I have made a mistake."

The man who was with her smiled and they left. On the same day Madame du Rumain received a letter from the Abbess in which she announced that her protégée had been successfully delivered of a fine baby boy, whom she had already sent to a place where he would be properly cared for. She said that the new mother would not leave the convent until six weeks had passed, when she would go home to her mother with a certificate which would protect her against any kind of annoyance.

Two or three days later[5] the midwife was sentenced to prison and put in solitary confinement. Castel-Bajac was sent to Bicêtre,[6] and Vauversin was stricken from the list[7] of advocates. Madame XCV's proceedings against me continued until her daughter reappeared,[8] but always without effect. Miss XCV returned to the Hôtel de Bretagne toward the end of August,[9] appearing before her mother with a certificate from the Abbess stating that she had kept her for four months, during which time she had never either gone out or received a visitor; she was returning home now that she need no longer fear being forced to marry La Pouplinière. She made her mother go in person to the Criminal Lieutenant with the same certificate, thereby dropping all proceedings against me. He advised her to maintain a prudent silence on the matter in future, and to accord me some reparation because I would have cause to lodge a complaint, which would be even more injurious to her daughter's honor.

Her daughter, though she had no such fear, obliged her to make me full amends in a written statement, which I caused to be registered at the record office and which enabled me to put a formal end to the case. I did not go to see her again, in order not to encounter Farsetti, who undertook to conduct Miss to Brussels, since her honor forbade her to appear in Paris, where everyone knew her story. She remained in Brussels with Farsetti and Magdelaine until her mother, with the rest of the family, rejoined her there to take her to Venice, where three years later she became a great lady. I saw her again fifteen years later, widowed and passably happy in the consideration she enjoyed because of her rank, her intelligence, and her social virtues; but I never again indulged in the slightest intimacy with her. Four years from now the reader will learn where and how I saw Castel-Bajac again. Toward the end of this same year 1759, before I left for Holland I spent a further sum of money to obtain the midwife's release from prison.

The life I was leading was that of a happy man; but I was not happy. The great sums I was spending made me foresee difficulties. My manufactory would have put me in a position to maintain it if my sales had not been halted by the war.[10] I had four hundred pieces of painted fabrics in my storehouse, and there was no likelihood of selling them before the peace, and since the so greatly desired peace was not being made I had to take my bearings. I wrote to Esther to get her father to let me have half of my capital, send me a clerk, and go into equal partnership with me. Monsieur D. O. replied that if I would transfer the manufactory to Holland he would see to everything and give me half of the profits. I loved Paris and I did not consent.

I was spending a great deal at my house in Little Poland, but the expenditure which was undermining me, and which no one knew about, was very much greater. I became interested in all of my working girls in whom I saw any merit, and, since I did not have the patience to obtain them cheaply, they had only to seize the opportunity to make me pay a high price for my curiosity. The example of the first one was enough to make them all demand a house and furniture as soon as they saw that they had aroused desires in me. My fancy often lasted only three days, and I always thought the new substitute more worthy of me than her predecessor. I stopped seeing her, but I went on paying her expenses. Madame d'Urfé, believing me wealthy, did not interfere with me; I kept her happy by having my oracle encourage her in her magical operations. Manon Balletti made me miserable with her jealousy and her justified reproaches. She could not understand how I could put off marrying her if I really loved her; she kept saying I was deceiving her. Her mother died of consumption about this time, in her arms and mine. Ten minutes before she expired she commended her daughter to my care. I promised from my soul that I would make her my wife; but Destiny, as is so often said, was against it.

About this same time a serious illness also brought my friend Tiretta's mistress to the grave. Four days before her death she dismissed him in order to devote all her thoughts to her soul, making him a present of a valuable ring and two hundred louis. Tiretta, after asking her to forgive him, packed his things and came to me in Little Poland with the sad news. I put him up at the Enclos du Temple, and four weeks later, approving of his feeling that he should seek his fortune in India, I gave him a letter of introduction to Monsieur D. O. at Amsterdam. In less than two weeks he got him a position as clerk on an East India Company ship which was going to Batavia. He would have become rich if he had behaved himself; he became involved in a conspiracy, he had to flee and underwent great vicissitudes. In 1788 I learned from one of his relatives that he was in Bengal and fairly well-to-do, but that he could not obtain possession of his capital in order to return to his native country and live there happily. I do not know what became of him.

At the beginning of November[11] a household official at the Court of the Duke of Elbeuf[12] came to my manufactory with his daughter to buy her a dress for her wedding day. The girl's charming face dazzled me. She chose a piece of very shiny satin, and I saw her satisfaction and the joy of her soul when she saw that her father was satisfied with the price; but I could not resist the pain her sorrow caused me when she heard the clerk tell her father that he must buy the whole length. It was the rule in my establishment, only the whole length could be sold. I went to my study to avoid being forced to make an exception to the rule; and nothing would have happened if the girl had not asked the director to take her to me. She entered, her eyes swollen with tears, telling me point-blank that I was rich, I could buy the whole length myself and let her have the yards she needed for her dress. I looked at her father, who appeared to be asking me to forgive her for a boldness which showed that she was still a child. I told him I liked frankness, and I immediately ordered what she needed for her dress cut off. She then bewitched me completely by coming and kissing me, while her father, thinking it a great joke, laughed uproariously. After paying the price of the material he invited me to the wedding.

"I am marrying her," he said, "on Sunday; there will be a supper and dancing, and you will be doing me honor. My name is Gilbert;[13] I am steward to His Grace the Duke of Elbeuf, Rue Saint-Nicaise."[14]

I promised him I would go.

I went, but I could neither eat nor dance. Gilbert's charming daughter kept me as if in ecstasy all the time I was there, though, in any case, I could never have adapted myself to the tone of the company. It was a crowd of nothing but household officials with their wives and daughters, I knew no one, no one knew me; I was stupid. In such gatherings the man who is the wittiest often becomes the dullest. Everyone made his joke to the bride, she answered them all, and there were bursts of laughter when they did not understand each other. The bridegroom, thin and downcast, praised his bride for keeping everyone in high spirits. Far from making me jealous of his good luck, the fellow aroused my pity; he was obviously marrying to better himself; I took it into my head to question the bride, and she gave me an opportunity by coming to sit beside me after a contradance. She thanked me for what I had done for her, which had enabled her to have the beautiful dress on which everyone was complimenting her.

"But I am sure you can't wait to take it off, for I know what love is."

"It's strange how everyone insists I'm in love, when the fact is I didn't know Monsieur Baret[15] existed until he was introduced to me a week ago."

"And why are you being married in such a hurry?"

"Because my father does everything in a hurry."

"No doubt your husband is rich?"

"No, but he may become so. Day after tomorrow we open a shop for silk stockings at the corner of the Rue Saint-Honoré and the Rue des Prouvaires.[16] I hope you will buy your stockings from us."

"You may be sure of it, and I promise I will be your first customer even if I have to spend the night at the door of your shop."

She laughed, she called her husband, she told him what I had said, and he answered, thanking me, that it would bring him good luck. He assured me that his stockings never became fluffy.

On Tuesday at daybreak I waited in the Rue des

Prouvaires for the shop to open and I went in. The maid asks me what I want and tells me to come back later because her master and mistress are asleep.

"I will wait here. Go get me some coffee."

"I'm not fool enough to leave you alone in my shop."

She was right.

Baret finally comes down, scolds her for not having called him, orders her to go and tell his wife I am there, opens packages, and shows me waistcoats, gloves, pantaloons, until his wife comes down fresh as a rose, white with a whiteness than which it was impossible to see anything more dazzling, asking me to excuse her for being only half dressed and thanking me for having kept my promise.

Madame Baret was of middle stature, seventeen years of age, and, though not a perfect beauty, all that a Raphael [17] could have imagined and executed in the way of prettiness, which has far more power than beauty to fire a heart whose ruling passion is love. Her eyes, her laugh, her always parted lips, the attentiveness with which she listened, her sparkling sweetness, her intense vivacity, the little pride she showed in her charms, the extent of whose power she seemed not to realize at all, kept me in an ecstasy of admiration for this little masterpiece of Nature, which chance or basely interested motives had put in the possession of the poor thin, sickly man before me, concerned with nothing but his stockings, which he valued far more highly than he did the jewel which marriage had given him.

After choosing some twenty-five louis' worth of stockings and waistcoats and enjoying the pleasure I saw displayed on the face of the shop's pretty mistress, I told the maid that I would give her six francs when she brought me the parcel at Little Poland. I left full of love, but without any plan, since I thought the beginning of a marriage presented too many difficulties.

It was on the following Sunday that Baret himself came with my parcel. I gave him six francs, asking him to take them to the maid; he replied that he would not be ashamed to keep them for himself. I gave him a breakfast of fresh eggs and butter, asking him why he had not come with his wife; he answered that she had asked him to bring her, but that he had not dared to for fear of giving offense. I assured him that she would have given me pleasure, for I thought her charming.

"You are very kind."

When I passed her shop in my carriage, which went like the wind, I threw her kisses but did not stop, for I was not in want of stockings and it would have bored me to mingle with the fops whom I always saw at her counter. At the Palais-Royal and the Tuileries everyone was talking of the pretty new shopkeeper, and I was very glad to hear that she was only holding off until she could find a good dupe.

Eight or ten days later, seeing me coming from the direction of the Pont-Neuf,[18] she beckoned to me. I pull the cord,[19] and she asks me to get out. Her husband, after apologizing profusely, says that he wants me to be the first to see some pantaloons in various colors which he has just received. They were the height of fashion in Paris at the time. No well-dressed man would think of going out in the morning except wearing pantaloons. They looked very smart when the young man was well built; but the pantaloons had to be neither too long nor too short, neither too full nor too tight. I tell him to have three or four pairs made to order for me, saying that I am willing to give him the money in advance. He assures me that the ones before me were of all sizes, and he urges me to go upstairs and try them on, asking his wife to go and help me.

The moment was crucial. I go up, she follows me, I ask her to excuse me if I have to take off my nether garments, she replies that she will imagine she is my valet and will be glad to do his duties. I immediately agreed, quickly unbuckling my shoes and yielding to her ministrations when she insisted on pulling down my breeches; but I was careful to take them off with due respect for modesty and to keep on my drawers. It was now she who took over the whole task of putting pantaloons on me and taking them off again when they did not fit, always with a modesty equal to that which I had imposed on myself for the duration of these pleasant proceedings. She decided that four of them fitted me perfectly and I did not dare to contradict her. After giving her the sixteen louis she asked for them, I said I would be glad if she would kindly bring them to me at her convenience. She hurried downstairs to solace her husband and convince him that she was a good saleswoman. When he saw me appear he said he would come with his "little wife" to bring me my pantaloons on the following Sunday; I said it would be a pleasure, and an even greater one if he would stay for dinner with me. He answered that since he had important business to transact at two o'clock he could only accept my invitation if I would permit him to leave to attend it, assuring me that he would return about five o'clock to take his wife home. I said that he could easily do so, since I would not have to go out until six. So the appointment was made, to my great satisfaction.

On Sunday the couple were as good as their word. I at once ordered my valet to admit no one, and impatient to see what would happen after dinner I had it served at noon. The choice dishes and the good wines having put the couple in high spirits, it was the husband who suggested to his wife that she should go home alone if he should happen to be delayed in coming back.

"In that case," I said, "I will see her to your house at six o'clock after taking a turn on the ramparts."

So it was settled that he would find her at home about nightfall, and he set off very well pleased when he found a hackney coach at my door and I told him it was hired for the rest of the day. So there I am, left alone with the jewel and sure of having her to myself until evening.

He had scarcely gone before I complimented her on the good husband fate had given her.

"With a man of his character you must be happy."

"The word is easily said; but to be happy one must feel it and enjoy peace of mind. My husband's health is so frail that I have to consider him an invalid, and he has debts which oblige us to observe the strictest economy. We came here on foot to save twenty-four sous. The income from our enterprise, which could suffice us if we had no debts, is insufficient. We do not sell enough."

"Yet you have many customers; every time I go by I see your shop full."

"They are not customers but idlers, wastrels, profligates, who bore me with their fawning. They haven't a sou, and we always keep an eye on them for fear they will rob us. If we'd been willing to sell to them on credit we'd have nothing left in our shop. All I can do to get rid of them is to sulk; but it's no use. Nothing discourages them. When my husband is in the shop I leave; but most of the time he's not there. Besides, the scarcity of money results in our selling nothing, and we have to pay our work people every Saturday. We shall have to dismiss them, for we have promissory notes out which fall due soon. We have to pay six hundred francs on Saturday and we have only two hundred."

"I am surprised at your being in such straits so soon after your marriage. Your father must have known the situation, and you certainly brought him a dowry."

"My dowry is six thousand francs and he received four thousand in cash. He used them to open the shop and pay some debts. Our stock is worth three times what we owe; but when there are no sales capital lies idle."

"What you have told me distresses me, and if peace is not concluded I foresee that your situation will become steadily worse and your needs perhaps greater."

"Yes, for when my husband recovers his health we may well have children."

"What! Does his health prevent him from paying you the dues of a husband?"

"Yes, but I do not care."

"I am amazed. It seems to me that a man in your company cannot feel ill unless he is dying."

"He is not dying, but he shows no signs of life."

This sally made it proper for me not only to laugh but to applaud it by embraces which became loving when, mild as a lamb, she offered no resistance. I encouraged her by saying that I could help her in the matter of the promissory note which she had to honor on Saturday, and I took her to a boudoir where nothing necessary for bringing love to its proper conclusion was lacking.

At first she enchanted me by the willingness with which she raised no obstacle either to my caresses or my curiosity; but she surprised me when she took a different attitude from that which should be the forerunner of the supreme enjoyment.

"What!" I said, "could I expect such a refusal at this moment when I believed I saw in your eyes that you shared my desires?"

"My eyes did not deceive you; but what would my husband say if he found me other than what I was yesterday?"

She sees that I am astonished, and she urges me to convince myself.

"Have I a right," she says, "to dispose of a fruit which is the prerogative of marriage before marriage has tasted it at least once?"

"No, my angel, no; I pity you and I adore you; come to my arms and fear nothing. The fruit will be respected, but it is incredible."

We spent three hours in a hundred delicious toyings whose effect was only to increase our ardor, whatever people say to the contrary. A solemn promise to be wholly mine as soon as she could make Baret believe he had recovered his health served as surrogate for all that I could desire. After a stroll on the ramparts I took her home in my carriage, accompanying her to the door and slipping a roll of twenty-five louis into her hands.

In love with her as I thought I had never been in love with any woman, I passed her shop three or four times a day, paying no attention to my coachman's repeated warnings that the long detours were killing my horses. I loved the way she threw kisses and the eagerness with which she watched for the first glimpse of me. We had agreed that she would not beckon me to get out until her husband had put her in a condition to make us happy without any fear. The fateful day was not long in arriving. At a sign from her, I stopped. Getting up on the step of my carriage, she told me to wait for her at the door of Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois.[20] Eager to learn what she had to say, I go there, and a quarter of an hour later I see her with her head hidden in her hood; she gets into my carriage, and saying that she has some errands to do, asks me to take her to the Palais Marchand.[21] I had business; but amare et sapere vix deo conceditur ("to love and be wise is scarcely granted to a god").[22] I order my coachman to take me to the Place Dauphine.[23] Good-by to my money! but love commanded me to satisfy her.

At the Palais Marchand she entered every shop into which the pretty proprietress invited her, addressing her as "Princess." Could I object? It was only to look at all the jewelry, the trinkets, the fittings which were rapidly laid before us with honeyed words: "Look at this, my beautiful Princess, look at that. Oh, how it would become you! It is for half-mourning[24] that will be over day after tomorrow." She would look at me then, saying that it certainly was very pretty if only it weren't too expensive; whereupon I, her willing dupe, had to persuade her that if a thing pleased her it could never be too expensive. But while she was choosing gloves and mittens here is what inescapable fate brought to pass so that I should be in a pitiable situation four years later. One thing leads to another in an endless chain.

To my left I notice a girl of twelve or thirteen with a most interesting face in the company of an ugly old woman who was decrying a pair of paste earrings which the girl was holding and admiring; she seemed sad that she could not buy them. I hear her tell the old woman that the earrings would make her happy. The old woman snatches them from her and starts to leave. The shopkeeper tells the girl that she has some which she will let her have more cheaply, and the girl answers that she does not want them. Leaving the shop, she drops a low curtsy to my Princess Baret, who, addressing her as "little Queen," tells her she is as pretty as an angel and kisses her. She asks the old woman who she is, and she answers that she is Mademoiselle de Boulainvilliers,[25] her niece.

"And are you so hardhearted," I say to the old aunt, "that you refuse such a pretty niece these earrings which would make her happy? Will you permit me to present them to her?"

So saying, I hand the earrings to the young lady, who, blushing red as fire, looks at her aunt. The latter gently tells her to accept them and give me a kiss. The shopkeeper says to me that the earrings cost only three louis; at which the scene becomes a comedy, for the aunt angrily tells her she had been going to let her have them for two. The shopkeeper maintains that she had said three. At that the old woman, who was right and who could not bear to let the cheating shopkeeper profit so shamelessly by my politeness, tells the little girl to put down the earrings, and all would have been well; but she spoiled everything by saying that if I would give her niece the three louis she would go and buy earrings twice as pretty in some other shop. As it made no difference to me, though I could not help smiling, I laid the three louis down in front of the young lady, who was still holding the earrings; but the shopkeeper takes them, saying that the bargain had been struck, that the earrings belonged to the young lady and the money to herself. The aunt then called her a cheat, the shopkeeper called her a bawd, passers-by stopped, and foreseeing unpleasantness I gently led out the aunt and the niece, who, delighted to have the pretty earrings, did not care that I had been made to pay a louis too much for them. We will return to the girl at the proper time and place.

I took my Baret, who had made me throw away twenty louis which her husband would have regretted more than I did, back to the church door. She told me on the way that she could come to spend five or six days at Little Poland and that it was her husband himself who would ask me to do them the favor.

"When?"

"No later than tomorrow. Come and buy a few pairs of stockings, I will have a headache, and my husband will talk to you."

I went and, not seeing her, asked him where she was. He said she was sick in bed and that she needed to breathe good country air for a few days. I offered him an apartment at Little Poland, and his face lighted up.

"I will go and ask her to accept," I said; "in the meanwhile, pack me up a dozen pairs of stockings."

I go up, I find her in bed, laughing despite her made-to-order headache. I tell her the thing is done and that she will be told so within a minute. Her husband comes up with my stockings and tells her that I will be kind enough to put her up in my house for a few days; she expresses her gratitude, she is sure she will recover her health by breathing good air, and I ask her to excuse me beforehand if my business prevents me from giving her as much of my company as politeness demands; but that she will lack for nothing and that her husband can come to sup with us every day and leave as early in the morning as he pleases. After thanking me at length, Baret ended by saying that he would have his sister come for all the time that she was to stay at my house. I left, saying that I would give orders that day, and that they would be taken care of whenever they appeared, whether I was at home or not. On the next day but one, coming home at midnight, I learned from my cook that the couple had eaten a good supper and gone to bed. I told her I would have dinner and supper there every day and would be at home to no one.

The next morning when I woke I learned that Baret had left at daybreak, that he had said he would not come back until suppertime, and that his wife was still asleep. I at once paid her my first visit, and after congratulating ourselves again and again on being in unhampered possession of each other, we breakfasted, after which I locked my door and we surrendered to the God of Love.

Surprised to find her just as I had left her the last time I had held her in my arms, I said that I hoped—but she did not let me finish my protest. She said that her husband believed he had done what he had not done, and that it was for us to put him in a position to have no doubt of it in the future. Indeed, it was doing him a necessary service. So Love was the priest at this first sacrifice which my Baret made to Hymen, and I never saw the altar so stained with blood. In her youthful person I observed the greatest satisfaction arising from the proof she was giving me of her courage and from the conviction she was arousing in my inmost being that her passion was of the most genuine kind. I assured her again and again that I would be forever constant to her; and she filled my cup of joy by assuring me that she counted on it. We did not get out of bed except to make our toilets, and we dined together perfectly happy, sure that we would renew our desires only to have the pleasure of quenching them by fresh enjoyments.

"How did you manage," I asked her over dessert, "filled as I know you to be with the fire of Venus, to keep what is due to marriage until you were seventeen?"

"I never loved, that is all. I have been loved, but I could not be persuaded. My father may have believed otherwise when, a month ago, I asked him to get me married quickly."

"Why did you hurry him so?"

"Because I knew that when the Duke of Elbeuf came back from the country he would oblige me to marry a man I loathed and who wanted me at any price."

"Who is this man whom you loathed?"

"One of his pets. A base, infamous swine. The monster! he sleeps with his master who, at the age of eighty-four, insists that he has become a woman and cannot live except with such a husband."

"Is he handsome?"

"Everyone says so, but to me he is revolting."

My charming Baret spent eight days with me, each as happy as the first. I have seldom seen women as pretty as she was, and never any as white. Her dainty breasts, her smooth abdomen, her rounded hips which rose from her flanks to meet her thighs in a curve which no geometrician could ever draw, offered my hungry eyes the beauty which no philosopher has yet been able to define. I never stopped looking at her except when my inability to satisfy the desires she aroused in me made me unhappy. The frieze of the altar on which my flame had ascended to heaven was a composition into which nothing entered but little curls of the finest and palest gold imaginable. In vain did my fingers try to straighten them; the curls, merely assuming a different form, showed me that it was impossible. My Baret shared my intoxication and my ecstasies in a state of perfect calm, never surrendering to Venus until she felt every element of her charming person in tumult. She then became like a dead woman; and she seemed to recover her senses only to reassure me by demonstrating that she was not. Two or three days after she went home I gave her two Mézières[26] notes for five thousand francs each. Her husband was cleared of debt and found himself in a position to go on with his manufactory, keeping his work people, and wait for the end of the war.

At the beginning of November I sold ten shares in my manufactory to Sieur Garnier,[27] of the Rue du Mail,[28] for fifty thousand francs, giving him one third of the painted fabrics in my warehouse and accepting a comptroller appointed by him and paid by the company. Three days after signing the contract I received the money; but the doctor who was in charge of the warehouse emptied it and made off—a robbery which could not possibly have been carried out unless he was in connivance with the painter. To make the blow still worse for me, Garnier had me served with a summons to repay him the fifty thousand francs. I replied that I owed him nothing since his comptroller had already taken office; so the loss must fall equally on all the partners. I was advised to go to court. Garnier began by declaring the contract nul and void, even casting a suspicion of fraud on me. The doctor's surety had disappeared. It had been from a merchant who had just gone bankrupt.

Garnier obtained an order sequestrating everything in the manufactory and my horses and carriages, which were at Little Poland in the hands of the "Butter King." Beset by such difficulties, I dismissed the working girls and all the employees and servants at my manufactory. Only the painter remained in the building, having nothing to complain of since he had always seen to it that he paid himself his share when fabrics were sold. My attorney was an honest man, but my advocate, who assured me every day that I could not lose my case, was a scoundrel. In the course of the proceedings Garnier sent me an accursed summons ordering me to pay, which I at once took to my advocate, who assured me that he would lodge an appeal the same day and who did nothing of the kind, thus appropriating to himself all the money I had laid out to recover what was mine. The next two summonses were kept from reaching me, and a warrant was issued without my knowledge to arrest me for having failed to appear. I was arrested at eight o'clock in the morning in the Rue Saint-Denis[29] in my own carriage, the chief constable sitting beside me while another, sitting beside my coachman, forced him to drive me to the Fort-l'Évêque.[30]

As soon as I got there the record clerk told me that if I paid fifty thousand francs or gave security, I could go home at once; but having neither the money nor the security ready I remained in prison. When I told the clerk that I had received only one summons he said that it happened only too often but that it was difficult to prove. I demanded that writing materials be brought to the room in which I was put, and I informed my advocate and my attorney and then all my friends, beginning with Madame d'Urfé and ending with my brother, who had just married.[31] My attorney came at once; but my advocate only wrote to me, assuring me that he had lodged the appeal and so, my arrest being illegal, I could make it cost my opponent dearly but that I must be patient for a few days and let him act. Manon Balletti sent me her earrings through her brother; Madame du Rumain sent me her advocate, who was known for his honesty, writing me that if I needed five hundred louis she could send them to me the next day; my brother did not answer me. Madame d'Urfé answered that she would expect me for dinner. I thought she had gone mad. By eleven o'clock my room was full of people. Baret, who had heard of my arrest, came in tears to offer me his shop. I was informed that a lady had arrived in a hackney coach, and not seeing her appear I asked why she was not allowed to come up. I was told that she had left after conferring privately with the record clerk. From the description I was given of her I gathered that she was Madame d'Urfé.

I was extremely annoyed to be where I was, for it could not but hurt my reputation all over Paris, aside from the fact that the discomfort of the prison distressed me. Since I had thirty thousand francs in ready money and sixty thousand in jewels, I could have deposited the amount and left at once, but I could not bring myself to do so, despite Madame du Rumain's advocate, who tried to persuade me to get out of prison no matter by what means. According to him I need only deposit half the amount, which he would "pin down" at the court record office until an appeal brought me a verdict which, he assured me, would be in my favor.

While we were still discussing this the jailer came to tell me that I was free and that a lady was waiting at the door for me in her carriage. I sent Leduc (such was my valet's name) to find out who the lady was, and when I learned that it was Madame d'Urfé I made my bow to everyone. It was noon. I had spent four very disagreeable hours[32] in the place.

Madame d'Urfé received me in her berlin with great dignity. A judge[33] who was with her asked my pardon in the name of his nation and country, in which foreigners were likely to suffer such indignities. I thanked Madame in a few words, saying that I was delighted to be in her debt but that it was Garnier who profited from her noble generosity. She answered with a smile that he would not so easily profit from it and that we would discuss the matter at dinner. She advised me to go walking in the Tuileries and the Palais-Royal at once, to convince the public that the rumor of my imprisonment was false. I took her advice, saying that she would see me again at two o'clock.

After showing myself to good purpose in the two great promenades, where, pretending not to notice it, I saw all my acquaintances astonished to see me, I went and returned her earrings to my dear Manon, who gave a cry when I appeared. After thanking her and assuring the whole family that my arrest had been due to a plot for which I would make all those who had taken a hand in it pay dearly, I left, promising that I would come to supper with her, and I went to dine with Madame d'Urfé, who at once made me laugh by swearing her Genius had informed her that I had arranged to be arrested on purpose to get myself talked about, for reasons which I alone knew. She said that after learning from the record clerk at the Fort-l'Évêque how matters stood she had gone home for some municipal obligations[34] she owned which would have covered a hundred thousand francs and had deposited them; but that Garnier would have to deal with her before he got the money if I should be unable to obtain justice.

She said I ought to begin by attacking my advocate in criminal court since it was obvious that he had not lodged my appeal. I left assuring her that she would recover her security in a few days.

After showing myself in the lobbies of the two theaters

I went to sup with Manon Balletti, who was delighted to have seized the opportunity to give me a proof of her affection. Her joy knew no bounds when I told her I was going to give up my manufactory, for she thought my working girls were the reason why I could not make up my mind to marry her.

I spent the whole of the next day with Madame du Rumain.[35] I felt how deeply I was indebted to her; but she had no such feeling; on the contrary, she thought she could never sufficiently show me her gratitude for the oracles which insured her against ever taking a false step. Despite all the intelligence the lady possessed, she was taken in. I was sorry that I could not open her eyes, and mortified when I considered that I was deceiving her and that but for my deceit she would not feel the regard for me which she showed.

My imprisonment, though it lasted only a few hours, disgusted me with Paris and inspired me with a hatred for all legal proceedings which I still feel. I was involved in two, one against Garnier,[36] the other, in criminal court, against the advocate. My soul was in torment every time I had to curry favor, spend my money on advocates, and waste my hours, which I thought only well used in procuring me pleasures. In this state of turmoil I resolved to assure myself of a regular income sufficient to give me complete peace of mind. I decided to abandon everything, make a second journey to Holland to renew my financial resources, and then return to Paris and invest all the capital I should have accumulated in an annuity for the lifetimes of two persons. The two lifetimes were to be mine and my wife's; and the wife was to be Manon Balletti. I informed her of my plan, and she could not wait to see it executed.

I began by giving up my house[37] in Little Poland, which was to remain mine only to the end of the year; and I withdrew from the Military School the eighty thousand francs which served as the security for my office in the Rue Saint-Denis. In this way I resigned my paltry position of collector of the lottery. I gave my office to my clerk, who had married, and so made him a small fortune. The man who stood security for him was, as always, a friend of his wife's; but the poor fellow died two years later.

Not wanting to leave Madame d'Urfé involved in a suit against Garnier, I went to Versailles to persuade the Abbé de Laville, his great friend, to become the mediator in a compromise. The Abbé, who saw that he was in the wrong, undertook it, and a few days later wrote me to go and talk with Garnier himself, assuring me that I would find him prepared to listen to reason. He was at Rueil,[38] and I went there. It was a country house four leagues from Paris which had cost him four hundred thousand francs. Garnier, who had been Monsieur d'Argenson's cook, had made a fortune in provisions during the last war but one.[39] He lived in opulence, but having the misfortune to be seventy years old and still to love women he could not be happy. I found him with three girls, sisters and of good family as I later learned. They were poor and he kept them. At table I observed that they showed a certain dignity and modesty through the humiliation with which poverty afflicts all people of sensibility. Need forced them to pay court to the old unmarried profligate, with whom they had perhaps to undergo painful private relations. After dinner he fell asleep, leaving me to entertain the young ladies, and when he woke we withdrew to discuss our business.

When he learned that I was on the verge of leaving, perhaps never to return to Paris, and that he could not stop me, he foresaw that the Marquise d'Urfé would use every legal trick against him to drag the thing out as long as she pleased and perhaps win the suit. I had to spend the night there. In the morning he told me, as his last word, that he wanted twenty-five thousand francs or he would litigate until his dying day. I answered that he would find the amount in the hands of Madame d'Urfé's notary after he had released her security at the court record office at the Fort-l'Évêque.

Madame d'Urfé was not persuaded that I had done well to make an arrangement with Garnier until I told her that the Order[40] demanded that I should not leave Paris without first settling all the affairs which could lead to the supposition that I had gone because I could not pay my debts.

I went to take leave of the Duke of Choiseul,[41] who said that he would write Monsieur d'Affry to help me in all my negotiations if I could arrange a loan at five percent, whether from the States-General or from a private company. He said that I could assure everyone that peace would be concluded during the course of the winter and that I could also be sure that he would not let me be denied what was due me when I returned to France. Such were his words to me, and he knew that peace would not be made; but I had no project in mind, and I was sorry I had entrusted Monsieur de Boulogne with my project concerning wills, in which the new Comptroller, Silhouette, showed no interest.

I sold my horses, my carriages, and all my furniture, and I stood security for my brother, who had gone into debt to a tailor, but he was sure that he would soon be able to pay all his debts since he was finishing several pictures for which the people who had ordered them were waiting impatiently.

I left Manon in tears, but I was sure I should make her happy when I returned to Paris.

I set off with one hundred thousand francs in bills of exchange and as much again in jewels, all by myself in my post chaise and preceded by Leduc, who liked to ride at full gallop. He was a Spaniard eighteen years of age whom I cherished because no one dressed my hair better than he. A Swiss lackey, also on horseback, served me as courier. It was December 1st[42] of the year 1759. I had in my carriage Helvétius' L'Esprit,[43] which I had not yet found time to read. After reading it I was even more surprised by the sensation it had created than by the Parlement which had condemned it and done everything possible to ruin its author, who was a most agreeable man and far more intelligent than his book. I found nothing new either in the historical part concerning the manners of nations, which was in many places sheer invention, or in the system of ethics founded on reason. It had all been said again and again, and Blaise Pascal [44] had said far more, though more guardedly. If Helvétius wanted to go on living in France he had to retract. He preferred the pleasant life he led there to honor and his own system of philosophy, that is, his own mind. His wife, whose soul was nobler than her husband's, wanted to sell everything they had in France and go to live in Holland rather than submit to the dishonor of a palinode; but her husband thought he should prefer anything to exile. He would perhaps have followed his wife's advice if he could have foreseen that his retraction would make his book a laughingstock. By retracting he appeared to say that he had not known what he was writing, that he had only been joking, that all his arguments were paralogisms. But a number of intelligent minds did not wait until he had contradicted himself to contemn his system. What! because in everything he does man is always the slave of his self-interest, must it follow that any feeling of gratitude becomes absurd and that no act can earn us merit or blame? Are criminals not to be hated and honest men not to be loved? Pitiful philosophy!

It could have been demonstrated to Helvétius that it is false that in everything we do our own interest is our prime motive and the first to be consulted. Then Helvétius did not admit virtue, which is very odd. He was himself highly virtuous. Is it possible that he never saw that he was an honest man? It would be amusing if what made him publish his book was a feeling of modesty. Was he right to make himself contemptible in order to escape the stigma of being proud? Modesty is a virtue only when it is natural; if it is assumed, or practiced because it has been inculcated in school, it is only hypocrisy. I never knew a man more naturally modest than the famous D'Alembert.[45]

I spent two days in Brussels, happening to put up at the "Empress"[46] where Miss XCV and Farsetti were staying. I pretended not to know her. I went to the Moerdick[47] and crossed it, leaving my post chaise on the hither side. At The Hague I put up at the "Prince of Orange." The innkeeper persuaded me to eat at the public table when he told me who the company were. He said they were staff officers of the Hanoverian army, English ladies, and a Prince Piccolomini[48] with his wife. I at once decided to go down to supper.

Unknown to everyone and saying nothing, I attentively examined the face, the manners, and the bearing of the supposed Italian Princess, who was pretty enough, and more especially of her husband, whom I thought I knew. I learned at table that the famous Saint-Germain was staying at the same inn.

Just as I was going to bed Prince Piccolomini enters my room and embraces me as an old acquaintance.

"One glance that you gave me," he said, "showed me that you recognized me immediately. I recognized you instantly too, despite the sixteen years which have passed since we last met in Vicenza.[49] Tomorrow you may tell everyone that we have recognized each other; that I am not a prince, but Count Piccolomini, and here is my passport from the King of Naples, which I beg you to read.''

He had not let me say a word, and I could not place him. I read the passport and I find ''Ruggero di Rocco, Count Piccolomini.'' I then recollect a Rocco Ruggeri who taught fencing in Vicenza, I look at him, and I remember him. I congratulate him on no longer practicing the profession. He answers that, his father still being alive at that time and not giving him anything to live on, he practiced the profession to keep from starving, concealing his name and rank. After his death he had gone to take over his inheritance and at Rome had married the beautiful lady I had seen. He ended by inviting me to come to his room after dinner, where I would find pleasant company and a faro bank which he kept. He said frankly that if I liked he would take me into partnership with him and that I would not lose by it. I promised to pay him a visit.

After visiting the Jew Boas and politely refusing the lodging he offered me I made my bow to Count d'Affry, who, after the death of Her Highness the Princess of Orange, Regent of the Netherlands, had assumed the rank of Ambassador.[50] He received me very well, saying that if I had come back hoping to enter into some transaction which would be profitable to France, I was wasting my time. He said that the action of the Comptroller-General Silhouette[51] had lowered the credit of the nation to such a degree that its bankruptcy was expected. He was very sorry about it. Though he kept saying that payments were only suspended for a year and that it made no difference, he was wasting his breath; everyone was indignant.

After thus bemoaning his situation, he asked me if I knew a certain Count of Saint-Germain who had recently[52] arrived at The Hague, whom he had never seen, and who said that the King had authorized him to borrow a hundred millions.

''When people come to ask me about him,'' he said, ''I can only answer that I do not know him, for I am afraid I may compromise myself. You cannot but see that such an answer from me must only hamper his negotiations, but it is his own fault. Why did he not bring me a letter from the Duke of Choiseul or from Madame la Marquise? I believe the man is an impostor, but I shall have information about him in a week or ten days."

I then told him everything that was known about this strange and extraordinary man, and he was surprised to learn that the King had given him an apartment at Chambord; but when I told him that he possessed the secret of making diamonds he laughed and said he no longer doubted he could find the hundred millions. He invited me to dinner the next day.

I had scarcely got back to the inn before I sent in my name to the Count of Saint-Germain, who had two Haiduks[53] at his door. He received me by saying that I had forestalled him.

"I imagine," he said, "that you have come here to do something for our Court; but you will find it difficult, for the Exchange is scandalized by the action that idiot Silhouette has just taken. However, that will not prevent me from finding a hundred millions; I gave my word for it to Louis XV, whom I may call my friend, and in three or four weeks my mission will be accomplished."

"Monsieur d'Affry will help you to succeed."

"I do not need him. I shall not even go to see him, for he might boast that he had helped me."

"You go to the Court, I presume, and the Duke of Brunswick[54] could be useful to you."

"He is of no interest to me. I do not care to make his acquaintance. I need only to go to Amsterdam. My own credit is enough. I love the King of France, for there is not a better man than he in the whole kingdom."

"Then come down to dinner at the common table, you will find people of distinction."

"You know I do not eat; besides, I never sit down at a table where I may find people with whom I am not acquainted.''

''Then good-by, My Lord, we shall meet again in Amsterdam.''

I went down to the public room, where, while waiting for dinner to be served, I chatted with the officers who were present. When I was asked if I knew Prince Piccolomini I replied that I had recognized him after supper and that he was a count, not a prince.

He came down with his wife, who spoke only Italian. I paid her my respects, and we sat down to dinner.

CHAPTER I

Portrait of the pretended Countess Piccolomini. Quarrel, duel. I see Esther and her father, Monsieur D. O. Esther still fascinated by the cabala. Piccolomini's forged bill of exchange; consequences. I am fleeced and in danger of being murdered. Orgy with two Paduan women; consequences. I reveal a great secret to Esther. I thwart the swindling Saint-Germain; his flight. Manon Balletti is unfaithful to me; her letter announcing her marriage; my despair. Esther spends a day with me. My portrait and my letters to Manon come into Esther's hands. I spend a day with that charming young woman. We are on the verge of talking marriage.

THE ADVENTURESS was Roman, still young, tall, well built, with black eyes and a dazzlingly white complexion—but of the artificial whiteness one sees at Rome on the faces of nearly all loose women and which is so distasteful to delicate perceptions which love natural beauty. She had attractive manners and an appearance of intelligence, but it was only an appearance. Since she spoke only Italian no one but an English officer named Walpole[1] talked with her. Despite his never addressing a word to me, I felt drawn to him; and it was not an effect of sympathy, for if I had been blind or deaf Sir Walpole would have left me completely indifferent.

Signora Piccolomini irked me; but after dinner I went up to her room with the entire company. The Count sat down to a game of whist and Walpole played primero[2] with the Countess, who cheated him. He stopped after losing some fifty ducats, and the lady asked him to take her to the theater.[3] She left her husband playing whist. I went too.

In the parterre I found Count Tott,[4] brother of the Count Tott whose stay in Constantinople made him famous. He told me he had left France because he had fought with a man who had rallied him on not being present at the Battle of Minden,[5] having purposely put off rejoining his corps. He proved his courage by giving him a wound with his sword. He said he had no money, and I opened my purse to him; he opened his to me five years later at Petersburg. Having seen me speak to the Italian Countess, he said that her husband was a cheat; I did not answer.

After the play I go back to the inn. The waiter tells me that Prince Piccolomini has left in a hurry with his valet and a small trunk. A moment later his wife appears, her maid whispers something to her, and she says that her husband has left because he has fought a duel and that it often happened to him. She invited me to supper with Walpole, and she ate with a very good appetite.

At dessert an Englishman who had made one at the whist table with Piccolomini came upstairs and told Walpole that the Italian Count, caught cheating, had given the lie to their fellow Englishman, who had accused him, and they had gone out together. An hour later the Englishman had come back to the "English Parliament," where he was lodging, wounded in the forearm and shoulder. It was a trifling affair. I went to bed.

The next day after dining with Count d'Affry[6] I return to the inn and I receive a letter from Count Piccolomini, dispatched by express messenger and containing an enclosure addressed to his wife. He asked me to bring her to him in Amsterdam at the "City of Lyons,"[7] where he was lodging, after giving her his letter. He wanted to know how the Englishman he had wounded was doing.

The favor he asked of me almost made me laugh, for I had no inclination to grant it. I took her letter to the Signora, who was sitting up in bed playing cards with Walpole. She has scarcely read it before she tells me she cannot leave until the following day, and she specifies an hour. I reply that business prevents me from having the honor of serving her, and Walpole, informed of the matter, offers to take advantage of my refusal. She accepts, and they arrange to leave after dinner the next day in time to spend the night at Leiden. The plan was carried out as made; but now for my turn.

The day after they left I sit down at table with all the others and with two Frenchmen who have just arrived. After taking their soup one of the two Frenchmen says that the "famous" Casanova must be in Holland. The other replies that he would be very happy to find him and call him to account in no uncertain terms. As I am sure that I have never had anything to do with the man, the blood instantly rushes to my head, but I control myself. I ask him quietly if he knows Casanova.

"I have good reason to know him," he replies in the self-satisfied tone which is always offensive.

"You do not know him," I say sharply, "for I am he."

Not in the least disconcerted, and even with a certain insolence, he says that I am mistaken if I think I am the only man in the world named Casanova.

His answer put me in the wrong, and I was left with no reply but determined that, at the right time and place, I would take him by the collar and force him to show me the other Casanova who might possibly be in Holland and whom he wanted to call to account. Meanwhile I bit my lips and bore with patience the sorry figure I must be cutting in the eyes of the officers who, having heard the tone of the short dialogue, might well suspect me of cowardice. Meanwhile the impudent fellow, making the worst of my situation and the best of his victory, which gave him the upper hand of me at least on the score of wit, talked away about anything and everything. He went so far as to ask me from what country I came, and I thought it proper to reply that I was a Venetian.

"Then you are a good friend to France, for your republic is under French protection."

I was in too bad a humor to laugh. I told him, in the tone one uses to make someone understand that he arouses one's contempt, that my republic was not, and had never needed to be, under the protection of France or of any other sovereign nation during the thirteen centuries of its existence.

"And will you now," I said, "to excuse your ignorance, tell me that there are two republics of Venice in the world?"

At that a general burst of laughter restored me to life and seemed to impose silence on the insolent fool; but his evil demon started him talking again at dessert. The conversation turned to the Earl of Albemarle.[8] The Englishmen present, praising him, said that if he had lived France and England would not then be at war. Another praised Lolotte,[9] his mistress. I said that I had met her at the Duchess of Fulvy's,[10] and that no woman had ever better deserved to become the Countess of Hérouville. The Count of Hérouville,[11] Lieutenant-General and man of letters, had just married her. But I had scarcely concluded her eulogy before the Frenchman looks at me with a laugh and says he once spent a night with her at La Pâris's.[12] It was then that I could not keep from raising my plate with four fingers and showing him the under side of it. He got up and, going to the fireplace, stood with his back to it. He had his sword and the sword knot which indicated that he was an officer. The conversation turned to other matters. Two minutes later we all got up from table. Everyone left except my man, who had told his crony that they would meet at the theater. Being now certain that the fool would follow me, I left the inn and walked in the direction of Scheveningen. I saw him follow me at forty paces' distance and come toward me when he saw me stop and stand in the wood waiting for him.

At ten paces from me he unsheathed, and I did not need to fall back in order to have time to do the same. It was he who fell back when he felt the point of my sword in his chest from my straight lunge, which has never failed me, without my needing to fence at all. He said when I came up to him, lowering my sword, that we would meet again in Amsterdam if I was going there. I did not see him again until six years later in Warsaw, where I took up a collection for him. His name was Varnier. I do not know if he was the Varnier[13] who was President of the National Convention[14] under Robespierre.

When I returned to the inn after the play I was told that he had left for Rotterdam with his crony after spending an hour in his room with a surgeon. At supper no one said anything about the matter to me nor did I speak of it. Only an English lady said that a man of honor could not sit down at a common table without feeling called upon to fight, prudent though he might be.

Having nothing to do at The Hague, I left the next morning an hour before dawn in order to reach Amsterdam that evening. At noon I encountered Sir James Walpole at an inn, where he told me he had left Amsterdam on the previous day an hour after restoring the chaste wife to the arms of her scoundrelly husband. He had satisfied his passing fancy and he wanted no more of her.

I reached Amsterdam about midnight and found very good lodgings at the "Second Bible."[15] My impatience to see Esther kept me from sleeping well. Her nearness revived all my old flame.

At ten o'clock I called on Monsieur D. O., who received me with demonstrations of the greatest friendship, lamenting that I had not come to stay with him. When he learned that I had given up my manufactory he said that since I could not decide to transfer it to Holland I had done well, for it would have ruined me. After complaining of the bad faith of France, the cause of his being involved in several bankruptcies, he told me to go and see Esther.

She received me by giving a cry and running into my arms. I found her two inches taller and her figure proportionately fuller. No sooner had we sat down than the first thing she wanted to do was to convince me that she had become as well versed in the cabala as I was. She said that it made her life happy, that through it she had become mistress of her father's will, and so she was sure he would never marry her except to a man of her own choice.

"Your father," I said, "must suppose that I taught it to you."

"So he does; and he told me one day that he forgives me anything I may have sacrificed to you to win the great secret. But I told him the truth, I stole it from you, and, like you, I have become the surprising divinity who answers; for I am sure that your answers come from nowhere but your own mind."

"How could I have said where the portfolio was and that the ship was not lost?"

"It was you who threw the portfolio there after finding it, and as for the ship, you took a chance. Admit that, since you are honest by nature, you must have been very uneasy. But I shall never be so bold. When my father gives me questions of that sort I answer very obscurely. I do not want him to lose the confidence he has in my oracle, still less would I want to become the cause of some misfortune which would affect me too nearly."

"If the deception makes you happy I cannot but leave you to practice it. But permit me to feel the utmost admiration for your talent. You are unique."

"I am not interested in your admiration, I want a sincere avowal."

"I cannot be more sincere than I am."

At that the charming girl became serious. Determined not to lose the advantage I had over her, I thought of predicting something to her which could be known only to God, or of guessing what she thought. I was absolutely determined to keep the upper hand of her. We went down to dinner; but a sad and silent Esther greatly troubled me.

There was a fourth person at the table, and I concluded that he was in love. He kept his eyes on her constantly. We did not speak of the cabala until after he had left us. He was her father's favorite secretary, with whom he would have liked to see her in love; but he was not fit for the role.

"Is it possible," Monsieur D. O. asked me, "that my daughter has learned to draw answers from your oracle without your having taught her?"

"I did not believe it possible until today, but she has just convinced me that I was wrong. I can now teach it to no one else, on pain of losing it myself. Such was the oath I made to the wise man who taught me the calculation. Your daughter, not having taken the same oath, can freely communicate her knowledge to anyone she pleases."

With great quickness of mind she replied that the oracle itself, when she had asked it if she could communicate the method of calculating it to anyone else, had answered that if she revealed its secret without its permission she would no longer find truth in its replies. I saw her soul, and I rejoiced to see that she had become calm. Whether I had been lying or not, she owed me gratitude. I had upheld her to her father; but she saw that I had done it only out of politeness, and she wanted me to admit as much when I was alone with her.

The worthy man had the curiosity to ask us both the same question, to see if one would answer white and the other black. Esther saying that she was curious too, he wrote the same question on two sheets of paper. She went to her room to obtain her answer and I obtained mine where I was. She came back with hers before mine was finished. Monsieur D. O. asked if he would do well to get rid of all the French securities he had, at no matter what loss. Esther's oracle answered that, on the contrary, he should try to acquire more of them cheaply, for France would never go bankrupt. Mine answered that if he sold he would be sorry, for a new Comptroller-General[16] would pay everyone the following year. After embracing us both the worthy man left, saying that the agreement between our answers would make him richer by at least half a million in the course of the year, though at the risking of losing three. His daughter looked alarmed; but he embraced her again, saying that it would be only a quarter of what he owned.

Esther, left alone with me, was very much pleased by the compliments I offered her on her excellent answer, which was appropriate yet at the same time daring, for she would not be as well informed as I was concerning French affairs.

"I thank you," she said, "for upholding me. But admit that, to please me, you lied like a trooper."

"Of course, for I see that you are happy; and I will even tell you that you need know no more about it."

"Say that I cannot know more. Admit that is true."

"I will admit it to ease your mind."

"You are a cruel man. You answered that there will be a new Comptroller-General in France. By that you risk compromising the oracle; I should never dare to. My dear oracle! I am too fond of it to expose it to such a disgrace."

"It proves that I am not the author of it; but I would wager that Silhouette will be dismissed, now that the oracle has told me so."

"My dear friend, your stubbornness makes me miserable. I cannot be satisfied until I am sure that I possess the cabala as you do, neither more nor less, and now you can no longer tell me that you make it up in your head. You must convince me of the contrary."

"I will consider it, if it will please you."

And so I spent the whole day with the girl, who had everything to make her the happiest of mortals and who would have made me happy if, not loving my freedom[17] above everything else, I could have considered settling in Holland.

The next morning my evil genius made me go to the "City of Lyons"; it was the inn at which Piccolomini was staying. I found him with his wife and a collection of scoundrels who, as soon as they heard my name, all flocked around me. There was a Chevalier Saby,[18] who was wearing the uniform of a major in the service of the King of Poland and whom I had met in Dresden. There was a Baron Wiedau,[19] from Bohemia, who at once told me that his friend the Count of Saint-Germain had arrived[20] at the "Star of the East" and had immediately asked where I was staying. There was a gaunt bravo who was introduced to me as the Chevalier de la Perrine and whom I at once recognized as the Talvis[21] who had broken the Prince-Bishop's bank at Pressburg and had lent me a hundred louis. There was another Italian, who looked like a tinsmith, who was named Neri, and who told me he had seen me at a musicau a year earlier.[22] I remembered that I saw the unfortunate Lucia there. With all these sharpers there was also the pretended wife of the Chevalier Saby; she was a rather pretty Saxon woman who was paying court to the Countess Piccolomini, speaking very broken Italian. The first thing I did was to return, with polite thanks, a hundred louis in cash to La Perrine, who insolently remarked that he now remembered having lent me a hundred louis in Pressburg, but that my returning them had not made him forget what was really of consequence.

"You owe me a revenge," he said, "sword in hand. Here is the scar of the pink you gave me seven years ago."[23]

With that he opens his ruffle and shows the company a small scar. The scene had struck the whole room dumb; the hundred louis, the scar, the demand for revenge, all seemed equally extraordinary. I told the Gascon that in Holland I gave no revenges, for I had business, but that I would defend myself wherever I should be attacked and in the meanwhile I warned him that I always went armed with pistols. He replied that he wanted his revenge sword in hand, but that he would give me time to finish my business.

Piccolomini, who already had designs on the hundred louis, immediately made a bank at faro. If I had been wise I would not have played; but the desire to recover the hundred louis I had just paid out prompted me to take a livret.[24] Before supper I lost a hundred ducats and after supper I won them back in counters. When I asked to be paid so that I could go to bed, Piccolomini gave me a bill of exchange on the Bank of Amsterdam drawn by a firm in Middelburg.[25] I did not want to take it; but I thought I must yield when he said he would negotiate it for me in the morning. I left the gang of thieves, refusing La Perrine, who had lost the hundred louis, the loan of another hundred which he insisted I owed him in requital. In his ill humor he said insulting things to me; but I bore it and went off to bed, thoroughly resolved not to return to such a den of cutthroats.

However, the next morning I go out, intending to get the value of the bill of exchange from Piccolomini. I first go into a coffeehouse for breakfast, and there find Rigerboos, Teresa's friend, whom my reader may remember.[26] After an embrace and some talk of "our lady" (as he always called her), who was in London and making a fortune there, I showed him my bill of exchange, telling him how it had come into my possession. He looks at it and says it is forged, that it is a copy of the genuine one, which had been paid the day before. Seeing that I am loath to believe it, he takes me with him to the merchant, who shows me the original which he had paid to a person he did not know. I ask Rigerboos to come with me to call on Piccolomini, who would perhaps cash it for me even so, and, if not, he would be a witness to whatever might take place.

We go there. Piccolomini, after greeting us politely, tells me to give him the bill of exchange, which he will at once send to the merchant to be cashed. Rigerboos speaks up and tells him that the merchant on whom it was drawn will not pay it since he has paid it already, and that the bill he had given me was only a copy of the original. He pretends to be astonished, he says it is unbelievable, but that he will look into the matter.

"You shall look into it," I said, "at your convenience; but in the meanwhile give me five hundred florins."

He says that I know him, that I can wait, that he guarantees the bill, he raises his voice, his wife comes and joins in, and then his valet, who is a ruffian. Rigerboos takes me by the arm, leads me outside, and takes me to see a very fine-looking man who was the equivalent of a police lieutenant. After hearing the whole story he asks me to leave the bill with him and to tell him where I shall be dining. I name Monsieur D. O. and that is enough. We leave, I thank Monsieur Rigerboos, and I go to see Esther.

She receives me with some concern, reproaching me for not having put in an appearance the day before. It flatters me. She was charming. I say that I have to be careful not to see her every day, for her eyes search my soul. After saying that she does not believe a word of it she asks if I have thought of a way to convince her. She says that if it is true that my cabala is an intelligence which has nothing to do with hers, I could make the cabala itself tell me how to go about enlightening her. I pretend to find her expedient a good one, and I promise to ask the question for her. Her father arrived from the Exchange and we sat down at table. We had come to dessert when a police officer arrived bringing me five hundred florins from the Magistrate, for which I gave him a receipt. After he left I told Monsieur D. O. the whole story, and the beautiful Esther reproached me for preferring bad company to hers. She asked me to go with her to a Dutch comedy, at which I was bored because she gave it her entire attention. Back at her house she told me the whole plot of the play, then we ate supper, and nothing was said of the cabala. I promised her and Monsieur D. O. that I would come to dine with them every day or would let them know when I could not.

The next morning at eight o'clock I saw Count Piccolomini before me in my room; his not having had himself announced made me suspicious. I quickly rang, and my Spaniard came up. He asked me to send him away because we needed to talk privately. I said that he did not understand Italian and that I had good reason to keep him there; but my valet understood everything.

"Yesterday about noon," he said, "two men entered my room accompanied by the innkeeper, for not knowing French they needed an interpreter. One of them asked me if I would or would not instantly pay five hundred florins which I owed you because of a forged bill of exchange which I had given you and which he had with him. He said that I must answer yes or no on the spot without arguing, for such was the order they had received from the Police Magistrate. Thus badgered, I decided to pay and did so; but I was very much surprised when the same man told me through the interpreter that he would not give me back the bill until I had stated from whom I had received it, since it was forged and the laws governing commerce demanded that the forger be found. I replied that I did not know the person who had given it to me. I said that I had been amusing myself in my room with a small bank at faro when a man had come in and begun playing on the security of the note and had left after losing it. After he had gone I learned that he had come alone and that none of the persons present knew him. The other man had the interpreter tell me that I should take measures to find the man, for otherwise the law would hold me to be the forger and would proceed against me. After signifying all this to me they left with the bill. My wife went after dinner to the Police Magistrate to remonstrate with him, and he heard her out after sending for an interpreter. The answer he gave her was that it was his duty to discover the person guilty of forgery, that law and order demanded it, to say nothing of the honor of Monsieur Casanova, who might be suspected of being the forger, and that the merchant himself could proceed against me in an effort to find out who had forged his signature. You see my situation. Everything depends on you; you have received your money, get me out of this difficulty. You have friends, use your influence, and no more will be heard of the matter.''

I answered that I did not see what I could do, and I ended by advising him to sacrifice the scoundrel who had given him the forged bill or to disappear. He left, saying I would be sorry.

My Spaniard told me he had heard threats and that I should be on my guard; but I ordered him to hold his tongue, I dressed, and I went to Esther's, where I was faced with trying once more to convince her that my oracle was divine.

She gave me a question in which she challenged the oracle to reveal something which could be known only to herself. It was no time to take chances. Really at a loss, I said that the oracle might reveal some secret which she would later regret my having learned. She replied that she had nothing to fear, and that it was no use for me to think up excuses. Here is the bright idea which finally came into my mind.

In the middle of the little dimple at the bottom of her chin Esther had a pretty black mark, very small but slightly rounded and garnished with four or five slender very short black hairs. This little mark, which we Italians call neo,[27] added a charm to her pretty face. Knowing as I did that all marks of this kind which are seen on anyone's face or neck or hands or arms are duplicated on the part of the body corresponding to the visible part, I was certain that Esther must have exactly the same kind of mark as the one on her chin in a place which, modest as she was, she could never have let anyone see, and that she might not even know herself that she had it. Strong in this certainty, I decided to astonish her by answering a question of the kind in exactly these words: "Beautiful and discreet Esther, no one knows that you have a mark exactly like the one at the bottom of your chin on the most secret place in your body consecrated only to love."

Esther did not need a translation, for as the numbers came from my pen she read them as if they had been letters. She said calmly and serenely that, since I did not need to know what the answer said, I would be doing her a favor if I left it to her.

"Gladly. I even promise you I will never be curious about it. I am satisfied if you are convinced."

"I shall be convinced when I find that what it says is true."

"Do you think I do not know the thing the answer says?"

"I shall be sure you do not know it when I find that what it says is true; but if it is true the oracle will be justified. The thing is so secret that I do not even know it myself. There is no occasion for your knowing it. It is a trifle which cannot interest you, but enough to convince me that the oracle is animated by an intelligence which has nothing to do with your mind."

Unfeigned feeling, driving out deceit, softened me to the point of shedding some tears, which Esther could only interpret to my advantage. They came from my remorse. I loved her, nevertheless I deceived her; but, admitting my guilt, I could only like myself the less, and that avenged her.

Yet I was not entirely sure that what my oracle had told Esther would convince her of its divinity. She could not but be convinced for the moment; but she might cease to be so if she ever learned that the correspondence between marks on the human body was natural and necessary, and with that her conviction would not only disappear but be replaced by contempt. This fear put me in agony, for love loses heart as soon as it discovers that the object it loves is unworthy of its esteem.

After dinner I took leave of her to call on Rigerboos and thank him for what he had done for me with the Police Magistrate. As for Piccolomini's threat, he advised me to go armed with pistols against anything that might happen to me and to fear nothing in Holland. He said he was about to leave for Batavia on a ship of which he owned the entire cargo and was putting all his money into it, that in the ruinous state of his affairs it was the only resource left to him. He was making the voyage without insuring the ship, which would double his profit. If it was captured or shipwrecked he would perish too; so he could lose nothing. He laughed as he told me all this, but he could not talk in such a fashion unless he was in despair. My dear old friend Teresa Trenti[28] had contributed in no small measure to his ruin. She was in London, where, according to what she wrote us, she was doing well. Instead of Trenti she now called herself Cornelys. This was Rigerboos's name,[29] though I had not known it until then. We spent an hour writing to that most unusual woman, a man whom Rigerboos was commending to her good offices being about to leave for London. After that we went sleighing at top speed on the frozen Amstel. This amusement, so much enjoyed by the Dutch and in my opinion so boring, cost a ducat an hour. After that we went to eat oysters, and then we stopped in at musicaus, one after another, with no idea of indulging in debauchery; but this is what happened. It was decreed that every time I preferred certain diversions to Esther's society some misfortune would befall me.

As we entered one musicau Rigerboos inadvertently called me by my name; at the same moment I saw one of the strumpets who are always to be found in these filthy bordellos come up and look at me closely, and despite the dim light which lit the stinking room I at once recognized Lucia, whom I had also seen in another place of the same kind a year earlier[30] and who had not recognized me. I turned away, but it was no use; she came closer, spoke to me sadly, reminded me who she was, saying that she was as happy to see me in such a flourishing condition as I must be sad to see what she had become. I condoled with her, and I called to my friend and invited him to go to a room upstairs with me, where the girl would entertain us by telling her story. Lucia had not become actually ugly, but something worse—repulsive. In the nineteen years which had passed since I saw her at Pasiano every kind of debauchery had made her so. She told a very short story at great length. The courier L'Aigle[31] had taken her to lie in at Trieste, where he had remained for five or six months afterward, living on her. A ship's captain who had fallen in love with her persuaded the courier, who passed for her husband, to take her with him to Zante,[32] where he was going for merchandise. At Zante the courier had enlisted and four years later had deserted, leaving her stranded; she stayed there five or six more years, living on what her charms brought her. She had left Zante with a very pretty girl with whom an English naval officer had fallen in love and had gone to England, which she had left two or three years later for Holland, where I saw her. Aside from her mother tongue she had a smattering of Greek, English, French, and Dutch. She emptied two bottles during the hour she spent telling us her sad story, she told us she lived on what some pretty girls she was keeping earned, they being obliged to give her half. Her beauty having vanished, her only resource had been to become a bawd; it was the classic ending; but poor Lucia was only thirty-three; however, she looked fifty, and a woman's age is exactly the age she looks.

Rigerboos asked her if the girls who lived with her were at the musicau, and she answered that they were not and that they would never come there, for they were young ladies of good birth who lived with their uncle, who was a Venetian gentleman. At that I burst out laughing. Lucia said that she was only telling me what they had told her and that if we wanted to see them they were only fifty paces away in a house she rented; we could go there without apprehension, for their uncle slept in another part of the city. He only came to dinner to learn what acquaintances they had made and to collect the money they had earned. Rigerboos declared that we must go to see them, and being very curious to speak with some noble Venetian ladies, I told Lucia to take us there. I knew very well that they could only be whores, that their uncle must be a complete rascal, but there was nothing for it but to go.

I see two quite pretty girls. Lucia announces me as a Venetian; at which they are beside themselves with surprise and delighted to see someone with whom they can talk. I know at once from their dialect that they are Paduans, I tell them so, they admit it; I ask them their uncle's name, and they say there are good reasons why they cannot tell me. Rigerboos says that we can do without knowing and takes the one he finds most to his taste. Lucia orders up oysters, ham, a quantity of bottles, and retires to her room. I did not feel like playing the fool; but Rigerboos wants to laugh and be rowdy; they try to play the prude, he banters them, I follow his lead, they decide to give in, and after putting them in a state of nature we proceed, often changing partners, to do to them whatever animality suggests to those who go to such places only for something to laugh at. After three or four hours we pay and leave. I privately give poor Lucia six ducats. The girls got four ducats each, which in Holland is very good pay. We leave and go to our lodgings to sleep.

The next morning I wake up very late and in a bad humor, partly from the debauch of the previous night, which always leaves the soul sad—adfigit humo ("fastens to earth")[33]—partly because of Esther, who must have been expecting me. I was to go there for dinner, it was a regular arrangement, but I shall not want for excuses;

I ring for Leduc to dress me. He goes down to fetch my coffee. I see La Perrine come in, with the so-called Wiedau whom I had seen at Piccolomini's and who said he was a friend of the Count of Saint-Germain, the adept. I was sitting on the bed putting on my stockings. I had three fine rooms, but they were at the back of the house, where, if I had made an outcry, no one would have heard me; I had a bell near the fireplace, which was at the other end of the room; it would be at least a quarter of an hour before Leduc came back with my coffee, I saw almost nothing for it but to let myself be murdered. It was Wiedau who began, telling me that to get out of his difficulty Count Piccolomini had accused them of having given him the bill of exchange in question, and that he had warned them he had done so.

"Our safety demands that we leave at once, and we have no money; we are desperate. Give us only four hundred florins immediately, that will be enough—but immediately and without arguing. Otherwise we will make our escape on foot; but not until we have taken what we see over there; and this is what will persuade you." So saying each of the two robbers draws two pistols from his pockets.

"Violence," I said, "is not necessary. Here you are—and I wish you a good journey."

I take from my breeches pocket a roll of a hundred ducats, I say I do not care about the extra hundred and twenty florins, and I advise them to go before my valet comes up. Wiedau takes it, his hand shaking, puts it in his pocket without even opening it, and La Perrine, always the Gascon,[34] comes over to me and, praising me for my magnanimity, embraces me. After which the two scoundrels make for the door and leave. I consider myself very fortunate to have escaped from the danger so cheaply. I ring repeatedly, not to have them followed but to be dressed quickly, letting my toilet go by the board and stopping neither to inform Leduc of the incident nor to complain to the host of what has happened to me in his inn. After ordering Leduc to go to Monsieur D. O.'s and present my apologies for being unable to dine with him, I go to the Police Magistrate, for whom I have to wait two hours. After hearing my story the worthy man said he would do everything in his power to have the robbers arrested, but that he feared it was too late. I told him that Piccolomini had come to see me, and after giving him a full account of all that he had wanted me to do, I told him he had threatened that I would be sorry. He assured me he would see to it. After that I went home, with a very bitter taste in my mouth, to make my toilet and catch my breath. A lemonade without sugar made me vomit a great deal of bile. I went to Monsieur D. O.'s about nightfall and found Esther serious and looking a little offended; but she changed her attitude when she saw that I looked discomposed.

"Tell me, quick—quick—" she said, "if you have been ill, and I shall feel relieved."

"Yes, my dear, and worse than ill; but now I am perfectly well; you will see it at supper, for I have eaten nothing since dinner yesterday."

It was true; I had eaten only some oysters with the Paduan hussies. The charming Esther invited me to embrace her, and unworthy though I was, I assured her of my affection.

"The news I can tell you," she said, "is that I am sure you are not the author of your oracle, or at least that, like me, you are so only when you wish to be. The answer it gave me is correct, and correct to the point of being divine. It told me something that no one could know, since I did not know it myself. You cannot imagine how surprised I was when I discovered this truth. You are in possession of a treasure; your oracle is infallible; but if it is infallible, it must never lie about anything; it tells me that you love me, and that makes me rejoice, for you are the man of my heart; but I need a proof of your love which, if it is true that you love me, you cannot refuse me. Here, read your answer, I am sure you do not know what it says. Afterward I will tell you what you must do to make Esther perfectly happy."

I read, pretending that I am reading it for the first time. I kiss the words of the oracle which said that I loved her, I express my delight that the answer has convinced her so easily, then I ask her to forgive me if I cannot believe that such a thing was unknown to her. She replies, blushing slightly, that I would not think it impossible if it was allowable for her to convince me. Then, coming to the proof she demanded to assure her that I loved her, she said I must tell her my secret.

"You love me," she said, "and you cannot object to making a girl happy who will very soon be your wife and whose master you will become. My father will consent. When I am your wife I will do whatever you ask; we will even go to live somewhere else if you wish; but all this will never happen until you have taught me how to obtain an answer without first going to the trouble of making it up in my own head."

I took her beautiful hands and, kissing them, I said that she knew I was bound to keep my promise to a girl in Paris who certainly could not be compared to her, but that, even so, I was no less obliged to keep it. Alas! Could I give her a better excuse, since I could not teach her a different method of consulting the oracle than the one she used?

Two or three days later an officer was announced to me by a name which I did not know; I sent him word that I was occupied and, my valet being out, I locked my door. After all that had happened to me I had determined to receive no one. The police had failed to catch up with the two robbers who had tried to murder me, and Piccolomini had vanished; but there were still members of their gang in Amsterdam.

An hour later Leduc comes back and hands me a letter written in bad Italian, which had been given him by an officer who was waiting for the answer. I saw that it was signed by the same name which I did not know. He wrote that we were acquainted, but that he could only tell me his name in private and that he had come to see me only for my own good.

I told Leduc to show him in and to remain in my room. I see a man of my stature, forty years of age, wearing a military uniform, and with the look of a gallows bird.

He begins by telling me that we had met in Cerigo sixteen or seventeen years earlier.[35] I then remember that I had gone ashore there for a short time when I was accompanying the Bailo[36] to Constantinople, and that the man must be one of the two poor wretches to whom I had given alms. I asked him if it was he who had told me he was the son of a Count Pocchini,[37] of Padua, who was not a Count, and he congratulated me on my good memory. I ask him what he has to say to me, and he answers that he cannot speak in my servant's presence. I tell him to speak in Italian, and I order Leduc to wait in the antechamber.

He then tells me that he has learned I had visited his nieces, that I had treated them like whores, and so he insists that I give him satisfaction. Weary of being pestered, I run for my pistols and, aiming one of them at him, I order him to leave. Leduc comes running, and the scoundrel makes off, saying that he will find me somewhere.

Ashamed to go and complain to the Police Magistrate, to whom I should have had to tell the whole scandalous story, I merely reported the matter to my friend Rigerboos, leaving it to him. The result of his intervention was that the police ordered Lucia to get rid of the two Countesses. Lucia herself came the next morning to tell me, with tears in her eyes, the story of the police action, which reduced her to destitution again. I gave her six sequins and she left in better spirits. I asked her not to come to visit me again. Everything I did away from Esther turned out disastrously for me.

It was the perfidious Major Saby who, three days later, came to tell me to be on my guard because a Venetian officer who claimed that I had dishonored him was saying everywhere that since he had vainly asked me to give him satisfaction he had the right to murder me. He said he was desperate, that he wanted to leave, and that he had no money.

When I think of all the annoyances to which I was subjected during the short time of my second stay in Amsterdam, when I could have been living there perfectly happily, I conclude that we are always the first cause of our misfortunes.

"I advise you," Saby went on, "to give the wretch fifty florins and so rid yourself of an enemy."

I agreed, and I gave them to him at noon in a coffeehouse which the Major named to me. My reader will see where I met him again four months later.

Monsieur D. O. invited me to sup with him at the Burgomaster's Lodge. It was a great favor, for, contrary to all the usual rules of Freemasonry, no one was admitted there except the twenty-four members who composed it. They were the richest millionaires on the Exchange. He said that he had announced my coming, and that in compliment to me the Lodge would be opened in French. I made such a good impression that I was declared a supernumerary for as long as I should stay in Amsterdam. Monsieur D. O. told me the next day that I had supped with a company which could command three hundred millions.

The next day Monsieur D. O. asked me to do him the favor of obtaining the answer to a question which, saving his daughter's presence, her oracle had answered too obscurely. Esther urged me to comply. He asked the oracle: Was the man who was trying to persuade him and his associates to enter into a transaction of the utmost consequence really a friend of the King of France?

I instantly see that the man can be no one except the Count of Saint-Germain. Monsieur D. O. was not aware that I knew him. I could not help remembering what Count d'Affry had told me. Here was the opportunity to add luster to my oracle and give my charming Esther something to think about.

After framing the question in a pyramid and writing above the four keys the letters O S A D, all only to impress her the more, I extract the answer, beginning with the fourth key, D. Here it is:

"The friend disavows. The order is signed. It is granted. It is refused. Everything disappears. Delay."

I immediately pretend to find my answer very obscure. Esther, surprised, concludes that it says a great deal in a strange style. Monsieur D. O. says that it is clear to him, and he calls the oracle "divine."

"The word 'delay,' " he says, "is directed to me. You are both clever, you and my daughter, at obtaining oracles, but in interpreting them I am cleverer than you. I shall stop everything. The project is to pay out a hundred millions against the pledge of the French crown diamonds. It is a transaction which the King wants to complete without his ministers' having a hand in it or even knowing of it. So I beg you to mention it to no one."

As soon as Esther was alone with me she said that for once she was certain that this last answer did not come out of my head, and she begged me to tell her what the four letters meant and why I usually omitted them. I replied that I omitted them because experience had taught me that they were not necessary, but that since writing them was enjoined as part of constructing the pyramid I added them when I thought there was a special need for it.

"What do the four letters mean?"

"They are the initials of the ineffable names of the four cardinal intelligences of the earth. It is forbidden to utter them, but anyone who wishes to receive the oracle must know them."

"Ah, my dear friend, do not deceive me, for I believe everything, and since my good faith is divine, it is murder to abuse it. Then you would have to tell me the four ineffable names if you should teach me the cabala?"

"Certainly. And I cannot reveal them except to the person whom I make my heir. Breaking that command is punished by forgetting. Admit, beautiful Esther, that the threat must make me afraid."

"I admit it. Alas for me! Your heir will be your Manon."

"No. She does not have a mind capable of this art."

"Yet you must decide on someone, for you are mortal. My father will give you half of his fortune without obliging you to marry me."

"Alas! What have you said? As if the condition that I must marry you could be irksome to me!"

Three or four days later at ten o'clock in the morning Monsieur D. O. comes hurrying into Esther's room where she was working with me at learning how to operate the oracle by all the four keys and to double, triple, and quadruple it at will. Surprised by his excitement, we rise, he embraces us again and again, he tells us to embrace each other.

"What is this, my adorable Papa?"

He makes us sit down on either side of him and he reads us a letter he has just received from Monsieur Calkoen,[38] one of the secretaries to Their High Power.[39]

The letter said in substance that the French Ambassador, in the name of the King his master, had demanded that the States-General deliver over the pretended Count of Saint-Germain and that he had been answered that the person so named would be delivered to His Most Christian Majesty[40] as soon as he was found. In consequence of this promise, the letter went on, it having been discovered that the person sought was lodging at the "Star of the East," officers had been sent to the inn to take him into custody, but they had not found him. The innkeeper said that the Count had left at nightfall, taking the road to Nijmegen. He was being pursued, but there was no hope of catching up with him. It was not known how he had managed to discover that the order had been given and thus escape his doom.

"It is not known," said Monsieur D. O. with a laugh, "but everybody knows it. Monsieur Calkoen himself must have informed this friend of the King of France that a search would be made for him at midnight and that he would be seized if he let himself be found. He was not such a fool. The government will tell the Ambassador it is very sorry His Excellency delayed too long before asking for the person; and the answer will be no surprise to him, for it is the one which is always given in such cases. All the words of the oracle have been verified. We were on the verge of paying him the one hundred thousand florins which he required at once. The pledge was the finest of the crown diamonds, which remains in our hands, but which we will return to him as soon as he appears to claim it, unless the Ambassador demands it. I have never seen a finer stone. You now see the nature of the great debt I owe to your oracle. I am going at once to the Exchange, where the whole Company will express its gratitude to me. After dinner I will entreat you to ask whether we should declare that we have this fine diamond or had better remain silent."

After this magnanimous discourse he again embraced us and then left.

"Now is the time," said Esther, "when you could give me the greatest proof of friendship you can give me, which will cost you nothing and will fill my cup with honor and happiness."

"Command me, my angel, how could I refuse you what will cost me nothing?"

"After dinner my father will want to know if the return of the diamond will be demanded, or if the Company would do better to announce that it is in their custody before they are summoned to produce it. Tell him to apply to me for the answer, and offer to ask the question yourself as well, if my answer is obscure. Put the question now, and I will answer in exactly your words. My father will love me all the better."

"Oh, my dear Esther! Would that I could do far more to assure you of my friendship! Come, let us begin at once."

I insist that she frame the question herself, that she put the four puissant letters in their place with her own hand, and I make her begin her answer by using the divine key. Then, after performing the additions and subtractions which I suggest, she is amazed to obtain the following answer: "The Company would do better to say nothing, for all Europe would laugh at it. The supposed diamond is only paste."

I thought the charming girl would go mad for joy. She was choking with laughter.

"What an answer!" she said. "The diamond is false. How stupid of them to let themselves be taken in! And it is from my oracle that my dear papa will learn this! And it is you who give me such a present! It will be verified at once, and finding that the stone is false, the grave and reverend Company will be under the greatest obligation to my father, for actually it is on the verge of dishonor. Can you leave me the pyramid?"

"I leave it with you very gladly, but it will not help you to learn more than you already know."

The scene became comic after dinner when the worthy Monsieur D. O. learned from his daughter's oracle that the stone was false. He burst into incredulous exclamations. He thought it unbelievable; and he asked me to put the same question, and when he saw the same answer come out, though in different words, he left to have the diamond submitted to every test and to advise silence when the truth was discovered. But his advice proved useless. Everyone heard the story, and people said, as they were bound to say, though it was not true, that the Company had fallen into the snare and given the impostor the hundred thousand florins he had demanded.

Esther was very proud; but her longing to possess the science of the oracle as she was convinced I possessed it became extreme. Word arrived that Saint-Germain had gone to Emden and then to England. I shall return to him at the proper place. But now for the blow which fell on me out of the blue on Christmas Day[41] and which nearly killed me.

I received a large package from Paris with a letter from Manon which read as follows:

"Be reasonable and receive the news I send you calmly. This package contains all your letters and your portrait. Return my portrait to me, and if you still have my letters burn them. I count on your honor. Think of me no more. On my side I will do all that lies in my power to forget you. Tomorrow[42] at this hour I shall be the wife of Monsieur Blondel,[43] Architect to the King and member of his Academy.[44] You will greatly oblige me if, when you return to Paris, you will pretend not to know me wherever you may meet with me."

Her letter left me in consternation after depriving me of thought for two full hours. I sent word to Monsieur D. O. that as I was not well I would stay in my room all day. I open the packet and, looking at my portrait, I think I behold a prodigy. My countenance, which had been cheerful before, now seems threatening and angry. I began writing to the faithless girl, each time tearing up my letter as soon as I had finished it. At ten o'clock I took a bowl of soup, then I went back to bed; but I could not sleep. Countless plans, no sooner formed than rejected. I decided to go to Paris and kill this Blondel whom I did not know and who had dared to marry a girl who belonged to me and whom everyone believed to be my wife. I raged at her father and at her brother, who had not written the news to me. The next morning I sent word to Monsieur D. O. that I was still ill. I spent the whole day now writing, now reading over the faithless girl's letters. My empty stomach sent vapors to my brain which prostrated me; when I recovered I raved, talking to myself in fits of rage which lacerated my soul.

At three o'clock Monsieur D. O. came to urge me to go with him to The Hague, where on the next day, which was St. John's Day,[45] all the notable Freemasons of Holland were to assemble; but he did not insist when he saw the state I was in.

"What is the trouble with you?"

"A great grief; I beg you not to ask me more."

He left in distress, asking me to see his daughter. I saw her appear before me the next morning with her governess. Astonished to see me so undone, she wanted to know what the grief was which my mind could not conquer. I asked her to sit down and not to insist on my talking of it, assuring her that her mere presence was enough to keep my sorrow from increasing.

"As long as we talk of other things, my dear friend, I will not think of the misfortune which crushes my soul."

"Get dressed and come and spend the day with me."

"Since Christmas Eve I have lived on nothing but chocolate and a few bowls of broth. I am very weak."

At that I saw alarm on her charming countenance.

A moment later she wrote a few lines and handed them to me to read. She said that if a large sum of money, aside from the amount her father owed me, could lighten my grief, she could be my doctor. I answered, after kissing her hand, that what I lacked was not money but a mind strong enough to make a decision. She then said that I should turn to my oracle, and I could not help laughing.

"How can you laugh at it?" she said, with admirable logic. "It seems to me that the cure for your sorrow must be perfectly well known to it."

"I laughed, my angel, because, oddly enough, it was in my mind to tell you that it was you who should consult your oracle. I will tell you that I do not consult mine because I am afraid it will suggest a remedy which I should like even less than the sorrow which afflicts me."

"You could always refuse to employ it."

"If I did that I should fail in the respect which I owe the intelligence."

I saw that my answer overwhelmed her. A moment later she asked me if I would like to have her stay with me all day. I answered that if she would stay for dinner I would get up, I would have three places set at a small table, and I would certainly eat. I saw that she was pleased and happy; she said she would prepare salt cod [46] at the table just as I liked it, and cutlets and oysters. After telling her governess to send their sedan chair home, she went to the hostess's room to order a choice dinner and the stove and the alcohol she needed to cook her little ragouts on the table.

Such was Esther. She was a treasure who was willing to be mine, but on condition that I give her my treasure, which I could not give her. Feeling cheered by the idea that I was to spend the whole day with her, I became certain I could begin to forget Manon. I used the time to get out of bed. When she came back she was delighted to see me up. She begged me with the most enchanting cajoleries to have my hair done and to dress as if I were going to a ball. Her sudden whim made me laugh. She said it would amuse us. I called Leduc and, telling him that I was going to a ball, ordered him to fetch a suitable coat from my trunk, and when he asked me which one Esther said she would choose it. Leduc opened the trunk and, leaving her to her own devices, came to shave me and dress my hair. Happy in her role, Esther made her governess help her lay out on the bed a ruffled shirt and the coat she liked best among my stock. I took a second bowl of broth, of which I felt the need, and I foresaw that I should spend a pleasant day. I began to think that I did not hate Manon but felt contempt for her; analyzing this new feeling gave me hope and renewed my old courage.

I was by the fire letting Leduc dress my hair and enjoying the pleasure which Esther, whom I could not see, was taking in her occupation, when I see her before me, sad and uncertain, holding the letter in which Manon gave me my dismissal.

"Am I to blame," she said timidly, "if I have discovered the cause of your grief?"

"No, my dear. Pity me and let us say no more about it."

"Then may I read them all?"

"All, if you like. You will only pity me the more."

All of the faithless girl's letters and all mine were arranged by date on the night table. Esther fell to reading. As soon as I was dressed and we were alone, for her governess was making lace and never joined in our conversation, Esther said that nothing she had read had ever interested her as much as these letters.

"These accursed letters," I replied, "will be the death of me. After dinner you shall help me burn them all, even the one which orders me to burn them."

"Give them to me instead; they shall never leave my hands."

"I will bring them to you tomorrow."

There were more than two hundred [47] of them, and the shortest were four pages long. Delighted to have been given them, she said she would gather them together at once and take them home that evening. She asked me if I would send her back her portrait, and I answered that I did not know what to do with it.

"Send it back to her," said Esther indignantly; "I am sure your oracle will give you the same advice. Where is it? May I see it?"

I had her portrait inside a gold snuffbox which I had never shown her for fear that, finding Manon was the prettier, she would suppose I was only showing it to her from a vanity which could not but be injurious to me. I quickly opened my jewel case and handed her the snuffbox. Any other woman but Esther would have found Manon ugly or at least thought she must pretend to find her so; but Esther praised her to me, saying only that the girl's base soul did not deserve to have such a pretty body.

She then wanted to see all the portraits I had, which Signora Manzoni had sent me from Venice, as my reader may remember. There were some nudes, but Esther did not play the prude. O-Morphi[48] delighted her, and she thought her history, which I told her in full, most curious. The portrait of M. M. as a nun and then stark naked made her laugh; she wanted to know the story, but I excused myself. We sat down to dinner and spent two hours over it. Passing very rapidly from death to life, I dined with the greatest possible appetite; Esther kept congratulating herself on having had the skill to be my doctor. Before we rose from the table I promised her I would send Manon's portrait to her husband the next day, and Esther at once approved of my resolve; but an hour later she put a question to the oracle, writing O S A D above the keys and asking if I ought to send her portrait back to the jilt. She calculated, she computed, she added, all the while telling me, though with a smile, that she was certainly not making up the answer, and she extracted the command that I should return the portrait, but to herself, and not commit the base act of sending it to her husband.

I praised her, I embraced her again and again, I told her I would obey the oracle's command, and I ended by congratulating her on no longer needing me to teach her the science, since she was already in full possession of it. At that Esther laughed and, fearing that I really believed it, was at pains to assure me of the contrary. It is in such toying that love delights and in a very little time grows gigantic.

"Should I be too curious," she said, "if I asked you where your portrait is? She says in her letter that she is sending it back to you."

"In my anger I threw it I don't know where. You must realize that such an object, so scorned, can give me no pleasure."

"Let us look for it, my dear friend, I should like to see it."

We found it at once beside some books I had on my bureau. Esther, in astonishment, says that it is a speaking likeness; I think I may go so far as to offer it to her, declaring, however, that it is unworthy of such an honor; and she accepts it with demonstrations of the most vehement gratitude. I spent one of those days with her which we may call happy, if we make happiness consist in a reciprocal and tranquil satisfaction, with none of the violence of aroused passion. She left at ten o'clock, after I promised her I would spend all the next day with her.

After nine hours of the kind of sleep which amazes us when we wake because we seem not to have slept at all, I called on Esther, who was still sleeping but whom her governess insisted on waking. She received me sitting up in bed, all smiles, and pointing to my correspondence, over which she had spent the greater part of the night. She let me kiss her rose and lily face, preventing my hands from touching her alabaster bosom, a third of which dazzled me, but not keeping my eyes from gazing on its beauty. I sat down by her knees, praising her charms and her intelligence, both of a quality to cast a thousand Manons into oblivion. She asked me if her whole body was beautiful, and I answered that, not having become her husband, I had no idea, and she smiled and praised my discretion.

"However," I said, "I learned from her nurse that her figure was perfect and that no blemish broke either the whiteness or the smoothness of her hidden parts."

"You must have a different idea of me," said Esther.

"Yes, my angel, for the oracle let me into a great secret; but that does not keep me from believing you are perfectly beautiful everywhere. If I were your husband I could easily refrain from touching you there."

"Then you think," she said blushing and a little aggrieved, "that by touching me there you would feel something which might lessen your desires?"

At this thrust, which unmasked me completely, I felt overwhelmed with shame of the most painful kind. I begged her to forgive me, and the force of feeling made me shed a few tears on her beautiful hands, to which she responded in kind. Both of us burning with the same fire, we would have seized the occasion to yield to our desires if prudence had permitted. We enjoyed only a sweet ecstasy followed by a calm which made us reflect on the sweet enjoyments which it was in our power to procure. Three hours passed very quickly. She told me to go into her sitting room so that she could dress. We dined with the secretary, whom she did not like and who could not but be very jealous of my good fortune.

We spent the rest of the day together in the confidences which are exchanged when the first foundations of the most intimate tenderness are laid between two persons of different sex who feel that they are born for each other. We were still on fire; but in her sitting room Esther was not as free as in her bedchamber. I went home to my lodging well satisfied with my position. I thought I saw that she might decide to become my wife without demanding that I teach her what I could not teach. I regretted that I had not left her to believe her mastery was as great as mine, and I felt that it was no longer possible for me to show her that I had deceived her and still obtain her forgiveness. Yet only Esther could make me forget Manon, whom I already began to think unworthy of all that I had meant to do for her.

Monsieur D. O. having returned, I went to dine with him. He had been glad to learn that his daughter had cured me by spending a whole day with me. When we were alone he told us he had learned at The Hague that the Count of Saint-Germain had the secret of making diamonds which differed from real ones only in weight, which, however, was no bar to his acquiring great wealth through this art alone. I should have made him laugh heartily if I could have told him all I knew about the man.

The next day I took Esther to the concert. She said that on the following day she would not leave her room and that we could talk about our marriage. It was the last day of the year 1759.[49]

CHAPTER II

I enlighten Esther. I leave for Germany. My adventure near Cologne. The Burgomaster's wife; I conquer her. Ball at Bonn. Welcome from the Elector of Cologne. Luncheon at Brühl. First intimacy. I sup uninvited at General Kettler's. I am happy. My departure from Cologne. La Toscani. The jewel. My arrival at Stuttgart.

January 1, 1760.

THIS MEETING with Esther could not but have consequences. Love had summoned me to it, and Honor must be of the party. I went, determined not to deceive the angelic girl and certain that I would not fail in my resolve. I found her in bed. She said she would stay there all day and that we would work. Her governess brought us a small table, and she placed before me several questions, all intended to convince me that, before becoming her husband, I should impart my science to her. They were all of a tenor which would oblige the intelligence either to command or forbid me to satisfy her. I could do neither, for a prohibition might have irked her to the point of losing any inclination to grant me her favors. I got out of it by equivocal answers until Monsieur D. O. came to summon me to dinner. He allowed his daughter to remain in bed, but on condition that she would spend the rest of the day without working, for intellectual effort could only increase her headache. She promised, and I was greatly relieved.

Leaving the table, I returned to her room and found her asleep. I felt I should respect her slumbers; but when she woke, reading the heroid[1] of Eloise and Abelard set us on fire. The conversation turning to the secret which the oracle had revealed to her and which could be known only to herself, she allowed my hand to search for it, and when she saw me doubtful because it could not be felt she made up her mind to expose it to view. It was no bigger than a millet seed. She let me kiss it until I lost my breath.

After spending two hours in amorous toyings without ever coming to the great act, which she was right to refuse me, I resolved to tell her the truth, although I saw that after two confessed false confidences the third might well revolt her.

Esther, who was infinitely intelligent and whom I could never have deceived if she had been less so, heard me without surprise, without interrupting me, and without the slightest trace of anger. At the end of my confession she replied that, being sure that I loved her and finding this last confidence obviously false, she was convinced that my reason for not teaching her to operate the cabala was that it did not lie in my power, and hence she would no longer urge me to do what I could not or would not.

"And so," she said, "let us be good friends until death and say no more on the subject. I forgive you, and I am sorry for you if love deprived you of the courage to be sincere. You have convinced me of your science only too well. That is over and done with. You could never have known a thing which concerned only me, and which I myself did not know."

"My dear, don't let your logic run away with you.

You did not know you had the mark, and I knew you had it.''

``You knew it? How did you find out? It is incredible.''

``I will tell you all.''

I thereupon expounded to her the whole theory of the correspondence between the signs on the human body, ending by astonishing and convincing her when I said I was certain that her governess, who had a large mole on her right cheek, must have one like it on her left thigh.

``I will find out,'' she said; ``but I am surprised that you alone possess this knowledge.''

``The thing is well known, my charming friend, to everyone acquainted with anatomy, physiology, and even astrology, a chimerical science when it is carried to the point of finding the causes of all our actions in the stars.''

``Then tomorrow, tomorrow and no later, bring me books in which I can find out many such things. I cannot wait to become learned and able to astonish the ignorant with my numerical cabala, for any science without charlatanry never impresses them. I will devote myself to study. Let us love each other, my dear friend, until death. We need not marry to do that.''

I returned to my inn well satisfied and as if relieved of a great burden. The next day I brought her all the books I could find which were sure to entertain her. There were good ones and bad, but I warned her of that. My Conics[2] pleased her because she saw that it bore the stamp of truth. Wanting to shine with the help of the oracle, she needed to become a good natural scientist, and I set her on the right road. I then decided to make a little journey in Germany before returning to Paris; and she approved my plan, very glad when I assured her that I would see her again before the end of the year. But though I did not see her again I cannot reproach myself with having deceived her, for everything that happened to me prevented me from keeping my promise.

I wrote to Monsieur d'Affry, asking him to send me a passport which I needed because I wanted to make a trip through the Empire, where the French and all the then belligerent powers were campaigning.[3] He replied very politely that I did not need one, but that if I insisted he would send it to me. His letter was enough. I put it in my portfolio, and at Cologne it gave me more standing than a passport.

I transferred to Monsieur D. O. all the money I had in the hands of several bankers. He gave me a circular letter of credit drawn on ten or twelve of the most prominent firms in Germany. So I left in my post chaise, for which I had sent to Moerdijk, with nearly a hundred thousand Dutch florins at my disposal, with plenty of valuable jewels and rings, and richly turned out in every respect. I sent back to Paris a Swiss lackey with whom I had started out, keeping only Leduc, who sat behind.

Such is the whole story of my second short stay in Holland, where I accomplished nothing to better my fortune. I had troubles there, but when I remember them I conclude that love made up to me for everything.

I stopped at Utrecht for only a day to see the estate[4] belonging to the Herrnhuters;[5] and on the next day but one I reached Cologne at noon; but half an hour before I arrived there five deserters, three on my right and two on my left, aimed at me, demanding my purse. My postilion, threatened with death by a pistol in my hand, gave his horse both spurs, and the murderers fired their muskets at me, but they harmed only my carriage. They did not have the sense to fire at the postilion. If I had carried two purses, as the English do, the lighter one being intended for bold robbers, I should have thrown it to the wretches; but since I had only one, and it very well stocked, I risked my life to save it. My Spaniard was amazed that the balls, which he had heard whistling past his head, had not touched him. At Cologne the French were in winter quarters.[6] I found lodgings at the "Sign of the Sun."[7] Entering the public room, I saw the Count of Lastic,[8] Madame d'Urfé's nephew, who after making me all the usual offers took me to see Monsieur de Torcy,[9] who was the Commandant. Instead of a passport I showed him Monsieur d'Affry's letter, and no more was needed. When I told him what had just befallen me he congratulated me on my good luck, but he blamed me in no uncertain terms for the display I had made of my courage. He said that if I was in no hurry to leave I should perhaps see them hanged; but I wanted to leave the next day.

I had to dine with Monsieur de Lastic and Monsieur de Flavacourt,[10] who together persuaded me to go to the theater.[11] So I had to dress, for I was sure to be introduced to ladies and I wanted to make an impression.

Having taken a place on the stage[12] and seen a pretty woman turn her lorgnette on me, I asked Monsieur de Lastic to introduce me, and between the first and second acts he took me to her box, where he began by naming me to Count von Kettler,[13] Lieutenant-General in the Austrian service who was attached to the French army, as the French Monsieur de Montazet[14] was to the Austrian. Immediately afterward he introduced me to the lady, who at once struck me. She first asked me questions about Paris, then about Brussels, where she had been brought up, though she did not seem to listen to my answers. My laces, my watch charms, my rings, distracted her attention.

Changing the subject, as if she had suddenly remembered it was her duty to inquire, she asked me if I would spend some days in Cologne, and she pretended to be hurt when I answered that I expected to dine in Bonn the next day. General Kettler then rose, saying that he was sure the beautiful lady could persuade me to put off my departure; and he went out with Lastic, leaving me alone with the interesting beauty. She was the wife of Burgomaster X,[15] and Count Kettler was always with her.

"Is he wrong," she said invitingly, "to be certain I have that power?"

"I do not think so, but he might be wrong in thinking that you would wish to use it."

"Excellent. Then we must trap him, if only to punish him for his indiscretion. Stay."

This unfamiliar language left me gaping. I had to recollect myself. Could I expect such terminology in Cologne? I thought "indiscretion" sublime, "punishment" perfectly apt, "trap" delicious, and the idea of my being the instrument of the trapping struck me as divine. It would have been stupid to inquire further. Assuming a submissive and grateful air, I indicated my obedience by bending over her hand and kissing it.

"Then you will stay, and it is very kind of you, for if you left tomorrow it would seem that you had come here only to affront us. The General is giving a ball tomorrow, and you shall dance with us."

"Dare I flatter myself, Madame, that I shall not share the honor of escorting you in all the contradances with anyone else?"

"I will dance with someone else only when you are tired."

"That is, when I drop dead."

"But where did you get that pomade which perfumes the air? You were on the stage and I smelled it."

"It comes from Florence, and if it goes to your head I will at once have my hair dressed again."

"Good Heavens, that would be murder! Such a pomade would make me completely happy."

"And you will make me so if you will permit me to send you twelve jars of it tomorrow."

The General's return prevented her from answering. I rose to leave.

"I am sure," he said, "that you have put off your departure. Madame has made you promise to sup and dance at my house tomorrow. Has she not?"

"She has led me to hope, General, that you would do me so much honor, and that I shall have the honor of dancing the contradances with her. How could I leave after that?"

"You are right. I will expect you."

I left the box in love and already happy in imagination, and went back to the stage, where the scent of my pomade won me compliments from all the young officers. It was a present from Esther, and this was the first time I had used it. The box contained twenty-four jars; I took out twelve and sent it to her at nine o'clock the next morning, wrapped in waxed cloth and sealed, and addressed to her as if it came from a merchant.

I spent the morning having a hired servant show me the wonders of Cologne, all of them heroi-comic. I laughed when I saw the statue of the steed Bayard,[16] which Ariosto has made so famous, ridden by the four sons of "Aymon."[17] He was Duke Amone, father of the invincible Bradamante and the fortunate Ricciardetto.

All the guests at Monsieur de Castries's,[18] where I dined, were surprised that General Kettler had himself invited me to his ball, since he was extremely jealous of his lady, who only put up with him to feed her vanity. He was advanced in years, with a repulsive face and no qualities of mind which gave him any claim to inspire love. However, he had to resign himself to my sitting beside her at his supper and spending the whole night either talking or dancing with her. I returned to my lodging so much in love that I gave up all thought of leaving. In a moment of fervor I made bold to tell her that if she would promise me a meeting alone I would stay in Cologne for the whole Carnival.[19]

"And if after I promised," she answered, "I failed you, what would you say?"

"I would lament my fate in solitude and say that you had been unable to keep your word."

"You are kind. Stay with us."

On the next day but one after the ball I made her my first visit and she introduced her husband, a fine man who was neither young[20] nor handsome but most obliging. An hour later, hearing the General's carriage stop at her door, she said that if he asked me if I was planning to attend the Elector's[21] ball at Bonn I must answer that I would certainly be there. Five or six minutes later I slipped away.

I knew nothing about the ball, but I at once made inquiries. The entire nobility of Cologne were invited to it, and, since it was a masked ball,[22] anyone could attend it. I decided to go, but as incognito as possible, even if the General did not ask me the question. It seemed to me that, by advising me how to answer him, Madame X had ordered me to go. I could put no other interpretation on it. I was certain that she would be present, and I hoped. The woman's mind was of the subtlest. Nevertheless, to everyone who asked me if I was going to the ball, I answered that I had reasons for not attending it; and to the General himself I said that I would not go when he asked me, in Madame X's presence, if I would be there. I said that my health did not permit me that pleasure. He replied that all pleasures were to be eschewed when they might injure one's health.

The day on which the ball was to be given I left at nightfall alone in a post carriage with my strongbox and two dominoes and wearing a coat which no one had seen on me. At Bonn I engaged a room, where I masked and left the second domino and my strongbox. I locked it and went to the Court in a sedan chair. Unknown to everyone, I saw all the ladies of Cologne, and the beautiful X with her face unmasked sitting at a faro bank punting by ducats. I see with pleasure that the banker is Count Verità,[23] of Verona, who had made my acquaintance in Bavaria. He was in the Elector's service. His small bank contained only five or six hundred ducats, and the punters, both men and women, were some ten or twelve. I stand beside Madame, and the banker gives me a livret and offers me the cards to cut. I decline, and Madame X cuts.

I begin punting, staking ten ducats on one card, it loses four times running, and the same thing happens to me at the next deal. At the third deal no one will cut. The banker turns to the General, who was not playing, and he cuts. I take it for a good omen, I stake fifty ducats, and I get the paroli.[24] At the next deal I broke the bank. Everyone was curious, I saw that I was followed, nevertheless I managed to escape. I had my sedan chair carry me to my room, where I changed dominoes and left my money; I went back to the ball, where I saw a new banker and a great deal of gold; but having decided to play no more I had no money. Everyone was wanting to discover who the masker was who had broken the bank. I prowl everywhere; I see Madame X conversing with Count Verità, who is sitting beside her, I approach, and I hear them speaking of me; he was saying that the Elector wanted to know who the masker was who had broken the bank, and that General Kettler had informed him that it might be a Venetian who had arrived in Cologne a week or ten days earlier. She said I had told her I was not well enough to go to the ball. The Count said that he knew me, that if I was in Bonn the Elector would learn of it, and that I would not leave before he had spoken with me. Hearing all this, I foresaw that I could easily be discovered after the ball; but I defied him to do it as long as I was there. But I did the wrong thing. A contradance was being formed, I took a fancy to dance, not foreseeing that I should have to remove my mask. This proved to be the case when it was too late for me to retreat. When Madame X saw me she said she had been mistaken and had wagered that I was a masker who had broken Count Verità's bank. I replied that I had only just arrived.

But at the end of the contradance, when Count Verità saw me, he said that since I was at the ball he was sure I was the person who had broken his bank; I kept denying it, and after eating something at the buffet I went on dancing. Two hours later Count Verità told me with a laugh that I had gone to change my domino and where my room was.

"The Elector," he said, "has learned the whole story, and to punish you for your trickery he commands me to tell you that you shall not leave tomorrow."

"Will he have me arrested?"

"Why shouldn't he, if you refuse to dine with him tomorrow?"

"I will obey. Where is he? Present me at once."

"He has left; but come to me tomorrow at noon."

When he presented me the prince was standing among five or six courtiers, and I had an awkward moment, for, never having seen him, I was looking for a person in ecclesiastical dress and did not find him. It was he himself who ended my embarrassment by saying to me in the Venetian dialect that he was robed as the Grand Master of the Teutonic Order.[25] I nevertheless made him the customary slight genuflection, and when I started to kiss his hand he withdrew it and clasped mine. He said that when he was in Venice I was under the Leads, that his nephew the Elector of Bavaria[26] had told him that when I escaped I had stopped in Munich, and that he would not have let me go if, instead of to Munich, I had gone to Cologne. He said he hoped that after dinner I would tell him the story of my escape, and that I would stay for supper and a little masquerade which we would find amusing. I promised to tell him the whole story of my escape if he had the patience to listen, for it took two hours to tell it, and I then made him laugh by repeating my brief dialogue with the Duke of Choiseul[27] on the subject.

During dinner the prince continued to speak to me in Venetian; he said the most obliging things. He was gay, and with the health he appeared to enjoy no one would have foreseen that his life was to be short. He died a year later.

As soon as he rose from the table he asked me to tell the whole story of my escape, which kept the whole distinguished company interested for two hours. My reader knows the story; but in written form it is nowhere near as interesting as it is when I tell it.

The Elector's little ball was most pleasant. It was a masquerade. We had all dressed as peasants[28] in a private wardrobe of the prince's, where the ladies went to dress in one room while the men dressed in another. Since the Elector himself was dressed as a peasant, anyone who should have refused to wear a similar disguise would only have made himself ridiculous. General Kettler looked a real peasant; Madame X was delicious. Nothing was danced but contradances and ballets in the style of several German provinces,[29] which were most unusual. There were only three or four women of the recognized nobility; the rest, some pretty, others less so, were private acquaintances of the Elector, who was all his life a great lover of the fair sex. Two of these women[30] danced the furlana,[31] and the Elector took the greatest pleasure in making me dance it. It is a Venetian dance which has not its equal for violence in all Europe; it is danced by couples and, there being two women, they almost killed me. Completely out of breath after twelve or thirteen, I begged for mercy. In a dance whose name I have forgotten the men kissed the peasant girls they caught; I did not beat about the bush: I kept catching Madame X, and the peasant-Elector kept saying "Bravo, bravo." Poor Kettler was furious.

She found an opportunity to tell me that all the ladies from Cologne would leave the next day at noon, and that it would be to my credit if I would invite them all to luncheon at Brühl,[32] sending them two or three[33] notes in which I should write the names of the men by whom they were escorted.

"Put yourself in Count Verità's hands," she said, "and he will see to it; just tell him that you want to do the same thing the Prince of Zweibrücken[34] did two years ago; but lose no time. Count on twenty people, and set the hour. Above all make sure that the notes are distributed at nine o'clock in the morning."

Delighted with the power which the charming woman believed she could exercise over me, I instantly decided to obey her. Brühl, luncheon, twenty people, like the Duke of Zweibrücken, one o'clock, Count Verità—I was as well informed as if she had spent an hour instructing me.

I leave at once, still dressed as a peasant; I ask a page to show me to Count Verità's rooms. He laughs to see how I am dressed, I tell him my plan in a few words, I ask his help as if my business were a most urgent matter of state.

"What you want," he said, "is perfectly easy. It will cost me no more than the trouble of writing a note to the steward in charge there and sending it to him at once. Simply tell me how much you wish to spend."

"As much as possible," I said.

"You mean as little."

"No, as much, for I wish to entertain splendidly."

"All the same you must name an amount, for I know the man."

"Tell him two hundred ducats."

"That is enough. The Duke of Zweibrücken spent no more."

He writes the note, he sends it, assuring me that all will be attended to. I leave him, thinking of the notes. I speak to a bright-looking Italian page. I tell him I will pay a ducat to a valet who will give me the names of the ladies from Cologne who had come to Bonn and of the gentlemen who had accompanied them. A half hour later I received word that all was done. Before going to bed I myself wrote eighteen notes, and the next morning sealed and sent them to their addresses by a hired servant for whom the innkeeper vouched.

At nine o'clock I went to take leave of Count Verità, who gave me, on the Elector's behalf, a gold box adorned with a portrait-medallion of him robed as Grand Master of the Teutonic Order. I was very sensible of this mark of condescension; I wanted to go and thank His Highness, but the Count said I might wait until I passed through Bonn on my way to Frankfort.

The hour for my luncheon was set at one o'clock, but at noon I was already at Brühl. It is a pleasure house belonging to the Elector, the beauty of which lies in the taste of its furnishings. It was a copy of Trianon.[35] In a spacious room I saw a table set for twenty-four persons; there were silver-gilt forks and spoons, porcelain plates, and, on the buffet, a profusion of silverware and large silver-gilt dishes. On two other tables at the other end of the room I saw bottles filled with the most celebrated wines of all Europe and an assortment of all kinds of sweets. When I told the steward that it was I who was giving the luncheon, he said that I would be well satisfied and that he had been there since six o'clock in the morning. He said that the cold collation would be limited to twenty-four dishes; but that I should have twenty-four plates of English oysters and a dessert which would cover the entire table. Seeing a large number of servants, I said they were not needed; but he said they were, for the guests' own servants would not come in. He said I should not be concerned, because they were informed of it.

I received all my guests at the doors of their carriages, confining my compliments to begging pardon for the boldness which had procured me the honor of their company. At one o'clock the luncheon was served, and I saw joy in Madame X's lovely eyes when she saw the same lavishness which the Elector would have displayed. She was not unaware that everyone knew it was all done for her, but she was delighted to see that I paid no more attention to her than I did to the others. There were twenty-four places set, and though I had sent out only eighteen notes the places were all taken. Hence there were six people who had come without being invited. This pleased me. I refused to sit down; I served the ladies, darting from one to another and eating what they gave me where I stood.

The English oysters ended only with the emptying of the twentieth bottle of champagne. When the luncheon itself began, the company was already tipsy. Composed, as it should be, only of entrées, it was the choicest of repasts. Not a single drop of water was drunk, for neither Rhine wine nor Tokay will tolerate it. Before the dessert was served an immense dish containing a ragout of truffles was set on the table. It was emptied in accordance with my advice to wash it down with maraschino.

"It is like water," said the ladies, and they drank it as if it really were water. The dessert was magnificent. The portraits of all the sovereigns of Europe appeared on it, the guests complimented the steward, who was there, and he, bridling with vanity, said it was all pocketable, whereupon everyone pocketed some. Then the General made a very stupid remark, which the company howled down by a general burst of laughter.

"I am sure," he said, "that this is a trick the Elector has played on us. His Highness has wished to remain incognito, and Monsieur Casanova has perfectly served the prince's design."

After the great burst of laughter, which gave me time to think:

"If, General," I said modestly, "the Elector had given me such an order I should have obeyed it; but it would have been a humiliation. His Highness has seen fit to do me a far greater honor, and here it is."

So saying, I handed him the snuffbox, which then made the round of the table two or three times.

My guests rose, and everyone was astonished to have spent three hours at table. After all the usual compliments the distinguished company set off for Cologne in order to be there in time for the play. Very well pleased with my brilliant entertainment, I left the worthy steward twenty ducats for the servants. He asked me to write Count Verità that I was satisfied.

I reached Cologne in time to go to the curtain raiser. Having no carriage, I went to the theater in a sedan chair. Seeing Madame X with Monsieur de Lastic, I went to her box. She at once said mournfully that the General had felt so ill that he had been obliged to go to bed. A moment later Monsieur de Lastic left us alone, whereupon the charming woman paid me compliments which were worth a hundred of my luncheons. She said that the General had drunk too much Tokay and that he was a filthy beast who had said it was well known who I was and that it was entirely improper to treat me like a prince. She had replied that, on the contrary, I had treated them like princes of whom I was the very humble servant. At that he had insulted her.

"Tell him to go to the devil," I said.

"It is too late. A woman whom you do not know would capture him; I would pretend indifference, but I should not like it."

"I understand very well. Why am I not a great prince! In the meanwhile I must tell you that I am far more ill than Kettler. I am at death's door."

"You are joking, I suppose."

"I am speaking seriously. Those kisses at the Elector's ball gave me a taste of a strange nectar. If you do not take pity on me I shall leave here unhappy for the rest of my life."

"Put off leaving. Forget about Stuttgart. I think of you; and it is not my fault. Believe me, I have no wish to deceive you."

"This evening, for example, if you did not have the General's carriage and I had mine I could see you home with perfect propriety."

"Do not worry! Haven't you yours?"

"No."

"In that case it is I who must take you home; but, my dear friend, it must come about perfectly naturally. You will give me your arm to my carriage, I will ask you where yours is, and when I hear you say you haven't one I will tell you to get in and I will drop you at your inn. It will only be ten minutes; but until we can do better it is something."

I answered only with my eyes, for joy overwhelmed my soul. After the play up comes her footman to tell her the carriage is at the door. We go down, she asks me the question we have agreed upon, and when she hears that I have no carriage, she does better. She tells me that she is going to the General's to ask after his health, and that if I wish to go there she can take me to my inn afterward.

Her quickness of mind was divine. We had to cross the whole, ill-paved city twice. It was a closed carriage. We did what we could, but almost nothing. The moon was ahead of us, and the beastly coachman kept looking around. It gave me the horrors. The sentinel told the coachman that His Excellency could see no one. She orders him to drive to my inn, and now we had the moon behind. We did a little better, but badly, nothing was right. The scoundrel never drove so fast in his life. However, when I got out I gave him a ducat. I went to bed, mortally in love, and in a sense worse off than before. Madame X had convinced me that making me happy made her happy. I decided to stay on in Cologne until the General was gone.

The next day at noon I went to the General's to have my name entered;[36] but he was receiving visitors. I was shown in. Madame X was there. I pay the General the appropriate compliment, and he responds only with a cold bow. There were many officers standing about, so four minutes later I slipped away. He stayed at home for three days, and Madame X never went to the theater.

On the last day of the Carnival the General invited a large company[37] to supper, and after supper there was to be dancing. I go as usual to make my bow to Madame X in her box, I am left alone with her, she asks me if the General has invited me to supper, I answer no, and she replies in a peremptory and indignant tone that I must go even so.

"You have spoken without thinking," I said gently, "I will obey you in anything except that."

"I know all that you can say. You must go. I shall consider myself insulted if you are not at the supper. You can never give me a greater proof of your affection and esteem."

"Say no more. I will go. But tell me if you realize that your fatal command puts my life in danger, for I am not the man to pretend indifference if the brute insults me."

"I am well aware of that; I love your honor at least as much as I do your life. Nothing will happen to you, I answer for it, leave it all to me. You must go. Promise me this instant that you will, for I have made up my mind. If you will not go, I will not go either; but after that we shall not see each other again."

"I will go. Let us say no more about it."

Monsieur de Castries entered just then, and I went back to the stage. Foreseeing the worst of insults, which was bound to have fatal consequences, I spent two hours in hell. Yet I prepared to be on my good behavior. I went to the General's immediately after the play; only five or six people were present. I go up to a canoness who was fond of Italian poetry, and our conversation becomes engrossing; within half an hour the room was full; the last to arrive was Madame X with the General. Occupied with the lady, I remain where I am, so he does not see me. Madame X's cajoleries left him no time to look over the company. He goes elsewhere. A quarter of an hour later the Canoness is summoned to supper, she takes my arm, in a moment I am sitting at the table beside her, and in another moment all the places are occupied. But a foreigner who must have been invited remains standing. The General exclaims that it is impossible, and while he waits for a place to be set for him he passes his guests in review, and since I am not looking at him he names me and says:

"Monsieur, I did not invite you."

I reply, firmly but respectfully:

"That is true, General, but since I am sure it can only have been an oversight, I have come nevertheless to pay Your Excellency my respects."

After answering in these words, I continued talking to the Canoness without looking at anyone. Nobody spoke until after three or four minutes of the bleakest silence. The Canoness then said some amusing things, which I relayed to the other guests, and suddenly the whole table was gay.

The General sulked, which was by no means all the same to me. I was determined to put him in a good humor, and I watched for the opportunity. It came at the second course. Monsieur de Castries praised the Dauphine,[38] the conversation moved on to her brother the Count of Lausitz,[39] to her other brother the Duke of Kurland,[40] and then to the former Duke Biron,[41] who was in Siberia, and to his personal qualities. One of the guests said that his only merit was to have pleased the Empress Anna;[42] I begged to differ.

"His great merit is to have faithfully served the last Duke Kettler,[43] who, but for the courage of the now unfortunate man, would have lost all his field equipment in the war then ending. It was Duke Kettler himself who, with a heroism worthy of history, sent him to the Court of Petersburg, and Biron never asked for the dukedom. He only wanted to enforce his claim to the countship of Wartenberg,[44] recognizing the rights of the younger branch of the house of Kettler, which would be reigning today but for the whim of the Czarina, who insisted on making her favorite Duke."

"I have never met anyone better informed," said the General, looking at me, "and but for that whim I should be reigning today."

After this modest statement he burst out laughing and sent me a bottle of Rhine wine with a label bearing the date 1748. From then on he talked with no one but me, and we rose from the table good friends. There was dancing all night; the Canoness was my partner. I danced only one minuet with Madame X. Toward the end of the ball he asked me if I was leaving soon, a question which no one of any intelligence asks. I replied that I should not leave until after the review.

I went to bed well satisfied that I had given Madame X such a proof of my love that it would be hard to imagine a stronger, but thanking Fortune that the reply which my good Genius had suggested to me had reduced the brute to reason, for God knows what I would have done if he had dared order me to leave his table. The first time we met again she told me that she had shuddered when she heard him tell me he had not invited me.

"It is certain," she said, "that he would have said more to you if your proud excuse had not petrified him, and in the contrary case I had made up my mind what I should do."

"What?"

"I would have risen and we would have left together; Monsieur de Castries has told me that he would have done likewise, and I believe that all the ladies you invited to Brühl would have followed our example."

"But even that would not have ended the matter, for I would have demanded satisfaction."

"I understand that, and I ask you to forgive me for having exposed you to the danger; but on my side I shall never forget it until I have completely convinced you of my gratitude."

Hearing three or four days later that she was ill, I went to see her at eleven o'clock in the morning, so that I should not find the General there. She received me in her husband's room; he at once asked me if I had come to dine with them, and I answered yes. I enjoyed the dinner more than I did the supper at the General's two days after I arrived in Cologne. The Burgomaster was one of those men who preferred peace in his household above all things, and his wife ought to have loved him, for he was not among those who say: Displiceas aliis, sic ego tutus ero ("Be unpleasing to other men, and I shall be safe").[45]

Before dinner she showed me the whole house:

"This is our bedroom, and this is a little room in which I sometimes sleep alone when propriety demands it; and this is a public church, which we can consider our chapel,[46] for from these two grated windows we see the mass. We attend it only on feast days, making our way down this small staircase, at the foot of which there is a door, of which this is the key."

It was the second Saturday in Lent; we ate a very good fast-day dinner; but the food was what interested me least. What made my amorous soul completely happy was the charming woman, whom, at the age of twenty-five, I saw adored by her whole family. She had a sister-in-law and several children—the progeny of a brother of her husband's—whose guardian he was. I left early to write to Esther, whom my new passion was leading me to neglect.

The next day, wearing early-morning dress, I went to hear mass at Madame X's little church. It was a Sunday. I saw her come out of the little door under the grated windows. She was followed by her nieces, and her lovely head was swathed in the hood of her cloak. The door was so far recessed into the wall that it could not be seen. The devil, who, as everyone knows, sets more snares in church than anywhere else, instantly inspired me with the happy plan of spending whole nights in her arms, going up to her room through this auspicious door.

I told her my plan the next day at the theater. She laughed. She said she had thought of it too and that she would give me a note with the necessary directions, wrapped up in the gazette, as soon as possible. We could not talk. A lady from Aix-la-Chapelle who had come to spend a few days in Cologne occupied her entire attention, and the box was full of visitors.

She publicly gave me the gazette the next day, saying that she had found nothing of interest in it. Here is a copy of the letter I found enclosed:

"The happy plan which love has conceived is not susceptible to difficulties but it is to uncertainties. The wife sleeps in the little room only when the husband requests her to permit this separation; and then it may continue for three or four days. She thinks that the reason for the request will soon arrive, but long familiarity makes it impossible for her to impose upon him. Hence it will be necessary to wait. The woman in love will see to informing the lover. The method will be to hide in the church, and there can be no thought of corrupting the man who opens it and locks it up. Though poor he is too stupid to corrupt. He would betray the secret. The only way is to hide in the church and be locked in. He locks it at noon on week days and in the evening on feast days, and he opens his church at dawn every day. When the time comes the door will be shut in such a way that, to open it, the lover will only need to give it a little push. Since the little room is separated from the bedroom only by a very thin partition, he is warned that he must never blow his nose and that he must not catch a cold, for it would be disastrous if he happened to cough. The lover's getting away will present no difficulty. He will go down to the church and he will leave it as soon as he finds it opened. Since the beadle will not have seen him when he locked up, it is against all probability that he will see him when he opens it."

Her letter put my soul in ecstasy. I kissed it countless times. The next morning I went and examined the whole inside of the church; this was the most important thing to do. There was a pulpit, in which the man would not have seen me; but the steps to it were in the sacristy, which was kept locked. I decided on one of the two confessionals, which had half doors in front. By lying down where the confessor put his feet, I might well not be seen; but the space was so small that I thought it could not possibly contain me with the half door closed. I waited until about noon, and I got into it when I saw there was no one left in the church. I fitted, but so poorly that I would be seen by any person who came near. In all undertakings of this kind one accomplishes nothing if one does not count on Fortune. Resolved to entrust myself to her sway, I went home fairly well satisfied. I wrote my goddess an account of all I had done, wrapping my narrative in the same gazette and handing it to her at the theater, where I saw her every day.

A week or ten days later she asked the General in my presence if he had any errand for her husband, who was to leave for Aix-la-Chapelle the next day at noon and would return in three days.

It was all I needed to know. A glance she gave me told me that I was to take advantage of her announcement. What joy! And all the greater because I had a slight cold. The next day was a feast day, which was even more to the good; I would not hide in the confessional until evening and so should avoid the fatigue of spending the whole day in the church.

I went there at four o'clock and crouched in the darker confessional, commending myself to God. At five o'clock the man with the keys, after making a round of the church which was only perfunctory, left and locked the door. I came out and sat down on a bench, from which, seeing her outline through the grating, I was sure that she had seen me. She closed the blind.

A quarter of an hour later I went to the door, pushed, and it opened. I closed it and, groping my way, sat down on the lowest stairs. There I spent five hours, which, as I was expecting my happiness, I should not have found trying if the rats which kept coming and going close by had not constantly preyed on my mind. Accursed beast, which I have never been able to ignore, even as I have never succeeded in overcoming the unbearable nausea it causes me! Yet it is only ugly and stinking.

At ten o'clock she came, carrying a candle, to rescue me from the anguish in which I lived only for her. The reader can imagine the reciprocal delights of that happy night in general, but he cannot guess its details. She said she had got together a little supper for me; but I had no appetite except that which her charms aroused; besides, I had dined at four o'clock. We spent seven hours in intoxication, often interrupting them by amorous talk only to renew our delights.

Le bellezze d'Olimpia eran di quelle
Che son più rare; e non la fronte sola
Gli occhi, le guancie, e le chiome avea belle,
La bocca, il naso, gli omeri, e la gola;
Ma discendendo giù da le mammelle,
Le parti che solea coprir la stola
Fur di tanta eccellenza, che ante porse
A quante ne avea il mondo potean forse.

Vinceano di candor le nevi intatte
Et eran più che avorio a toccar molli:
Le poppe ritondette parean latte
Che fuor de giunchi allora allora tolli:
Spazio fra lor tal discendea, qual fatte
Esser veggiam fra piccolini colli
L'ombrose valli in sua stagion amene
Che'l verno abbia di neve allora piene.

I rilevati fianchi, e le bell'anche,
E netto più che specchio il ventre piano
Parean fatte, e quelle cosce bianche
Da Fidia a torno, o da più dotta mano.
Di quelle parte debbovi dir anche etc. etc.

("Olympia's beauties were of the rarest; not her forehead alone but her eyes, her cheeks, her hair were beautiful, and her mouth, her nose, her shoulders, and her throat; but, to descend from her breasts, the parts which her dress usually covered were of such excellence that they might well have been rated above all the excellencies the world had to show. They vanquished untouched snow in whiteness and were softer to the touch than ivory: her little rounded breasts were like curds just taken from their reed basket; a space ran down between them such as we see the shady valleys between little hills to be in their pleasant season but which winter had then filled with snow. Her molded flanks, her > beautiful hips, and her flat stomach, more shining than a mirror, seemed shaped, with her white thighs, by Phidias or some more skillful hand. Of those parts I must further tell you," etc. etc.)[47]

Madame X had a husband who needed nothing but his own constitution and the affection he felt for her to do his duty to her every night without fail. Whether by way of regimen or from scrupulosity, he did not claim his rights during the critical days of each moon, and to insure himself against temptation he banished his dear wife from his side; but during the happy night we spent together she was not in a state that called for separation. We both owed our unexpected happiness to the excellent man's lucky journey. I parted from her exhausted but not satiated. Clasping her in my arms, I assured her that she would find me no less eager the next time we could meet. I returned to the confessional, where the light of the dawning day should make it easier for me to hide from the eyes of the man with the keys. As soon as I saw the door open I went home to bed. I did not go out until time for the theater, where I should again see the charming object of which love had granted me possession.

It was not until two weeks later that, getting into her carriage, she told me she would sleep in the little room the next night. It was a weekday. Since the church was open only in the morning I went there at eleven o'clock after eating a good breakfast. I slipped into the confessional as easily as I had the first time, and the beadle locked up his church about noon.

The thought that I had to spend ten hours either in the church or in the darkness at the foot of the stairs in company with the rats was not pleasant, but Love makes waiting precious to the lover who is sure that Love will keep his word.

At one o'clock I saw a sheet of paper fall to the pavement under the grated window. With my heart pounding, I go and pick it up, and I find these words:

"The door is unlocked. I think you will be better off there than in the church. You will find a small dinner, a night lamp, and books. You will be uncomfortably seated, but I could do nothing about that. These ten hours will be less long to you than to me, you may be sure. I told the General I was ill. So you can imagine there is no chance of my going out today. May God keep you from coughing, especially tonight, for a man's cough is entirely different from a woman's."

Love! Charming god who thinks of everything! I do not hesitate for an instant. I go in, and on part of three steps I see napkins, tableware, tasty little dishes, bottles, glasses, a portable stove, and a bottle of alcohol. I see ground coffee and lemons, sugar and rum, in case I should feel like making punch. Also some amusing books. What surprises me is that Madame X had been able to do it all without anyone in the household being the wiser.

The charm of the preparations lay in their seeming rather intended to keep a man entertained than to feed him. I spent three hours reading, then three hours eating, making tea, and then punch. After that I went to sleep; and my angel came to wake me at ten o'clock. But this second night was less animated than the first; there were fewer possibilities because of the darkness and more constraint because of the nearness of her husband, whom the slightest noise would have wakened. We spent three or four hours in the arms of sleep.

This was the last night we spent together. The General went to Westphalia,[48] and she had to go to the country. I promised her I would come back to Cologne the following year; but several misfortunes kept me from doing so. I took leave of everyone, and I left regretted.

My stay of two and a half months[49] in that city did not lighten my purse, despite the fact that every time I was persuaded to play for money I lost. The game at Bonn more than paid my expenses with something over. The banker Frantz[50] complained that I had drawn nothing from him. I would not have behaved so well had I not had a tender attachment, which made it necessary for me to convince everyone who was watching me that I deserved to be treated well.

I left at the middle of March and stopped at Bonn to make my bow to the Elector. His Highness was not there. I dined with Count Verità and the Abbé Scampar,[51] who was His Highness's favorite. An unofficial letter which the Count gave me for a Canoness whom he praised and who was to be at Coblenz was my reason for stopping there; but instead of the Canoness, who had gone to Mannheim, I found at my inn a woman of the theater named Toscani,[52] who was on her way back to Stuttgart with her very young and charming daughter. She had come from Paris, where she had spent a year having her taught serious dancing by the celebrated Vestris.[53] Delighted to see me again, the girl immediately showed me a spaniel which I had given her a year earlier. The little creature was her delight. The girl, who was a veritable jewel, easily persuaded me to take a trip to Stuttgart, where, in any case, I could not but enjoy all possible pleasures. Her mother was eager to see what the Duke[54] would think of her daughter, whom she had destined from childhood to the lust of a prince who, though he then had an official mistress, wanted also to have all his ballerinas in whom he saw anything of interest. La Toscani assured me at supper that her little girl was a virgin, and she swore that the Duke should not have her until he had dismissed his reigning mistress and given her the same position. The reigning mistress was the dancer Gardela,[55] the same daughter of a Venetian gondolier of whom I spoke in my first volume and the same wife of Michele dall'Agata whom I encountered in Munich when I escaped from the Leads.

Neither the Toscani girl nor her mother was offended by my curiosity as to the purity of the jewel reserved for the Duke of Württemberg, and their vanity was concerned to convince me they were telling the truth. It was a pastime which engaged me for two full hours the next day with the two adorable creatures, for nothing in the world would have persuaded the mother to leave me alone with her treasure, of which I might boldly defraud her. But far from objecting to her presence, I showed her that she was dear to me. She laughed, and admired my honorably extinguishing in herself all the fire which her daughter kindled in my soul with her charms, from which I never turned my eyes. Though still young, the mother did not seem to mind my needing the spectacle in order to play the role of lover to her successfully. She seemed to consider her daughter, whom she adored, a part of herself; but she was sure that she was playing the leading role. She was wrong, and I asked nothing better. Her daughter would not have needed her mother to set me on fire; but without the presence of the former the latter would have found me ice.

So I decided to go to Stuttgart to see La Binetti,[56] who was forever talking about me as of some miracle of nature. La Binetti was the daughter of the Venetian gondolier Ramon, and I had had a hand in getting her launched the same year in which Signora Valmarana[57] had married her off to the French dancer Binet, who had Italianized his name. At Stuttgart I was to renew my acquaintance with La Gardela, the younger Balletti,[58] of whom I was very fond, the Vulcani girl [59] whom he had married, and several other old friends who were to make the short time I was prepared to spend in that city a veritable paradise. At the last post station I renounced the precious company of La Toscani. I went to lodge at the "Bear," [60] to which the postilion took me. In the next volume[61] the reader will see what kind of mishaps befell me in that city.

CHAPTER III

1760. La Gardela as reigning mistress. Portrait of the Duke of Württemberg. My dinner at La Gardela's and its consequences. Unlucky encounter. I gamble, I lose four thousand louis. Lawsuit. Successful flight. My arrival in Zurich. Church consecrated by Jesus Christ in person.

AT THIS period the most brilliant Court in all Europe was that of the Duke of Württemberg. He maintained it through the large subsidies which France paid him for the use of ten thousand men. It was a fine army, which all through the war had distinguished itself only by its mistakes.

The great expenditures in which the Duke indulged went for munificent salaries, superb buildings, hunting establishments, and all sorts of whims; but what cost him fabulous sums was the theater. He had actors and singers for French plays and comic operas, he had Italian opera seria and opera buffa, and ten couples of Italian dancers,[1] every one of whom had been the leading dancer in some famous Italian theater. The composer of his ballets was Noverre,[2] who often used a corps of a hundred; he had a machinist to make settings which tempted the audience to believe in magic. All his ballerinas were pretty, and they all boasted that they had at least once made their amorous sovereign happy. The leading ballerina was a Venetian, the daughter of the gondolier Gardelo, the very girl whom the Venetian Senator Malipiero, who was the first person to give me a good education, brought up for the theater by paying a dancing master to teach her. The reader may remember that on my escape from the Leads I encountered her at Munich, married to the dancer Michele dall'Agata. The Duke of Württemberg, having fallen in love with her, applied for her to her husband, who considered himself fortunate to be able to surrender her to him; but a year later,[3] loving her no longer, he gave her the title of Madame and retired her with a pension. By thus elevating her he made all the other ballerinas jealous; for, believing that they were more worthy to become his mistresses than one who, after all, held only the title and the honors, they did all they could to topple her. But La Gardela knew how to maintain her position. Far from boring the Duke by reproaching him with his infidelities, she congratulated him on them. Since she did not love him she felt far happier in his neglect than she would have been if she had been obliged to put up with him as a lover. Her overpowering ambition was satisfied by the honors which he accorded her. She enjoyed seeing all the ballerinas who aspired to please the Duke solicit her good offices; she received them amiably and encouraged them to win the sovereign's love, while he, considering such tolerance in the favorite admirable and heroic, felt obliged to do everything possible to convince her of his undivided esteem. In public he paid her all the honors which, according to etiquette, he could legitimately have paid only to a princess.

What I clearly realized in a few days was that whatever the prince did was done only to get himself talked about. He wanted it said that no living prince was more intelligent or more talented than he, or more accomplished in the art of inventing pleasures and enjoying them, or better fitted to reign, or possessed of a better constitution for coping with all the pleasures of the table, of Bacchus, and of Venus, without ever infringing on the time he needed to rule his State and manage its departments, of which he insisted on being head. To have leisure for all this he had decided to cheat nature out of the time he needed for sleep. He thought it was within his power, and he dismissed in disgrace any valet who could not get him out of bed after three or four hours of sleep to which he had been obliged to succumb. The valet whose task it was to wake him was authorized to do whatever he pleased with his sovereign person to deliver it from the poppies of Morpheus. He shook him, he made him swallow quantities of coffee, he even put him in a cold bath. When His Most Serene Highness was at last awake he assembled his ministers to deal with current business; then he gave audience to all comers, who for the most part were thick-headed, ignorant, obstinate peasants with grievances, who thought they need only speak with their sovereign for a moment to have him right their wrongs on the spot. But nothing was more comical than these audiences which the Duke granted to his poorer subjects. He became furious trying to make them listen to reason, and they left his presence in terror and despair. He acted differently with pretty peasant girls. He examined their grievances in private, and though he granted them nothing they went away satisfied.

Since the French subsidies were not enough for his immense expenditures he loaded his subjects with taxes, which became so intolerable that a few years later they appealed to the Diet of Wetzlar,[4] which forced him to change his methods. His dearest notion was to rule, following in the footsteps of the King of Prussia, who always laughed at him. His Highness had married the daughter of the Margrave of Bayreuth,[5] who was the most beautiful and accomplished princess in all Germany. About this time she took refuge with her father, unable to bear a cutting affront[6] to which her undeserving husband subjected her. Those who said that she left him because she could not bear his infidelities were misinformed.

After putting up at the "Bear" and dining alone, I dress, I go to the Italian opera seria, with which the Duke provided the public gratis in the fine theater he had built. He was in the circle in front of the orchestra, surrounded by his court. I take my place alone in a box on the first tier, delighted that I could listen undistracted to the music of the famous Jomelli,[7] who was in the Duke's service. An aria sung by a celebrated castrato[8] having greatly pleased me, I clap. A moment later a man comes and speaks to me rudely in German. I reply with the four words of German I know, which mean, "I do not understand German." He leaves and another comes and tells me in French that, since the sovereign is present, it is forbidden to clap.

"Very well. I will come when the sovereign is not present, for when an aria pleases me I cannot help clapping."

After giving this answer I send for my carriage, but the same officer appears and says that the Duke wishes to speak with me. So I go to the circle with him.

"You are Monsieur Casanova?"

"Yes, Monseigneur."

"Where have you come from?"

"From Cologne."

"Is this the first time you have been in Stuttgart?"

"Yes, Monseigneur."

"Do you expect to stay here long?"

"Five or six days, if Your Highness permits."

"As long as you please, and you will also be permitted to clap."

At the following aria the Duke clapped, and everyone did the same; but since I had not liked the aria I remained still. After the ballet the Duke went to call on his pensioned favorite, where I saw him kiss her hand, then leave.

An officer who did not know that I was acquainted with her told me that she was "Madame," and that since I had had the honor to speak with the prince I could also have that of going to kiss her hand in her box. I took it into my head to reply that I thought I need not do so because she was a relative of mine. An arrant lie, which could only do me harm. I see that he is surprised; he leaves me and goes to my relative's box and informs her of my sudden appearance. She turns to look at me and beckons me with her fan. I go, laughing to myself over the stupid role I am about to play. I have no sooner entered her box than she gives me her hand, which I kiss, addressing her as "cousin." She asks me if I had told the Duke I was her cousin, I answer no; but she undertakes to do it and invites me to dine with her the next day.

At the end of the opera she leaves, and I go to pay my respects to the ballerinas while they undress. When she catches sight of me La Binetti, whom I had known the longest, appears to be overcome with joy and invites me to eat at her table every day. The violinist Kurz,[9] who had been with me in the orchestra at San Samuele,[10] introduces his marvelously pretty daughter[11] to me, saying peremptorily that the Duke should never have her; but he soon afterward had her and was loved by her; she gave him two children; she could well have made him constant, for she was intelligent as well as beautiful; but at that time the Duke had a need to be inconstant. After Kurz's daughter I saw the youthful Vulcani girl, whom I had known at Dresden and who surprised me by introducing her husband, who flung himself on my neck. It was the younger Balletti, brother of my jilt,[12] a lad full of talent and intelligence whom I loved to distraction.[13]

All these acquaintances were gathered around me when the officer to whom I had said I was related to La Gardela came up and told the company the whole story; but La Binetti said to him in so many words that it was not true and laughed in my face when I told her she could not know enough about it to contradict me. She too being the daughter of a gondolier, La Binetti thought I should have given her the preference over the other, and perhaps she was right.

The next day I dined very gaily with the favorite despite her telling me that, not having seen the Duke, she did not know how he would take it. Her mother considered our joke of calling cousins unworthy of her approval. She told me that her relatives had never been actors; I asked her if her sister was still alive, and she was very much put out by my question. Her sister was a fat, blind slut who begged for alms on a bridge in Venice.

After spending the whole day pleasurably in the company of the favorite, who was the oldest of all my acquaintances of this kind, I took my departure, assuring her that I would come to breakfast with her the next morning; but as I left the house her mustached porter most ungraciously paid me a compliment in the worst taste. He ordered me, without telling me at whose bidding, not to set foot in the house again. Thus brought to recognize what a stupid thing I had done, I returned to my inn in a very bad humor. If I had not promised La Binetti that I would dine with her the next day, I should have decamped immediately and thus have avoided all the unpleasant things which happened to me in that city by my own fault.

La Binetti lived in the house of her lover, who was the Viennese Envoy.[14] The house formed part of the rampart, so that by climbing through her windows one was outside of the town. If I had been capable of falling in love at the time, all my old fondness would have reawakened, for her attractions were enchanting. The Viennese Envoy was tolerant, and her husband was a real beast who frequented houses of ill fame. We dined very gaily, and having nothing further to do in Württemberg, I decided to leave on the next day but one, for on the following day I was to go to see Ludwigsburg with La Toscani and her daughter. The engagement had already been made, and we were to meet at five o'clock in the morning; but here is what happened to me when I left La Binetti's house toward nightfall.

Three engaging-looking officers whose acquaintance I had made at a coffeehouse come up to me, and we take a few turns together. They tell me they have got up a party with light women, and that if I wish they will be happy to have me join them. I say that, not speaking German, I should be bored; they reply that the women they are to meet are Italian; and they persuade me.

Toward dusk we return to the city and go to the fourth floor of a disreputable-looking house where in a dirty room I find the two supposititious nieces of Pocchini, and a moment later I see Pocchini himself,[15] coming to embrace me with great effrontery and calling me his best friend. The caresses to which the girls treat me confirm our old acquaintance, and the whole situation decides me to dissimulate.

The officers begin raising a row, I do not follow their example; but that does not abash them. I repent too late of having agreed to go there with men whom I did not know, but the thing was done. All the misfortunes which befell me in Stuttgart arose entirely from my own bad conduct.

A pothouse supper is served, I do not eat, but not to appear impolite I drink two or three glasses of Hungarian wine. Cards are brought, one of the officers makes a bank, I punt, with my head spinning; I lose fifty or sixty louis which I have with me. I refuse to play any more; but the noble officers cannot bear that I should leave regretting that I supped with them. They persuade me to make a bank of a hundred louis, and they give me counters for the amount. I lose; I replenish the bank, and I lose it, then I increase it and keep increasing it, always losing, and at midnight they say "Enough." We reckon up all the counters, and I am found to owe them something like four thousand louis. My head was spinning so fast that they had to send for a sedan chair to take me back to my inn. As he undresses me my valet says I have neither my watches nor a gold snuffbox. I do not forget to tell him to wake me at four o'clock, and I fall asleep.

He wakes me punctually. I am astonished to find in my pockets about a hundred louis, though I perfectly recollect the large sum I had lost on my word; but I put off thinking about it, together with my watches and my snuffbox, until another time. I take another snuffbox, I go to La Toscani's, we go to Ludwigsburg, I am shown everything, we dine very well, and we return to Stuttgart. I was in such a good humor that no one in the party could have imagined the considerable misfortune which had befallen me the night before.

The first thing my Spaniard told me was that no one in the house where I had supped knew anything about either my watches or my snuffbox; and the second was that three officers had come to call on me at nine in the morning and had told him they would come to breakfast with me the next day. They did so punctually.

"Gentlemen," I said, "I have lost an amount which I cannot pay, and which I should certainly not have lost were it not for the poison you made me swallow in your Hungarian wine. In the bordello to which you took me I was robbed of valuables worth three hundred louis; but I will complain of it to no one. If I had been sensible nothing would have happened to me."

They began protesting loudly. They talked to me in accordance with the role which a show of honor obliged them to play; but all their words were useless, for I had already decided that I would pay nothing. At the height of our dispute, in come Balletti, La Toscani, and the dancer Binetti, who heard what the whole dispute was about. They left after breakfasting; and one of the three officers then proposed the following compromise:

They would take at their actual value everything I had in the way of gold jewelry and diamonds, and if these did not suffice to make up the amount I owed they would accept a written undertaking from me to pay them at a specified time.

I replied that I could not pay them at all, whereupon they began to threaten. I said, with perfect self-possession, that they had only two ways to make me pay. One would be to bring suit against me, and in that case I would procure an advocate to defend me. The other, which I proposed with all due modesty, was to let them take it out on my body in all honor and in complete secrecy, one at a time and sword in hand. As usual, and as I might have expected, they replied that they would do me the honor of killing me after I had paid them. They went off cursing and assuring me that I would be sorry.

I left and went to La Toscani's, where I spent the whole day with a gaiety which, situated as I was, seemed madness; but such was the power of her daughter's charms, and I needed to be gay.

La Toscani, however, who had witnessed the rage of the three intrepid gamblers, convinced me that I should be the first to take legal action against them, for if I let them get the start of me they might gain a great advantage; so she sent for an advocate, who, after hearing the facts, said that I should go directly to the sovereign. They had taken me to a house of ill fame; they had made me drink doctored wine which had deprived me of my reasoning powers, they had gambled, and gambling was forbidden, they had won an enormous amount from me, and in the brothel I had been robbed of my possessions, which, being drunk, I had realized only when I got back to my inn. The facts spoke for themselves. To the sovereign, to the sovereign, to the sovereign!

The next morning I decide I will do it; and, since he hears everyone, I think I need not write; I go to Court to talk with him. At twenty paces from the palace door I encounter two of my gentlemen, who swagger up to me and say that I must think about paying them; I start to go on without answering; I feel my left arm caught, and by a perfectly natural impulse I angrily draw my sword, the officer of the guard comes running, I cry out that I am being stopped from laying a justified complaint before the sovereign. The officer hears from the sentry and from all the crowd around me that I had drawn my sword only in self-defense, he decides that no one can keep me from going up.

I go up; I am allowed to proceed to the last anteroom, I demand a hearing, I am assured that I will receive it, the officer who had caught me by the arm comes up, he tells what story he pleases in German to the officer who is serving as chamberlain and who apparently belonged to the gang; and an hour passes and I am not granted an audience. Finally the same officer who had assured me the sovereign would give me a hearing comes and tells me that the sovereign already knows everything, that I may go home, take no steps, and be sure that I will receive justice.

So I leave the palace, intending to go to my inn; but I run into the dancer Binetti, who, having heard the whole story, persuades me to come and dine at his house, where the Viennese Envoy would take me under his protection to safeguard me from the violence these scoundrels might attempt to do me, despite what the fellow in the Duke's antechamber had said. I go; La Binetti, blazing up over my wrongs, goes to inform the Envoy, who, after hearing the whole story from me, says that the Duke might well know nothing about it, so I should write a brief account of the occurrence and send it to him. In this way, according to the Envoy, I should be certain to receive justice.

I quickly write down the ugly story, and the Envoy assures me that it will be in the prince's hands in less than an hour. At dinner La Binetti gives me the most unequivocal assurances that the Viennese Envoy will be my protector, and we spend the day in good spirits; but toward nightfall my Spaniard comes to tell me that if I go to the inn I shall certainly be arrested, for an officer who had gone to my room and not found me there had stationed himself at the street door; he had been there for two hours and had posted two soldiers at the foot of the stairs. La Binetti does not want me to go to the inn; she makes me stay at her house, and my valet leaves, coming back with everything I need to undress and spend the night under the roof of my good friend, where I had no violence to fear. The Envoy comes home at midnight, he makes no objection to La Binetti's having given me a refuge, he says that the sovereign has undoubtedly read my petition.[16] So I go to bed quite easy, and three days pass without my seeing any result from my petition or hearing anyone say a word about my case. La Binetti would never let me go out.

On the fourth day, when I was consulting the whole household on what I should do, the Envoy received a letter from the Secretary of State[17] asking him, at the sovereign's behest, to dismiss me from his house, since I had a suit pending with some of His Highness's officers and my being in his house prevented justice from taking its course and deciding in favor of one party or the other in the matter to be examined. In this letter, which I read, the Secretary assured the Envoy that strict justice would be done me. So I had to accede to going back to my inn. This made La Binetti so furious that she called the Envoy names, at which he merely laughed and said he could not keep me in defiance of the Duke.

After dinner, when I was on the verge of going to see my advocate, a bailiff brings me a summons, which my host translates for me. I was to go at once to I forget what notary, who was to receive and record my deposition. I went with the summons server, and I spent two hours with the man, who wrote down in German all that I told him in Latin. He told me to sign, but I protested that I could not sign a document whose contents I did not know, and at that point we had a long argument, but I remained unshaken. He became angry, saying that I could not cast doubt on the good faith of a notary; I replied that in that case he could do without my signature, and, leaving him, I went on to see my advocate, who told me that I had been right not to sign, that he would come to me at my inn the next morning to receive my power of attorney, and that thereafter my business would be his.

Relieved by the man's apparent honesty, I went back to the inn to eat supper and sleep tranquilly; but the next morning my valet came in with an officer who told me quite politely in good French that I must not be surprised to find myself under arrest in my room with a sentry at my door, for, I being a foreigner, my opponent had the right to make sure that I would not flee while the preliminary investigation was being made. He asked for my sword, which to my great regret I was obliged to give him. It was steel, worth fifty louis, and had been a present to me from Madame d'Urfé. I at once sent word of my arrest to my advocate, who assured me that it would continue for only a very few days. Having to stay in my room, I began to receive visits from dancers male and female, who were the only honest people I knew. Poisoned by a glass of wine, cheated, robbed, I was now deprived of my freedom and in fear of being sentenced to pay a hundred thousand francs, to procure which I should have to let myself be stripped to my shirt, since no one knew what I had in my portfolio. My mind was as if numbed by such tyranny; I had written to "Madame" Gardela, and had received no answer. La Binetti, La Toscani, and Balletti dining or supping with me were my only consolation. The swindling officers had all come to talk with me one after the other, each trying to make me give him money without the knowledge of the others and each promising to get me out of my difficulty. Each in turn would have been satisfied with three or four hundred louis; but even if I had given it to one of them I had no assurance that the other two would not return to the charge. I told them in turn that they bored me and that I would take it as a favor if they would no longer trouble themselves to visit me.

On the fifth day of my arrest the Duke of Württemberg left Stuttgart for Frankfort, and on the same day La Binetti came to say that the Viennese Envoy had told her to inform me that the sovereign had promised the officers he would not intervene in the matter, hence he thought I was in danger of becoming the victim of an iniquitous judgment. So he advised me to try to extricate myself by sacrificing everything I had in gold and diamonds in exchange for a formal release from my pretended creditors. La Binetti did not share his opinion, but she felt it her duty to convey what the Envoy had ordered her to communicate to me.

I could not bring myself to give up my rings and empty my strongbox, in which I had watches, snuffboxes, other kinds of boxes, cases, and portraits to the value of more than forty thousand francs; but it was my advocate himself who made me resolve on vigorous action when, talking with me privately, he said without beating around the bush that if I could not manage to settle the matter by paying, I should begin to think of taking to my heels, for otherwise I was lost. "The police judge," he said, "will give a summary judgment, for you, as a foreigner, will not be allowed to delay your case by the ordinary legal maneuvering. You would have to begin by furnishing bail. Witnesses have been found in this city to testify that you are a professional gambler, that it was you who lured the officers to the lodging of your countryman Pocchini, that it is not true that they got you drunk, and not true that your watches and snuffbox were stolen. It is averred that they will be found in your luggage when the court orders all your effects inventoried. Look for that to happen tomorrow or the day after, and beware of doubting any part of what I have told you. Officers of the court will come here and empty your two trunks, your strongbox, and your pockets, everything will be listed and everything put up for auction the same day; and if the money realized is not enough to pay your debt and the court costs and the costs of your arrest, you will be enrolled, Sir, as a common soldier in the troops of His Most Serene Highness. I myself heard the officer who is your largest creditor say with a laugh that the four louis you will be given as enlistment money will be counted in, and that the Duke will be delighted to have acquired a very fine man."

The advocate took his departure, leaving me petrified. His discourse threw me into such a spasm that in less than an hour I thought all the fluids in my body were seeking an outlet from their several seats. I! Stripped to my shirt and made a soldier! I! It shall not be! Let us find some way to gain time!

I at once wrote to the officer who was my principal creditor that I would settle; but only with all three of them together in the presence of a notary and witnesses to legalize their release and so make it possible for me to leave at once. It was unlikely that one of them would not be on guard duty the next morning, but I hoped I should gain at least a day; meanwhile I trusted that God in his mercy would send me some ideas.

I wrote a letter[18] to the presiding police magistrate, addressing him as "Monseigneur" and begging for his powerful protection. I said that, having decided to sell my belongings to put an end to the actions at law with which my creditors were seeking to overwhelm me, I begged him to suspend the proceedings, the costs of which I would pay. In addition I asked him to send me a trustworthy man to appraise my possessions as soon as I informed him that I had come to an agreement with the officers who were my creditors, with whom I begged him to intervene on my behalf. It was my valet who delivered the two letters to their respective addresses.

After dinner the officer, who had received my letter and who was demanding two thousand louis, came to my room. He found me in bed, I told him I thought I had fever, and it was with pleasure that I heard him condole with me. He said that he had just been talking with the presiding police magistrate, who had given him my letter to read.

"Your decision to make a settlement," he said, "is the right course; but there is no need for the three of us to be together. I shall have full powers from my two friends, which the notary will accept."

"Sir, all I ask is to see you together, and I do not think you can refuse me that satisfaction."

"You shall have it; but if you are in a hurry I warn you that you cannot have us together until Monday, for one of us is on guard duty for the next four days."

"I will wait until Monday; but give me your word of honor that all legal proceedings will be stopped until then."

"I give it, and here is my hand. In return I ask you for a small favor. I have taken a fancy to your post chaise. I ask you to let me have it for what it cost you."

"Gladly."

"Call the innkeeper and tell him it is my property."

"Certainly."

He summons the innkeeper; I tell him that my chaise is the gentleman's property, and he replies that I can do what I like with it when I have paid him, and so saying he goes. The officer laughs, he says he is sure he will have the chaise, he thanks me, and he leaves.

Two hours later an honest-looking man who spoke good Italian comes to bring me word from the chief of police that my creditors will meet together on the coming Monday, and that it is he who will appraise my belongings. He advises me to stipulate in the settlement that my effects are not to be put up for auction and that my creditors will abide by the values he sets on them. He promises that I will be satisfied. After replying that I will make him a present of a hundred louis, I rise and ask him to look at everything in my two trunks and at my jewels.

After examining everything and saying that my laces alone were worth twenty thousand francs, he assures me that I have more than the value of a hundred thousand francs and that he will privately tell my creditors something very different.

"Counting on that," he said, "try to bring them down to accepting half of what you owe them, and you will leave with half of your effects."

"In that case you shall have fifty louis, and in the meanwhile here are six."

"I accept them. Rely on my friendship. Everyone in Stuttgart is aware that your creditors are scoundrels; and the Duke knows them; but he thinks it proper to pretend he is unaware of their machinations."

After these two successes I breathed again. Having five days before me, I must use them to make sure of escaping with all of my possessions except my carriage. It was difficult, but not as difficult as escaping from the Leads. So I must not be found wanting either in boldness or in plans. I sent word to La Toscani, Balletti, and the dancer Binetti, inviting them to supper. I needed to discuss the thing with people who had nothing to fear from the wrath of my three persecutors.

After a good supper I give my three friends a full account of my situation and tell them my decision to escape without losing any of my belongings.

Binetti speaks first. He says that if I can get out of the inn and go to his house I can get out through one of the windows, that I shall then be in the open country a hundred paces from the highroad, whence I can travel by post beyond the Duke's State. Balletti looks out the window of my room, which gave onto the street, and decides that I cannot get out by it because of the wooden roof of a shop. I agree with him, and I say I will find some other way to get out of the inn and that what troubles me is my luggage. La Toscani says I must abandon my trunks and send everything I have to her, and that she will undertake to send me everything wherever I decide to stop.

"I will carry it all away," she says, "little by little, under my petticoats."

Balletti tells her his wife will help her, and we finish laying our plan. I promise Binetti that I will be at his house at midnight on Sunday, even if I have to kill the sentry who was always at the door of my room except at night. The sentry locked me in, went off to bed, and came back the next morning. Balletti vouches for a faithful servant of his and undertakes to have him on the highroad in a post carriage which will be waiting for me. La Toscani adds that all my possessions can be loaded onto the same carriage in other trunks. She at once began carrying off two suits, putting them under her skirt. During the following days three women helped me to such effect that by midnight on Saturday my trunks were empty and so was my strongbox, everything valuable in which I put into my pockets.

On Sunday La Toscani brought me the keys to two trunks into which she had put all my clothes, and Balletti came to assure me for the first time that a post carriage would be on the highroad at my orders under the care of his servant. Unquestionably certain of all this, I contrived my escape from the inn as follows:

The soldier who walked back and forth at the door of my room was in the habit of leaving as soon as he saw that I was in bed. He wished me good night, locked the door, put the key in his pocket, and went. He returned in the morning, but he did not open my door until I called. Then my valet came in.

The soldier on duty was also in the habit of eating what I sent him from my own supper on a small table outside. So these are the instructions I gave my Spaniard:

"After supping," I said, "instead of going to bed I will make ready to leave my room, and I will leave it as soon as I see no more light outside. Once out of the room I will go down the stairs and I shall have no trouble leaving the inn. I will go straight to Binetti's and from there I will get out of the city and I will go to Fürstenberg[19] and wait for you there. Nobody can keep you from leaving tomorrow or the next day. So as soon as you see that I am ready in my room, you must put out the candle which will be on the table where the sentry will be eating supper; you can easily put it out as you snuff it. You will take it to my room to light it again; and I will seize the moment of darkness to leave. When you have lit the candle again you will go back to the soldier and finish the bottle of wine. When you tell him

I have gone to bed he will come to bid me good night as usual, he will lock me in, and leave with you. There is no likelihood that he will come in and speak to me when he sees me in bed."

To deceive the soldier I put a wig-block in a nightcap on the bolster and propped up the covers in such a way that anyone would be deceived. And it all went off very well, as I learned from Leduc three days later, in full detail.

While Leduc was drinking with the sentry I stood with my pelisse over my naked body, a hunting knife in my belt because I no longer had a sword, and two pistols in my pockets.

As soon as the darkness outside assured me that the candle had been extinguished, I left the room, went downstairs, and left by the inn door without meeting anyone. It was a quarter before midnight. I hurry along to Binetti's house; by the moonlight I see his wife waiting for me at a window. She comes and opens the door for me, I go upstairs with her, and, not losing an instant, she takes me to the window by which I am to get out; Balletti's wife was there to help let me down, and her husband was in mud up to his knees to catch me. I began by throwing my pelisse down to him.

The two charming women put a rope around my chest under the arms and, holding its two ends, gradually let them out in time with my very smooth, easy, and completely safe descent. Never was man better served. Balletti caught me in his arms, gave me my pelisse, then told me to follow him.

Defying sloughs into which we sank up to our knees and making our way through holes worn by dogs wherever hedges obstructed our path or over stiles to keep cattle out, we reached the highroad very tired, though it was only three or four hundred paces from the rampart. We covered the same distance to reach the carriage, which stood waiting for me at an isolated pothouse. Balletti's manservant was sitting in it. He got out at once, saying that the postilion had just gone into the pothouse and would come back when he had drunk a mug of beer. I at once took his place, and after tipping him well I told his master to go back with him and leave me to deal with all the rest.

It was April 2nd [20] in the year 1760, my birthday, which all my life has been noteworthy for some incident.

Two minutes later the postilion comes out of the pothouse and asks me if we shall have long to wait, believing that he is speaking to the same person with whom he had set out from Cannstatt. I do not enlighten him, I tell him to go to Tübingen without stopping to change horses at Waldenbuch,[21] and he obeys me; but I laughed to see the face he made when he saw me at Tübingen. Balletti's valet was very young and decidedly short; when he told me I was not the person with whom he had set off, I replied that he must be drunk, and, satisfied with the two florins I tipped him, he did not retort. I left at once, and I did not stop until I reached Fürstenberg, where I was safe.

After supping well and sleeping even better, I wrote the same letter to each of the three officers. I challenged all three of them to a duel, telling them bluntly that if they did not come I would never utter their names again without adding that they were the lowest of the low. I promised to wait for them for three days from the time I was writing, hoping to kill all three of them and thus become famous throughout Europe. I also wrote to La Toscani, to Balletti, and to La Binetti, asking them to look after my valet.

The officers did not come, but during the three days the innkeeper's daughters made the time pass as pleasantly as I could wish.

On the fourth day at noon I saw Leduc ride up at full gallop with his portmanteau roped to his saddle. The first thing he said was that I ought to go to Switzerland, for the whole city of Stuttgart knew I was there and I had reason to fear that the three officers might take their revenge by having me murdered. After I let him know that I did not want his advice, he told me the whole story of what happened after my escape. Here it is, just as he related it.

"After you left," he said, "I went to bed. The next morning at nine o'clock the sentry came to walk up and down by your door, and at ten the three officers arrived. When I told them you were still asleep they left, telling me to fetch them from the coffeehouse as soon as your room was unlocked; but not seeing me they came back about noon and ordered the sentry to open your door. I enjoyed the next scene.

"They think they see you asleep, they wish you good morning, go to your bed, shake you, the straw gives way, the wig-block falls, and seeing them dumfounded I cannot hold back my laughter. 'So you're laughing, you dog. You shall tell us where your master has gone.'

"The words being accompanied by a cut from a cane I reply with a curse that they have only to ask the sentry. The sentry says you can only have got out through the window, but the corporal is summoned, and the innocent soldier is arrested just the same. The innkeeper comes up at the noise, he opens the trunks, and, seeing they are empty, he says your post chaise will pay him; and ignores the officer who protests that you had given it to him.

"Another officer appears and, after hearing the story, he decides you can only have got out through the window, so he orders the soldier released; for me, however, they had only the foulest injustice. As I went on saying that I did not know where you had gone and that I couldn't help having laughed, they saw fit to put me in prison.

They said I would be kept there until I told where you were, or, if not you, at least your possessions.

"The next day one of the officers came and told me I would be sent to the galleys if I persisted in holding my tongue. I replied that, on the word of a Spaniard, I knew nothing about it; but that even if I did know I would never tell, for in honor I could not become a spy on my own master. At that the gentleman ordered a turnkey to give me a lashing, and after the ceremony I was set free. I went to bed at the inn, and the next morning all Stuttgart knew that you were here, where you had challenged the officers to come and fight. They are not such fools, people say, as to do that; but Madame Binetti ordered me to tell you to leave here, because they might have you murdered. The innkeeper sold your post chaise and your trunks to the Viennese Envoy, who, they say, arranged for you to get out by the windows of the apartment which he rents to La Binetti. I took the post without anyone trying to stop me, and here I am."

Three hours after he arrived I took the post to Schaffhausen and from there I went to Zurich with hired horses, because in Switzerland there is no post.[22] I put up very comfortably at the "Sword."[23]

Alone after supper in the wealthiest city in Switzerland, into which I had, as it were, dropped from the clouds, for I was there without the least premeditation, I give myself up to reflections on my present situation and my past life. I recall the good and the bad which has befallen me and I examine my conduct. I find that I have drawn upon myself all the evils from which I have suffered and that I have abused all the favors Fortune had done me. Still under the impression of the disaster which I have just barely avoided, I shudder and decide to stop being Fortune's plaything and put myself beyond her reach. Being possessed of a hundred[24] thousand écus, I determine to invest it in a way to secure me a permanent income subject to no fluctuation. Perfect peace is the greatest good of all.

Thus deliberating I go to bed, and pleasant dreams make me happy in peaceful solitudes, in abundance, and in tranquillity. I seemed, in a beautiful countryside which belonged to me, to enjoy a freedom which is sought in vain in society. I was dreaming, but even while I dreamed I told myself that I was not dreaming. A sudden awakening at daybreak gives me the lie; I feel angry, and, determined to realize my dream, I get up, I dress, and get out, not caring where I am going.

An hour after leaving the city I am among a number of mountains; I should have thought I had lost my way if I had not continued to see ruts which assured me that the road would lead me to some hospitable place. Every quarter of an hour I came upon peasants; but I took pleasure in not asking them for any directions. After walking slowly for six hours I suddenly found myself in a great plain between four mountains. To my left I have a beautiful distant view of a large church attached to a building of symmetrical design which invites passing travelers to direct their steps thither. As I approach I see that it can only be a convent or a monastery, and I feel glad that I am in a Catholic canton.

I enter the church, I see that it is resplendent with marble and altar ornaments, and after hearing the last mass I go into the sacristy, where I see Benedictine monks. One of them, whom I judged by the cross he wore to be the Abbot, asks me if I wish to see all the things worth seeing in the sanctuary, which I can do without going outside the altar rail; I reply that it will be an honor and a pleasure, and he comes himself, with two other monks, to show me extremely rich ornaments, chasubles covered with large pearls, and sacred vessels covered with diamonds and other precious stones.

Having a very poor knowledge of German and none at all of the Swiss dialect, which is to German as Genoese is to Italian, I ask the Abbot in Latin if the church has been long built, and he tells me its history in detail, ending by informing me that it is the only church[25] which was consecrated by Jesus Christ in person. He notices my astonishment, and to convince me that he has told the pure and simple truth he takes me into the church and shows me on the surface of the marble five concavities which the fingers of Jesus Christ had left in it when he consecrated the church. He had left these impressions[26] so that unbelievers could not doubt the miracle and to save the Father Superior the trouble of sending for the diocesan Bishop to consecrate it. The same Father Superior had learned the aforesaid truth by divine revelation in a dream which told him distinctly to think no more of it because the church was divinitus consecrata (''consecrated by God''), in proof of which he would see the five concavities in such and such a place in the church. The Father Superior went there, saw them, and thanked God.

CHAPTER IV

I resolve to become a monk. I make my confession. Delay of two weeks. Giustiniani, the apostate Capuchin. I change my mind; what leads me to do so. Escapade at the inn. Dinner with the Abbot.

THE ABBOT, delighted by the obedient attention with which I had listened to his nonsense, asked me where I was lodging, and I replied "Nowhere," because when I had arrived from Zurich on foot I had simply entered his church. He then joins his hands and lifts them to heaven, as if to thank God for so touching my heart that I have gone on a pilgrimage to carry my sins there, for, to tell the truth, I have always looked like a great sinner. He said that, it being noon, he would consider it an honor if I would go and dine with him, and I accepted. I did not yet know where I was, and I did not want to ask, well satisfied to let it be believed I had come there on a pilgrimage expressly to expiate my crimes. On the way he said that his monks were fasting but that I could eat meat with him since he had obtained a dispensation from Benedict XIV which allowed him to eat meat every day with three guests. I replied that I should be glad to share the privilege. As soon as we entered his apartment he showed me the dispensation, framed under glass and hanging on the tapestried wall opposite the table, where it could be read by the curious and the scrupulous. Since there were only two places, a servant in livery quickly set another. He immediately introduced me to the third at table, saying that he was his Chancellor.[1]

"I am obliged," he said with the greatest modesty, "to have a chancellery, since, as Abbot of Our Lady of Einsiedeln, I am also a prince[2] of the Holy Roman Empire."

I breathed again. At last I knew where I was, and I felt very glad, for I had both read and heard of Our Lady of the Hermits. It was the cisalpine Loreto.[3] At table the Prince-Abbot took it upon himself to ask me from what country I came, if I was married, and if I intended to make a tour of Switzerland, offering me letters of introduction for wherever I wished to go. I replied that I was Venetian and unmarried and that I would accept the letters with which he was so kind as to honor me when I had told him who I was in a conference I hoped to have with him, in which I would acquaint him with all matters which concerned my conscience.

It was thus that I bound myself to confess to him, without the idea having entered my head the moment before. It was my foible. I thought I was simply doing what God willed whenever I carried out some unpremeditated idea which came into my head from nowhere. After I had thus to all intents and purposes told him that he was to be my confessor, he treated me to discourses full of unction, which did not bore me during a very choice dinner, including, among other things, woodcock and snipe.

"What, most reverend Father! Game of this sort at this season?"[4]

"It is a secret, Monsieur, which I will be glad to tell you. I keep it for six months in such a way that the air cannot spoil it."

The Prince-Abbot was an accomplished epicure as well as a fine judge of wine, though he affected sobriety. His Rhine wine was exquisite. A salmon trout was served, he smiled, he told me in Ciceronian Latin that there would be pride in refusing to eat it because it was fish, and he supported his sophism with great skill. He watched me attentively; his examination of my dress relieved him of any fear that I would ask him for money, and I saw that it gave him confidence. After dinner he dismissed the Chancellor, showed me all over the monastery, and finally took me to the library, where I saw a portrait of the Elector of Cologne[5] as Elector-Bishop. I said it was a good likeness except that the painter had made him less handsome than he was, and I immediately showed him his portrait in my fine snuffbox, which I had never taken from my pocket during our dinner. He laughingly praised His Electoral Highness's whim of having himself painted as Grand Master and admired the beauty of the snuffbox, meanwhile conceiving a higher and higher idea of me. But the library[6] would have made me protest aloud if I had been alone. It consisted entirely of folios. The most modern among them were a century old, and all these bulky books treated of nothing but religion: Bibles, commentators, the Fathers, several legists[7] in German, annals, and Hoffmann's great dictionary.[8]

"But your monks," I said, "must have books on the physical sciences, history, and travel in their rooms."

"No," he said, "they are honest fellows whose only concern is to do their duty and live in peace."

It was then that I first felt a desire to become a monk, but I did not tell him so. I simply asked him to take me to his study, where I would make him a general confession of my manifold sins, so that on the next day, absolved from all my crimes, I could receive the Holy Eucharist from him, and he at once conducted me to a small pavilion, where he would not let me kneel. He made me sit down facing him, and in less than three hours I told him a quantity of stories which were scandalous enough but devoid of literary grace since I had to use the style of a penitent, though when I recounted my follies I could not find it in my heart to condemn them. Nevertheless he at least did not doubt my attrition;[9] he said that contrition would come when, by a regular course of conduct, I had regained grace; for according to him, and even more according to me, without grace it was impossible to feel contrition. So, after uttering the words which have power to absolve the whole human race, he advised me to retire to a room which he appointed for me, to spend the rest of the day in prayer, and to go to bed early after supping, if it was my habit to sup. He said that I should communicate the next day at the first mass, and we parted.

Alone in my room, I pursued the idea which had come to me before I confessed. I thought I saw that I was really in the place where I could live happily until my final hour, escaping once and for all from the sway of Fortune. I believed it depended only upon me, for I felt certain that the Abbot would not refuse me the habit of his order, provided I gave him, for example, ten thousand écus to furnish me an income which would go to the monastery after my death. To be happy I thought I needed only a library, and I was sure I should be allowed to make it of what books I pleased, provided I presented it to the monastery, only reserving to myself free use of it during my lifetime. As for the society of the monks, the discord and the petty spites which I knew to be inseparable from their nature, I was sure that I would not be troubled in that way, since, wanting nothing and having no ambition which could arouse their jealousy, I had nothing to fear. I foresaw that I might repent, and I shuddered with horror; but I was pleased to think I could circumvent even that. When I asked for the habit of St. Benedict I would ask for a delay of ten years before I decided to make my profession. In any case I was resolved not to aspire to any office or any monastic dignity; I wanted only to enjoy my peace and all the decent freedom which I could claim without giving rise to the slightest scandal. To induce the Abbot to grant me the ten years' novitiate I intended to ask of him, I would make it a condition that I would forfeit the ten thousand écus I would have given him in advance if I decided to renounce the habit. I put my whole plan in writing, I slept on it, and the next morning after receiving the Holy Sacrament I presented it to the Abbot, who was expecting me to take a cup of chocolate with him.

He read it before we breakfasted, he said nothing, and, having read it again while walking up and down, he said he would answer me in the afternoon.

After dinner the worthy Abbot told me that his carriage was ready to take me to Zurich, where he asked me to wait two weeks for his answer. He promised to bring it to me himself and gave me two sealed letters, begging me not to fail to deliver them in person.

"Most reverend Father, I am infinitely obliged to Your Highness, I will deliver your letters, I will wait for you at the 'Sword,' and I hope you will grant my dearest wish."

I took his hand, which he modestly allowed me to kiss.

When my Spaniard saw me he gave a laugh which told me what he was thinking.

"What are you laughing at?"

"I am laughing at your having found something to amuse you for two days when you have scarcely arrived."

"Tell the innkeeper that I want a carriage at my disposal every day for two weeks and a good hire manservant."

The innkeeper, whose name was Ott[10] and who had the title of Captain, came in person to tell me that in Zurich there were only open carriages; I made the best of it, and he vouched to me for the honesty of the hire manservant. The next day I took my letters to their addresses; they were to Monsieur Orelli[11] and Monsieur Pestalozzi,[12] neither of whom was at home. They both came to call on me in the afternoon, they invited me to dinner, each fixing a day, and asked me at once to go with them to the municipal concert, since it was the only entertainment in the city, though restricted to subscribing citizens and to foreigners who paid an écu, but they said I must go as a citizen and they outdid each other in praise of the Abbot of Einsiedeln.

The concert, which was only instrumental, bored me. The men were all on one side, where I sat between my two sponsors; the women were all on the other, which annoyed me, for despite my recent conversion I saw three or four whom I thought attractive, who kept looking at me, and with whom I would gladly have flirted. At the end of the concert the departure of the audience broke up the division, and the two citizens introduced their wives and daughters to me; the two daughters were actually the most charming girls in Zurich. The ceremonies in the street were very short, so, after thanking the gentlemen, I went back to my inn. The next day I ate family dinner with Monsieur Orelli, where I duly praised his daughter's merits but without indicating by the slightest of the usual little liberties that I might have taken a fancy to her. The next day at Monsieur Pestalozzi's I played exactly the same role, despite the fact that the young lady could very easily have inspired me to gallantry. To my great astonishment I was perfectly discreet, and within four days everyone in Zurich knew that my behavior was exemplary. I noticed in the public promenades that people looked at me with respect, which was something entirely new to me. I became more and more persuaded that my idea of becoming a monk was a genuine vocation. I felt bored, but I saw that such a sudden change in my way of life could not but produce that effect. My boredom would vanish when I had become accustomed to being good. I spent three hours each morning with a language teacher who instructed me in German; he was Italian, a native of Genoa, his name was Giustiniani,[13] he had been a Capuchin, and despair had driven him to apostasy. The poor man, to whom I gave an écu of six francs[14] every day, considered me an angel, an instrument of Providence, and in the folly of my supposed vocation I took him for a devil straight from Hell, for he seized every moment when I interrupted his interminable lesson to denigrate all religious communities to me, and the ones which presented the best appearance were, according to him, the most corrupting since they were the most attractive. He solemnly termed all monks the vilest scum of the human race.

"But," I said to him one day, "Our Lady of Einsiedeln, for example? You will admit—"

"What! It is a gang of eighty lazy, ignorant, vicious hypocrites, real swine who—"

"But His Most Reverend Highness the Abbot?"

"An upstart peasant, who plays the prince and is conceited enough to think he is one."

"But so he is."

"Nonsense—it is a mask; I consider him nothing but a clown."

"What has he done to you?"

"Nothing. He is a monk."

"He is my friend."

"If that is so, forgive me for what I said."

Yet Giustiniani was undermining me. At six in the afternoon on the fourteenth day of my supposed conversion, the day before that on which the Abbot had promised to visit me, I was at my window which gave on the bridge and from which I saw both the people passing by and everyone who arrived at my inn by carriage. I see a four-horse carriage arrive at a fast trot, it stops at the entrance, the waiter goes to open the carriage door, for there was no footman up behind, and I see four well-dressed women get out. I see nothing unusual in the first three, but the fourth, who was dressed en amazone[15] as the expression went, strikes me. A young brunette, with very large, black, prominent eyes under two fearless brows, with a lily complexion and cheeks of roses, wearing a blue satin bonnet from which dangled a silver tassel which hung over one ear—she is a talisman which stupefies me. I lean over the window sill to gain ten inches, and she raises her charming head as if I had called to her. My strange posture makes her look at me attentively for half a minute—too much for a modest woman. She enters, I run to the window of my anteroom, which gave on the corridor, and I see her coming quickly up to overtake her companions, who had already gone by. When she is opposite my window she happens to turn her head, and, seeing me standing there, she falls back half a step, crying out as if she had seen a ghost, but she recovers in an instant, bursts out laughing, and runs into the room in which her three friends were.

Defend yourselves, mortals, against such an encounter, if you have the strength. Persist, if you can, fanatics, in the mad idea of burying yourselves in a monastery after seeing what I saw then in Zurich on the twenty-third day of April. I sank onto my bed to calm myself. Five or six minutes later I go back to the window on the corridor, and seeing the waiter leaving the room of the new arrivals I tell him I will sup downstairs at the common table.

"If you want to sup there to see those ladies, it is no use. They will sup in their room at eight o'clock so that they can leave tomorrow at daybreak."

"Where are they going?"

"To Einsiedeln to perform their devotions. They are all Catholics."

"Where are they from?"

"From Soleure."

"What are their names?"

"I have no idea."

I lie down on my bed again, I consider going to Einsiedeln. But what will I do there? They are going to confess, to receive communion, to talk with God, with the saints, with the monks; what sort of figure shall I cut? Then, too, I may meet the Abbot on the road, in which case, no matter what the cost, I shall have to retrace my steps. I dismiss the idea; but I see that if I had such a friend as I wished I had, I would set up an ambuscade and carry off the Amazon, than which nothing would have been easier for they were unaccompanied. I consider going and boldly asking them for supper, but I am afraid the other pious pilgrims will refuse me; I thought the Amazon could only be pious for form's sake, since her physiognomy was eloquent, and it had been long since any woman's physiognomy had been able to deceive me.

But suddenly the happiest idea comes into my agitated mind. I go to my window on the corridor and stay there until the waiter passes; I call him into my room, give him a louis, and tell him he must instantly lend me a green apron like his own, for I want to serve the ladies at table.

"What are you laughing at?"

"I am laughing at your notion. I will fetch you the apron. The prettiest of the ladies asked me who you are."

"Possibly, for she saw me as she went by, but she will not recognize me. What did you tell her?"

"Only that you are an Italian."

"Remember to hold your tongue."

Figures of Contradance "La nouvelle de Lille"

"I asked your Spaniard to come and serve at supper, for I am all alone and I have the table downstairs."

"He is not to come into the room while I am playing my role, for the idiot couldn't help laughing, and everything would be ruined. Call him. He shall take care of going to the kitchen and bringing me the dishes outside."

The waiter comes back up with the apron and Leduc. I tell him perfectly gravely what I want him to do; he laughs like an idiot but promises he will obey me. So I have them bring me the carving knife, I do up my hair in a cadogan,[16] I put the apron over a scarlet waistcoat laced with gold, I examine myself in the mirror, and I find I have the look of baseness and false modesty demanded by the part I am to play. I am in raptures. They come from Soleure. They speak French.[17] Leduc comes to tell me that the waiter is ready to bring up the supper. I enter their room and, looking at the table, say:

"You will be served at once, Mesdames."

"Then be quick about it," said the ugliest, "we have to get up before daylight."

I arrange the chairs, and out of the corner of my eye I see the beauty, who has not moved, I give her a lightning glance, I see that she is startled. I go to meet the waiter, I help him set the dish on the table, and the waiter leaves, saying:

"Stay here, you, I have to serve downstairs."

I take a plate and set it before the one who has wounded me; I did not look at her, but I saw her perfectly, in fact I saw nothing else. She was astonished; the others did not even notice me. I hurry to change her plate, then I quickly change the others; they all help themselves to the soup, and in the meanwhile I carve a capon au gros sel [18] in their presence with marvelous skill.

"That," said my charmer, "is a waiter who serves well. Have you been long in service here, my lad?"

"Only a few weeks, Madame. You are too kind."

I had hidden my cuffs, which were of needlepoint, under the sleeves of my vest and had buttoned it at the wrists; but, the frill beginning to show a little at the opening, she said to me:

"Wait, wait."

"What do you wish, Madame?"

"Let me look. This is magnificent lace."

"Yes, Madame, so I have been told; but it is old. An Italian nobleman who stopped here gave it to me."

So saying, I let her pull out the whole cuff; which she did slowly and not looking at me, yet putting me very much at my ease so that I could enjoy her charming face to the full. What a delicious moment! I knew she had recognized me, and, seeing that she was keeping my secret, how I grieved at the thought that I could only carry my masquerade just so far. One of her friends finally made her stop examining my cuff by saying:

"What curiosity! One would think you had never seen lace."

My heroine blushed. Supper over, they each went into a corner to undress while I cleared the table; but the beauty sat down to write. I was very nearly conceited enough to think she was writing to me. After carrying everything away, I remained at the door.

"What are you waiting for?" she asked me.

"You are wearing boots, Madame. Unless you mean to go to bed with them on."

"Right you are. I am sorry I have to put you to so much trouble."

"Isn't that what I'm for, Madame?"

I having gone down on my knees, she surrendered her legs to me and went on writing; I unlaced her boots, I took them off, then I unbuckled the kneeband of her breeches so that I could take off her stockings and have the pleasure of seeing and touching her calves, but she stopped writing and said:

"That's enough, that's enough, I wasn't aware you were going to so much trouble. We shall see each other again tomorrow evening."

"Then you will be supping here, Mesdames?"

"Certainly."

I left, taking her boots with me and asking her if she wanted me to lock the room or to leave the key inside.

"Leave it inside, my lad, I will lock the door myself."

I went away, and she immediately locked herself in. My Spaniard at once relieved me of the boots and, laughing like a maniac, says she has caught me.

"What do you mean?"

"I saw everything. You played your part like an angel, and I'm sure that tomorrow morning she'll tip you a louis, but if you don't give it to me I will tell everything."

"There, you scoundrel, take it in advance, and bring me supper."

Such were the pleasures of my life, which I can no longer obtain; but I have the pleasure of enjoying them again by recalling them. Yet there are monsters who preach repentance, and stupid philosophers who say they are only vanities.

I slept with the Amazon in imagination, a factitious satisfaction but unalloyed; and I was at her door the next morning, carrying her cleaned boots, just when the coachman came to tell them to get up. I asked them for form's sake if they wanted breakfast, and they laughed and said they had no appetite. I went out to let them dress; but the door being open, my eyes breakfasted on an alabaster breast. She summoned me and asked where her boots were, and I begged her to let me lace them. As she already had her stockings on and was wearing velvet breeches, she acted as if she were a man—and besides, what is a waiter? So much the worse for him if he dares to hope that anything substantial will follow some trifle he is granted. He will be punished, for he will never be bold enough to press on. Today in my old age I have some privileges of that sort, and I enjoy them, despising myself but also despising the women who grant them to me.

After she left I went back to bed, and on waking I learned that the Abbot was in Zurich. Monsieur Ott told me an hour later that he would dine with me alone in my room. I said that it was my part to pay and that he was to treat us like princes.

The worthy prelate entered my room at noon and congratulated me on the good reputation I had gained in Zurich, from which he concluded that my vocation was still in force.

"Here," he said, "is a distich which you shall put over the door of your apartment:

> Inveni portum. Spes et fortuna valete;
> Nil mihi vobiscum est: ludite nunc alios."

> ("I have reached port. Hope and Fortune, farewell; I have nothing to do with you: henceforth make others your playthings.")[19]

"It is a translation," I said, "of two lines of Greek by Euripides;[20] but they can serve some other time, for since yesterday I have changed my mind."

He congratulated me, saying that he hoped all my desires would be fulfilled and assuring me confidentially that it was easier to earn salvation by remaining in the world than by retiring to a monastery. This language did not seem to me that of a hypocrite but that of an honest and sensible man. After dinner I expressed all possible gratitude to him, I accompanied him to the door of his carriage, and I saw him set off well content. I at once went to the window of my room which overlooked the bridge, there to wait for the angel who had come from Soleure expressly to deliver me from the temptation of becoming a monk. The most beautiful of castles in Spain delighted me until the arrival of her carriage. It arrives at six o'clock, I hide, but in a position to watch the ladies alight. I see them, and I am annoyed that all four of them look at the window at which the beauty had seen me on the previous day. Their curiosity, which could not exist unless the beauty had revealed the whole secret, showed me that she had told all, and I was nonplused. I was stripped not only of the hope of carrying the charming adventure further but also of my confidence that I could play my role well; I foresaw that I might well lose my stage presence, become annoyed, and be hissed; these ideas spoiled everything; I was instantly determined not to play a farce for them in which I could only laugh out of the wrong side of my mouth. If I had interested the Amazon as she had interested me, she would not have given the game away; she had told them all; so she did not intend to carry the thing further, or else she lacked the intelligence to see that her indiscretion stopped me in my tracks, for two of the three others actually repelled me, and if a woman whom I find pleasing sets me up a woman whom I find repulsive pulls me down. Foreseeing all sorts of tiresome consequences if I did not appear at the table, I went out. I ran into Giustiniani, and when I told him I felt very much like spending a couple of hours with some young and mercenary beauty, he took me to a door where he said I would find what I wanted on the third floor if I whispered his name to the old woman I would see there. He did not dare come with me, because someone might find it out and cause him trouble in a city where the police were very strict in that department. He even told me I ought not to enter the house until I was sure I would not be seen, and I waited until dusk. I went there; I ate poorly but had a sufficiently amusing time with two young working girls until midnight. My generosity, which was a thing unknown in that country, won me the friendship of the old woman, who promised me treasures of the same sort if I continued to come to her house, taking every care not to be seen.

Upon my return Leduc told me I had done well to slip away, for the whole inn had learned of my masquerade, and everyone, including Monsieur Ott, would have had great sport lurking outside of the room to see me play the role of waiter, which, as I could not but have noticed them, would have made me very angry.

"It was I," he said, "who took your place. The lady's name is V. . . .[21] I never saw anything so appetizing."

"Did she ask where the other waiter was?"

"No. But the others asked me, several times."

"And Madame de V . . . never said anything?"

"Not once. She was gloomy, even to the point of pretending not to be interested in you when I told her that the waiter who had served them yesterday had not come because he was ill."

"Why did you say I was ill?"

"I had to say something."

"Did you unlace her boots?"

"She wouldn't let me."

"Who told you her name?"

"Their coachman. She's just been married[22] to an old man."

I retired to bed, and early the next morning I went to the window to watch them get into their carriage; but I stayed behind the curtain. Madame was the last, and, for an excuse to look up, she asked if it was raining and took off her satin bonnet. I quickly took off my nightcap, and she saluted me with a most gracious smile.

CHAPTER V

I leave Zurich. Comic incident at Baden. Soleure. Monsieur de Chavigny. Monsieur and Madame . . . . I act in a play. I feign illness to forward my good fortune.

MONSIEUR OTT came to my room to introduce his two young sons[1] to me; they were with their tutor, who brought them up like princes. In Switzerland an innkeeper is often a man who keeps a fine house and presides over a table at which he thinks it no disgrace to take money from those who come there to dine. He is right; he sits at the head of it only to see that each of his guests is properly served. If he has a son he does not let him sit at the table but makes him serve at it. In Schaffhausen the son of the innkeeper, a captain in the Imperial army, stood behind my chair to change my plate while his father dined with all the guests. He would not have done it elsewhere; but in his father's house he considered it an honor; and he was right. Such is the opinion of the Swiss, which some superficial minds see fit to ridicule. However, it is true that the Swiss, like the Dutch, fleece foreigners when they can; but the fools who let themselves be fleeced deserve it; terms must be settled in advance. It was thus that, in Basel, I protected myself against Imhof[2] who was notorious for fleecing his patrons at the "Three Kings."

My host congratulated me on my waiter's disguise; he said he was sorry he could not have seen me, and he praised me for not having repeated the masquerade at the second supper. After thanking me for the honor I had done his establishment he asked me also to grant him that of dining at his table at least once before I left. I promised I would dine at it that very day.

Determined to go to Soleure to court the beautiful Amazon, I obtained a letter of credit on Geneva. I wrote Madame d'Urfé to send me a strong letter for Monsieur de Chavigny,[3] the French Ambassador, whose countenance I told her I greatly needed for the interests of our Order,[4] and to dispatch it to me as quickly as possible in care of the post at Soleure. I wrote several other letters, among them one to the Duke of Württemberg which must have left a bitter taste in his mouth.

At my host's table at the inn I found staff officers, good fare, and a magnificent dessert of confectionery. After dinner I lost a hundred louis at passe-dix,[5] and the same sum the next day at the house of a rather wealthy young man who invited me to dinner. His name was Escher.[6]

On four ot my days in Zurich I amused myself at the house of the woman to whom Giustiniani had sent me—but not at all successfully, for the girls she got for me only spoke a thick Swiss dialect. Without words the pleasure of love is lessened by at least two thirds. In Switzerland I made the same odd observation which I made in Genoa. Both the Swiss and the Genoese, who speak very badly, write very well.

I had scarcely left Zurich before I had to stop at Baden[7] to get a carriage I had bought repaired. It is the city in which the deputies from the cantons hold their general assembly. I put off my departure in order to dine with a Polish lady who was going to Einsiedeln, but after dinner I had an amusing adventure. At her own urging I danced with the innkeeper's daughter; it was a Sunday. The innkeeper comes out, his daughter runs away, and the scoundrel declares I must pay a fine of one louis; and he shows me a placard which I cannot read. I refuse to pay; I appeal to the judge of the place, he goes off, acquiescing. A quarter of an hour later he summons me to a room in his inn, where I see him with a wig and a gavel; he tells me he is the judge. He writes, he confirms my sentence, and I have to give him another écu because he has written. I said that if his daughter had not tempted me into it I would not have danced, whereupon he pays a louis for his daughter. I had to laugh. I left the next morning very early.

At Lucerne I saw the Papal Nuncio,[8] who invited me to dinner, and at Fribourg[9] Count d'Affry's wife,[10] who was young and giddy; but now for what I saw eight or ten leagues before arriving at Soleure.

At nightfall I was taking a walk with the surgeon of the village. A hundred paces from me I see a man climbing up the outside of a house, reaching a window, and going in.[11] I point him out to the surgeon, he laughs and tells me it is a peasant lad going to spend the night alone with his fiancée.

"He spends the whole night with her," he said, "and he leaves in the morning more in love than ever because she has not granted him the final favors. If she did, he might not marry her, and she would find it very hard to get a new lover."

At the post station in Soleure[12] I found a letter from Madame d'Urfé enclosing one from the Duke of Choiseul addressed to Monsieur de Chavigny, Ambassador. It was sealed, but the name of the minister who had written it was on the outside. I hire a carriage by the day, I dress as I would for Versailles, I go to the door of the Ambassador's residence, he is not receiving, and I leave the letter for him. It was a feast day, I go to the last mass, where I do not see the beautiful lady, and after taking a little stroll I return to my inn. An officer was waiting for me with an invitation from the Ambassador to dine "at the Court."[13]

Madame d'Urfé wrote me in her letter that she had gone straight to Versailles and that she was sure the Duchess of Gramont[14] had persuaded the minister to write a most efficacious letter for me. I was very glad, for I intended to play the role of an important personage. The Marquis de Chavigny had been the French Ambassador in Venice thirty years[15] before this time; I knew a great deal about him and I could scarcely wait to make his acquaintance.

I go at the appointed hour, I am not announced, as soon as the double doors are opened for me I see the handsome old man come to meet me, and I hear him address me in the most obliging and courtly terms. He introduces all his entourage to me; then, pretending to have misread my name, he takes from his pocket the Duke of Choiseul's letter and reads aloud the passage in which he asks him to show me every consideration. He makes me sit down at his right on a sofa, and he asks me only such questions as oblige me to say that I am traveling simply for pleasure, that the Swiss nation is in several respects superior to all others, and that this moment is the happiest of my life since it has procured me the honor of his acquaintance.

Dinner is served, and His Excellency gives me the place beside him and on his right. There were fifteen or sixteen places at the table, and each guest was served by a footman in the Ambassador's livery. The conversation turning that way, I said to him that he was still spoken of in Venice with the fondest admiration.

"I shall always remember," he said, "the kindnesses which were shown me during my whole term as Ambassador; but be so good as to name those who still speak of me. They must be very old."

It was just what I wanted. Signor Malipiero had informed me of events during the Regency[16] which had gained him great credit; and Signor Bragadin had told me about his love affair with the celebrated Stringhetta.[17]

His cook was excellent; but the pleasure of talking to him led me to neglect that of eating. I saw him redden in his delight; he said to me as we rose from the table that he had never dined with greater pleasure at Soleure and that my recalling his Venetian gallantries to him had made him young again. He embraced me and asked me to spend all my time at his house, day and night, as long as I remained in Soleure. In his turn he talked much of Venice; after praising its system of government he said there was not a city in the world where one could eat better fare, even on fast days, only provided one made sure to procure good oil and foreign wine. About five o'clock he invited me to take a drive with him in a vis-à-vis,[18] getting into it first so that I should have to take the forward-facing seat.

We got out at a pretty country house, where we were served ices. On the way back to the city he said that he entertained a large company every evening, both men and women, and he hoped that, so far as it lay in his power, I would not be bored. I could scarcely wait to see the company; I thought it impossible that I should not see Madame . . . among them.

People began to arrive. Many of the women were ugly, some passable, and none pretty. Card games were arranged, and I was put at a table with a young blonde and an ancient dame who pretended to wit. Bored and not once opening my mouth, I lost five or six hundred counters. When the time came to pay, the old hand told me they came to three louis.

"Three louis?" I said.

"Yes, Monsieur. Two sous a counter. Did you think we were playing for coppers?"[19]

"On the contrary, Madame. I thought it was for twenty sous,[20] since I never play for less."

She left my boast unanswered, but she blushed.

After walking around the room and not seeing the beauty I hoped to find, I prepared to leave. The Ambassador had retired. I see two ladies talking together and looking at me; I recognize them as the ones I had seen at Zurich with Madame . . . ; I avoid them, and leave.

The next morning one of the Ambassador's household officials comes to tell me that His Excellency is coming and has sent me word so that he will be certain to find me. I said I would wait for him. I tried to think how I could get information about Madame . . . from him, but he saved me the trouble.

A quarter of an hour later I receive the worthy nobleman as it becomes me to do. After some desultory talk he smiled and said he was about to tell me the most unlikely thing imaginable, but he informed me in advance that he did not believe a word of it. After this preamble he said that two ladies who had seen me at the reception, and whose names he told me, had come to his room after I left to warn him to beware, because I was the waiter at the inn at Zurich.

"You waited on them at table ten days ago when they were on their way to perform their devotions at Our Lady of the Hermits—they are sure of it; and they say that yesterday, on the other side of the Aar, they met your fellow waiter, who had apparently run away with you, God knows why. They said that as soon as you realized last evening that they recognized you, you slipped away. I laughed and answered that I would be sure they were mistaken even if you had not brought me a letter from the Duke of Choiseul, and that I would have them to dinner with you today. I said that you might well have disguised yourself as a waiter in the hope of obtaining the favors of one of their party. They said the supposition was ridiculous, that you were nothing but a potboy with a knack for carving a capon and a deft hand at changing everyone's plate; and that they are ready to compliment you on your talents if I will permit it. I replied that they would make you laugh and me too. If there is any truth in this tale be so good as to tell me all the circumstances."

"Every one, and gladly. But we must observe a certain discretion, for it is a comedy which might be injurious to a person whom I would rather die than harm."

"So the story is true? You make me most curious."

"True and not true. I hope that Your Excellency does not believe I am the waiter at the 'Sword.' "

"No. I should never believe that. You played the part."

"Precisely. Did they tell you there were four of them?"

"I know that. There was the beauty too; and now I see the whole thing. You are quite right, discretion is essential, for her reputation is spotless."

"That I did not know. What happened is perfectly innocent, but it might be told with additions which could injure the honor of that charming woman, whose merits filled me with admiration."

I then told him the whole story, ending by saying that I had come to Soleure only to make her acquaintance and, if possible, to court her.

"If it is not possible," I said, "I will leave in three or four days, but not before seeing the two blabbers covered with ridicule, for they must know very well that the waiter was only a mask. They cannot pretend not to know it, except for the express purpose of putting an affront on me and injuring Madame, who was very ill advised to let them into the secret."

"Softly, softly! So many things at once! Let me embrace you. Your story really delights me. Leave it to me. You shall not go away, my dear friend; you shall court Madame. Permit me to laugh. I have been young, and a pair of beautiful eyes has often made me disguise myself too. Today at table with those two mischief-makers you shall prick their bubble, but good-naturedly. The thing is so innocent that even Monsieur . . . will laugh over it. His wife cannot but know that you love her, I presume?''

''She must have seen into my soul even though I did no more than take off her boots.''

''Funnier and funnier.''

He went away laughing, and at the door of his carriage he embraced me for the third time. Certain, as I could not but be, that Madame . . . had told her three companions everything she knew before returning to Zurich, the . . . joke[21] with which the two harridans had gone to the Ambassador struck me as both malicious and perfidious; but my heart's interests obliged me to let their calumny pass as wit.

At half past one I enter the Embassy and after making my most humble bow to the Ambassador I see the two ladies. I ask the one who looked the more malicious, who limped, and whose name was F., if she recognizes me.

''Then you admit you are the waiter at the inn in Zurich.''

''Yes, Madame. I was for an hour, to have the honor of seeing you close by; and you punished me by never addressing a word to me; I hope I shall not be so unfortunate here, and that you will permit me to pay court to you.''

''This is amazing. You played the waiter so well that no one could have guessed you were playing a part. We shall now see if you play your present role as skillfully; and if you will come to call on me I shall be honored.''

After this compliment the whole company learned the story; and just then Madame . . . arrives with her husband. She sees me and instantly says to him:

"There's the waiter at Zurich."

The worthy man thanks me most politely for having done his wife the honor of taking off her boots. I see that she has told him everything and I am glad. Monsieur de Chavigny seated her on his right, and my place at the table proved to be between the two women who had calumniated me.

Though they both repelled me, I flirted with them, having the firmness scarcely ever to look at Madame . . . , who was even more beautiful than she had been in riding clothes. Her husband did not seem either jealous or as old as I had supposed. The Ambassador invited them both to his ball, and he asked her to play the heroine in L'Écossaise[22] again, so that I could tell the Duke of Choiseul I had been well entertained at Soleure. She replied that there were two actors missing; he offered to play Lord Monrose and I instantly said I would play Murray. The arrangement infuriating my table companion F., for it left her to play the hateful role of Lady Alton, she let fly a shaft at me.

"Why isn't there a waiter's part in the play?" she said. "You would act it wonderfully well."

"But you," I replied, "will teach me to act the part of Murray still better."

The Ambassador settled on a day five or six days later, and the next morning I was sent my short part. The ball having been announced as in my honor, I returned to my inn for another suit, and I reappeared in the ballroom dressed with the utmost elegance.

I opened the ball, dancing the minuet with a woman who must have had precedence over all the others, then I danced with them all; but the wily Ambassador arranged for me to dance the contradances with Madame . . . , and no one could object. He said that Lord Murray must dance with no one but Lindane.

At the first pause in the contradance I told her that I had come to Soleure only for her, that but for her I should never have been seen as a waiter, and that hence I hoped she would permit me to pay court to her. She said that there were reasons which forbade her to receive visits from me, but that opportunities to see each other could not fail to arise if I did not leave at once and would refrain from showing her certain attentions which must give rise to talk. Love, readiness, and prudence together could not have made me a more satisfying answer. I promised her all the discretion she could ask. On the instant my love became of heroic mold and thoroughly determined to make secrecy its law.

Having declared that I was a novice in the art of the theater, I asked Madame F. to instruct me. I went to her in the morning, but she thought it was only an excuse. By going, I was paying court to Madame . . . , who was perfectly aware of my motive for acting as I did. She[23] was a widow between thirty and forty years of age, with a malicious temperament, a yellowish complexion, and an awkward walk, because she tried to conceal the fact that she was lame. She was forever talking, and, since she tried to display a wit which she did not possess, she bored me. Nevertheless I had to pretend I was in love with her. She made me laugh one day when she said she would never have thought I was timid by nature after seeing me play the role of waiter so well at Zurich. I asked her what made her suppose me timid, and she did not answer. I had made up my mind to break with her after we had acted L'Écossaise.

Our first performance was attended by all the best people in the city. Madame F. was delighted to inspire loathing in her role, being sure that her own person had no part in producing the effect. Monsieur de Chavigny drew tears. People said he had played his part better than Voltaire[24] did. But my blood froze when in the third scene of the fifth act Lindane said to me: "What! You! You dare to love me!"[25] She uttered the seven words so strangely, in a tone of such deliberate scorn, even stepping momentarily out of her part, that the whole audience applauded wildly. The applause nettled and disconcerted me, for I thought her manner had trespassed on my honor. When silence was restored and I, as my role prescribed, had to answer her with, "Yes, I adore you, and I must,"[26] I brought out the words in a tone so moving that the applause redoubled: Bis, bis from four hundred voices forced me to repeat them.

But despite the applause we decided at supper that we did not know our parts well enough. Monsieur de Chavigny said that the second performance would be put off until the next day but one and that on the morrow we would hold a private rehearsal at his country house, where we would dine. We congratulated each other on our acting. Madame F. said that I had played my role well, but that I had done even better as the waiter, and the laugh was on her side; but I had it on mine when I replied that she had played Lady Alton excellently, but that it could hardly be otherwise since it required no effort on her part.

Monsieur de Chavigny told Madame . . . that those in the audience who had applauded her for the passage in which she expressed amazement that I should love her had been wrong, since by putting scorn into the words she had stepped out of her part, for Lindane could not but have a high regard for Murray.

The Ambassador came next day to fetch me in his carriage, saying that there was no need for me to use mine. All the actors were assembled at his country house. He at once said to Monsieur . . . that he believed he had settled his business and that they would talk about it after they had dined and rehearsed the play. We sat down at table; and afterward we got through the whole rehearsal without once needing to be prompted. Toward nightfall he told the company that he expected them all for supper at Soleure, and everyone left except Monsieur . . . , with whom he had business to discuss. I had no carriage. At the moment of departure I had a most pleasant surprise:

"Ride in my carriage with me," said the Ambassador to Monsieur . . . , "and we will discuss our business. Monsieur de Seingalt[27] will have the honor of escorting your lady in yours."

I at once give my hand to that miracle of nature, who gets in with an air of the greatest indifference, warmly pressing my hand. So there we are, sitting face to face.

A half hour went by like a minute; but we did not waste it talking. Our mouths joined and did not separate until we were ten paces from the door of the Embassy. She got out first. Her flushed face terrifies me. It not being her natural color, we would reveal our crime to every eye in the room. Her honor did not permit me to expose her in such a state to the scrutiny of Madame F., who would have felt even more triumphant than humiliated by a discovery of such consequence.

It was Love who made me think of a unique expedient, and Fortune, who often favored me, who saw to it that I had in my pocket a small box containing a sternutative.[28] I urged her to take a pinch of it at once, and I did the same. The excessive dose began to produce its effect halfway up the stairs, and we continued to sneeze for a good quarter of an hour; the blame for her tattletale redness was put entirely on her sneezes. When they stopped she said she no longer had a headache but that in future she would beware of taking such a violent remedy. I saw Madame F. lost in thought, but she dared say nothing.

This foretaste of my good fortune decided me to stay in Soleure for as long as it might take me to crown my happiness. I immediately determined to rent a country house. Any man in my situation and endowed with a heart would have made the same resolve. I saw before me a perfect beauty whom I adored, whose heart I was certain I possessed, and whom I had barely touched; I had money, and I was my own master. I thought it far more reasonable than my notion of becoming a monk at Einsiedeln. I was so full of my happiness, present and to come, that I dismissed all thought of "what people would say." I left everyone at the table and sought out the Ambassador a minute after he withdrew. As a man of the world, I could not conscientiously deny the lovable old man his right to a confidence which he had so signally deserved.

As soon as we were alone he asked me if I had profited by the favor he had done me. After kissing his noble countenance several times I told him all in these five words: "I can hope for everything." But when he heard the story of the sternutative the compliments he lavished on me were endless, for the lady's greatly changed physiognomy could have raised the suspicion of a struggle. After my narrative, which made him laugh heartily, I told him that, being under the necessity of crowning my happiness and at the same time sparing the lady's honor, and having nothing better to do, I wanted to rent a country house in which I would calmly wait for Fortune to favor me. I said that I looked to his good offices to obtain me a furnished house, a carriage at my disposal, two manservants, a good cook, and a housekeeper-chambermaid who would attend to my linen. He said that he would look into it. The next day our play went very well, and on the day after he imparted his plan to me as follows:

"I see, my dear friend, that in this intrigue your happiness depends upon your satisfying your passion without in any way injuring Madame . . .'s good name. I am even sure you will leave at once without having obtained anything if your departure is necessary to her peace of mind. This will show you that I am just the man to advise you. If you really want not to be found out, you must refrain from the taking of the least step which could make anyone who does not believe that there is such a thing as an action without meaning suspect the truth. Even the most speculative mind cannot take the brief interview which I arranged for you yesterday to be anything but the effect of the purest chance, and the incident of the sternutative foils the deductions of the most penetrating malice, for a lover who wants to make the most of an occasion favorable to his passion does not begin by bringing on convulsions in his beauty's head when a fortunate chance has placed her in his power, and no one can guess that a sternutative was used to hide a reddened face, for it is not often that consummation produces that effect and that a lover foresees it to the point of carrying such a stimulant in his pocket. So what has already happened is not enough to reveal your secret. Monsieur . . . himself, who, though he does not want to show jealousy, is nevertheless jealous of his wife, cannot have seen anything out of the way in my having him drive back to Soleure with me, for it is beyond all likelihood that I should wish to be your Mercury, while naturally and in accordance with the rules of the most ordinary politeness, which he has never refused to honor, his dear wife was the person who, on the return journey here, should occupy the place in my vis-à-vis which I kindly let him occupy himself, because of the interest I took in his important business.

"After this long exordium, which I have delivered in the style of a secretary of state speaking in council, let us come to the conclusion. Two things are necessary to set you on the road to fruition. The first, which concerns you, is to contrive to make Monsieur . . . your friend without ever giving him cause to suspect that you have designs on his wife. The second, which concerns the lady, is to do nothing which can be observed without making the reason for it known to everyone. So I say to you that you shall not take this country house until, between us, we have hit upon a perfectly plausible reason of a nature to throw dust in the eyes of speculation. I thought of such a reason yesterday when I was considering your case.

"You must pretend to be ill, and think of an illness of which what you say to him will leave the doctor in no doubt. Fortunately I know a doctor whose passion is prescribing country air, with baths of his own composition, for almost every disease. He is to come here one of these days to take my pulse. You shall summon him to your inn for a consultation and give him two louis; I am certain he will at least prescribe the country for you and will tell the whole town that he will surely cure you. Such is Herrenschwandt's[29] way, though he is a learned man."

"What! Is he here? He is a friend of mine. I met him in Paris at Madame du Rumain's."

"This is his brother.[30] Think up an illness which is fashionable and won't disgrace you. We will find the house afterward, and I will give you a young man who will cook excellent dishes for you."

Choosing an illness cost me some thought. I gave Madame . . . an outline of my plan in the wings, and she approved of it. I begged her to find some way by which we could write to each other, and she said she would try. She said that her husband had the highest opinion of me, and that he had seen nothing wrong in my having been in her coupé with her. She asked me if Monsieur de Chavigny had taken her husband with him because it had happened that way or on purpose, and I answered: "On purpose." She raised her beautiful eyes to heaven and bit her lip.

"Are you sorry, my charmer?"

"Alas! . . . no."

Three or four days later the doctor came to see the last performance of L'Écossaise and dine at the Ambassador's. He having complimented me at dessert on my look of good health, I said that looks were deceptive and I asked him for a consultation. Delighted that he had been mistaken, he promised me an hour the next day at my inn. He came, and I told him what God put into my mouth.

"I suffer every night," I said, "from amorous dreams which wear me out."

"I know the complaint, Monsieur, and I will cure you of it by two remedies. The first, which you may not much like, is to go and spend six weeks in the country, where you will not see objects which, by stimulating the seventh pair of nerves, bring on the lumbar discharge which must also make you very melancholy when you wake."

"So it does."

"Oh, I know that! The second remedy consists in cold baths, which will keep you amused."

"Are they far from here?"

"They are wherever you please, because I will write you a prescription for them at once. The apothecary will make them up for you."

After writing his prescription and accepting my two louis he left, and before noon the whole town had heard of my illness and my decision to make a stay in the country. Monsieur de Chavigny joked about it at table, telling Herrenschwandt he should forbid me to receive calls from ladies. Monsieur F.[31] said I should be forbidden certain miniatures of which my jewel box was full. Monsieur . . . , who was an anatomist, pronounced the doctor's reasoning splendid. I publicly asked the Ambassador to be so good as to find me a country house, and a cook because I liked to eat well.

Tired of playing a false role which I considered no longer necessary, I stopped calling on Madame F. She took it upon herself to reproach me in no uncertain terms for my inconstancy, saying that I had hoodwinked her. She said she knew all, and she threatened vengeance. I replied that she had nothing to avenge herself for, since I had never wronged her, but that if she was planning to have me murdered I would demand guards. She replied that she was not Italian.

Delighted to have got rid of the viper, I could now turn all my thoughts to Madame . . . . Monsieur de Chavigny, active as ever on my behalf, made Monsieur . . . believe that I was just the person to persuade the Duke of Choiseul, Colonel-General of the Swiss Guards,[32] to pardon a cousin[33] of his who had killed his man in a duel at La Muette.[34] He had told him I could do anything through the Duchess of Gramont; and, informing me of all this, he asked me if I would undertake to apply for the pardon and if I thought I might be successful. It was the sure way to gain Monsieur . . .'s entire friendship. I replied that I could not be certain I would succeed, but that I would gladly undertake it.

He then arranged to have the whole case explained to me in his presence by Monsieur M . . . , who brought all the documents stating the circumstances of the factum, which was perfectly simple, to my inn.

I spent most of the night writing a letter intended to persuade first the Duchess of Gramont and then the Duke her father;[35] and I wrote to Madame d'Urfé that the well-being of the Rosicrucian Order depended upon the King's pardoning the officer, who had been obliged to leave the kingdom because of the duel.

The next morning I took the Ambassador the letter which was to be seen by the Duke. He judged it excellent and told me to go and show it to Monsieur . . . , whom I found in his nightcap. Full of gratitude for the interest I was taking in his concerns, he thanked me effusively. He said that his wife was still in bed and asked me to wait and breakfast with her, but I asked him to make her my excuses, for since the post left at noon I had little time.

So I went back to my inn, where I sealed my letters and sent them to the post; then I went and dined alone with the Ambassador, who was expecting me.

After praising my prudence in refusing to wait until Madame . . . was up and assuring me that her husband must have become my bosom friend, he showed me a letter from Voltaire thanking him for having played the role of Monrose in L'Écossaise, and another from the Marquis de Chauvelin,[36] who was then staying with Voltaire at "Les Délices."[37] He promised to visit him before leaving for Turin, where he was to be Ambassador.

After dinner I went back to my room to dress, for there was to be a reception and supper at "the Court" that day. Such was the name given to the residence of the French Ambassador in Switzerland.

CHAPTER VI

My country house. Madame Dubois. Base trick which the lame harridan plays on me. My grievous misfortunes.

AS I enter the drawing room I see Madame . . . in a corner, poring over a letter. I go to her and apologize for not having waited to breakfast with her; she replies that I did right and adds that if I have not yet taken the country house I need I can do her a favor by deciding on the one her husband will propose to me, probably during supper that evening.

She could say no more, for she was summoned to take a hand at quadrille.[1] I excused myself from playing. At table everyone talked to me about my health and the baths I was to take in a country house I intended to rent. As his wife had forewarned me, Monsieur . . . told me about one near the Aar which was charming.

"But," he said, "it has to be rented for at least six months."

I replied that, provided I liked it and should be free to leave when I pleased, I would pay for the six months in advance.

"It has a reception room than which there is none finer in the whole canton."

"So much the better; I'll give a ball in it. Let us go to see it tomorrow morning at the latest. I will come to your house for you at eight o'clock."

"I look forward to it."

Before going to bed I ordered a four-horse berlin, and at eight o'clock I found Monsieur . . . ready. He said that he had tried to persuade his wife to come with us, but that she was a slug-a-bed. In less than an hour we reached the fine house,[2] and I thought it marvelous. There were master's rooms enough to lodge twenty. In addition to the reception room, which I admired, there was a retiring room hung with choice engravings. A large garden, a fine orchard, waterworks and fountains, and excellent facilities for baths in the main building. After approving of everything we went back to Soleure. I asked Monsieur . . . to make all the arrangements so that I could move in the next day. I saw his wife, who appeared delighted when her husband told her I had liked the house. I said I hoped they would often do me the honor of dining there, and Monsieur . . . gave me his word for it. After paying him the hundred louis which were the rent for six months, I embraced him and went, as always, to dine with the Ambassador.

I at once said that in deference to the suggestion his wife had made to me beforehand I had rented the house Monsieur . . . had proposed, and he thought well of it.

"But," he said, "do you really mean to give a ball there?"

"Certainly I do, provided my money can buy me everything I need."

"You'll have no difficulty about that, for you can turn to me for anything your money won't buy you. I see you want to be lavish. In the meanwhile you shall have two menservants, the housekeeper, and the cook; my major-domo will pay them and you can reimburse him; he is honest. I'll come to eat with you from time to time, and I shall listen with pleasure to the delightful story of your current intrigue. I think most highly of the young woman; her conduct is beyond her years, and the proofs of love she gives you must make you respect her. Does she know that I know everything?"

"She knows no more than that Your Excellency knows we love each other, and she takes no exception to that, for she is certain of your discretion."

"She is a charming woman."

An apothecary to whom the doctor sent me left the same day to compound the baths which were to cure me of a disease I did not have; and two days later I went myself, after ordering Leduc to follow with all my luggage. But I was not a little surprised when, on entering the apartment I was to occupy, I saw a young woman, or perhaps a girl, with an extremely pretty face approach me and start to kiss my hand. I draw it back, and my astonished look makes her blush.

"Do you belong to the household, Mademoiselle?"

"His Excellency the Ambassador's major-domo engaged me to serve you as housekeeper."

"Pardon my surprise. Let us go to my bedroom."

As soon as I am alone I tell her to sit down beside me on the couch. She replies in the gentlest and most modest fashion that she could not accept such an honor.

"As you will; but I hope you will make no objection to eating with me when I ask you to, for it bores me to eat alone."

"I will obey you."

"Where is your room?"

"There. It was the major-domo who showed it to me; but it is for you to give what orders you please."

The room was behind the alcove which contained my bed. I go into it with her, and I see dresses on a sofa; next to it a boudoir with all the usual array of petticoats, bonnets, shoes, and slippers, and a fine open trunk in which I see an abundance of linen. I look at her, I try to penetrate her serious manner, I approve of her reserve, but I think I had better subject her to some close questioning, for she was too interesting and too well dressed to be a mere chambermaid. I presume it is a trick Monsieur de Chavigny has played on me, for such a girl, whose age could not be more than twenty-four or twenty-six and who possessed the wardrobe I saw, seemed to me more fit to be the mistress of a man like myself than his housekeeper. I ask her if she knows the Ambassador and what wages she is to have, and she answers that she knows the Ambassador only by sight and that the majordomo had told her she would be paid two louis a month besides meals in her room. She said she was from Lyons, a widow, and that her name was Dubois.

I leave her, unable to decide what will happen, for the more I looked at her and talked with her, the more interesting I found her. I go to the kitchen, and I see a young man kneading dough. His name was Durosier. I had known his brother when he was in the service of the French Ambassador[3] in Venice. He said my supper would be ready at nine o'clock.

"I never eat alone."

"I know that."

"How much are you paid a month?"

"Four louis."

I see two likely-looking, well-dressed menservants. One of them says he will bring me what wine I order. I go to the small bathhouse, where I find the apothecary's apprentice preparing the bath I am to take on the morrow and every day.

After spending an hour in the garden I go to the caretaker's, where I see a numerous family, among them some not unpromising daughters. I spend two hours talking with them, delighted that everyone speaks French. As I wanted to see the whole of my house, the caretaker's wife took me everywhere. I returned to my apartment, where I found Leduc unpacking my luggage. After telling him to give my linen to Madame Dubois, I went to write. It was a pretty study, facing north, with one window. A ravishing view semed made to inspire the soul of a poet with the most felicitous ideas engendered by the freshness of the air and the palpable silence which soothes the ear in a smiling countryside. I felt that, to enjoy the simplicity of certain pleasures, a man must be in love and fortunate in love. I congratulated myself.

I hear a knock. I see my beautiful housekeeper, who, with a smile quite unlike the one worn by a person who is about to complain, asks me to tell my valet to treat her politely.

"How has he been rude to you?"

"Perhaps not at all by his lights. He wanted to kiss me, I refused, and he, thinking it was his right, became a trifle insolent."

"In what way?"

"He laughed at me. Excuse me, Monsieur, if I resented it. I don't like being sneered at."

"You are right, my dear helpmate. Sneering always comes from either stupidity or malice. Leduc shall be told at once that he is to respect you. You shall sup with me."

Leduc coming to ask me some question half an hour later, I told him he must treat Madame Dubois with respect.

"She's a prude—she wouldn't let me kiss her."

"As for you, you're a blackguard."

"Is she your chambermaid or your mistress?"

"Perhaps she is my wife."

"Well and good. I will go and amuse myself at the caretaker's."

I was well satisfied with my little supper and with an excellent Neuchâtel[4] wine. My housekeeper was accustomed to wine from "La Côte,"[5] which was delicious too. In short, I was well pleased with the cook, with my housekeeper's modesty, and with my Spaniard, who changed her plate for her without putting on airs. After ordering my bath for six o'clock in the morning I told my servants to retire. Thus left alone at table with the too beautiful woman, I asked her to tell me her story.

"My story is very short. I was born in Lyons. My father and mother brought me to Lausanne with them, or so they have told me, for I do not remember it myself. I know I was fourteen when my father, who was coachman to Madame d'Hermenches,[6] died. The lady took me into her household, and three or four years later I entered the service of Lady Montagu[7] as a chambermaid, and her old footman Dubois married me. Three years later I was left a widow at Windsor, where he died. The air of England threatening me with consumption, I asked my generous mistress to let me leave her service, which she granted me, paying for my traveling expenses and giving me some valuable presents. I went back to my mother's house in Lausanne, where I entered the service of an English lady who was very fond of me and who would have taken me to Italy if she had not become suspicious of the young Duke of Roxburghe,[8] who showed signs of being in love with me. She loved him, and she thought I was secretly her rival. She was wrong. She gave me a quantity of presents and sent me back to my mother's, where I have lived for two years by the work of my hands. Monsieur Lebel,[9] major-domo to the Ambassador, asked me four days ago if I wished to enter the service of an Italian nobleman as housekeeper and told me the conditions. I accepted, since I have always had a great desire to see Italy; that desire was the reason for my folly; and here I am."

"What folly?"

"Coming to you without knowing you beforehand."

"Then you would not have come if you had known me beforehand?"

"Certainly not, for I shall no longer be able to find service with a woman. Do you think you are the kind of man to have a housekeeper like me without people's saying that you have me for something else?"

"I expect as much, for you are very pretty and I scarcely look a milksop; but I do not care."

"I wouldn't care either, if my station in life allowed me to defy certain prejudices."

"Which is to say, my beauty, that you would like to go back to Lausanne."

"Not now, for that would be unjust to you. People might believe you had offended me by being too free, and you yourself might reach a wrong conclusion about me."

"What conclusion, if you please?"

"You would conclude that I want to make an impression on you."

"That might be, for your sudden and unreasonable departure would annoy me greatly. Even so, I am sorry for you. Thinking as you do, you can neither want to stay with me nor leave. Yet you must decide one way or the other."

"I have already decided. I shall stay, and I am almost certain that I shall not regret it."

"I like your hope; but there is one difficulty."

"Will you be so good as to explain?"

"I must, my dear Dubois. I cannot abide either melancholy or certain scruples."

"You will never find me melancholy; but please let us come to an understanding on the article of scruples. What do you mean by scruples?"

"I like that. In common usage the word 'scruple' means a superstitious malice which sees vice in an act which may be innocent."

"If an act leaves me in doubt I am not inclined to put a bad construction on it. My duty only bids me watch over myself."

"You have read a good deal, I should think."

"It's the one thing I do, really, for otherwise I'd be bored."

"Then you have books?"

"Many. Do you understand English?"

"Not a word."

"I'm sorry, for they would entertain you."

"I don't like romances."

"No more do I. I like that. What, may I ask, made you decide so quickly that I am romantic?"

"And I like that! Your outburst delights me, and I am glad I have got you to laugh at last."

"Excuse me if I laugh, because—"

"Because me no becauses. Laugh in season and out of season; you'll never find a better way to handle me. I should say you've hired yourself out to me too cheaply."

"I have to laugh again, for it lies with you to increase my wages."

I rose from the table very much surprised by this young woman, who seemed in a fair way to find the chink in my armor. She could reason; and in this first dialogue she had already drained my resources. Young, beautiful, elegantly dressed, and intelligent—where she would lead me I could not guess. I was eager to talk with Monsieur Lebel, who had procured me such a piece of household furniture.

After clearing the table and taking everything into her room, she came to ask me if I used curl papers under my nightcap. It was Leduc's province; but I gladly gave her the preference. She managed it very well.

"I foresee," I said, "that you will serve me as you did Lady Montagu."

"Not quite; but since you do not like melancholy, I must ask you a favor."

"Ask it, my dear."

"I would rather not wait on you in your bath."

"May I die if the thought has entered my head. It would be a scandal. Leduc shall do it."

"Then pray forgive me, and I make bold to ask you another favor."

"Tell me freely whatever it is you want."

"May I have one of the caretaker's daughters sleep with me?"

"If it had ever occurred to me I swear I would have asked you to do just that. Is she in your room?"

"No."

"Go and fetch her."

"I'll do it tomorrow, for if I went now people would start inventing reasons. Thank you."

"You are prudent, my dear. And be sure I will never stand in the way of your being so."

She helped me to undress, and she must have found me perfectly modest; but thinking of my behavior before I fell asleep I saw that it did not spring from virtue. My heart was Madame . . .'s, and the widow Dubois had rather overawed me; perhaps I was her dupe, but I did not dwell on the thought.

In the morning I rang for Leduc, who told me he had not expected to have the honor. I called him a fool. After taking a cold bath I went back to bed, ordering him to bring two cups of chocolate. My helpmate entered, in a very fetching dishabille and all smiles.

"You are in good spirits, my beautiful housekeeper."

"In good spirits because I am very glad to be with you, I slept well, I've been for a walk, and in my room there's a very pretty girl, who will sleep with me."

"Call her in."

I laughed when I saw a girl as ugly as she seemed to be shy. I told her she would drink chocolate with me every morning, and she showed that she was pleased, saying that she liked it very much. In the afternoon Monsieur de Chavigny came and spent three hours with me, and he was satisfied with the whole house but greatly surprised by the housekeeper Lebel had provided for me. He had said nothing to him about her. He thought it was the perfect cure for the love which Madame . . . had inspired in me. I assured him that he was wrong. He addressed her with the utmost politeness.

No later than the next day, just as I was about to sit down at table with my helpmate, a carriage enters my courtyard and I see Madame F. get out of it. I am surprised and annoyed, but I could not avoid going to meet her.

"I did not expect you would honor me with a visit, Madame."

"I came to ask you to do me a favor, after we have dined."

"Then come at once, for the soup is on the table. Permit me to present Madame Dubois. Madame de F.," I say to the latter, "will dine with us."

My helpmate did the honors of the table, playing the role of hostess like an angel, and Madame F., despite her pride, put on no airs. I did not speak twenty words during the whole dinner nor bestow any attentions on the madwoman, for I was impatient to learn what kind of favor she wanted to ask of me.

As soon as the widow Dubois left us, she told me bluntly that she had come to ask me to let her have two rooms for three or four weeks. Greatly surprised by her effrontery, I reply that I cannot grant her the favor.

"You will grant it, for the whole town knows that I have come here to ask it."

"And the whole town will know that I have refused you. I want to be alone and entirely free; any company at all would be burdensome."

"I will not burden you in any way; you need not even know that I am in your house. I shall not consider it impolite if you do not inquire after my health, and I will not inquire after yours even if you fall ill. I will have my maid cook for me in the small kitchen, and I will not walk in the garden when I know you are there. The apartment for which I ask you is the two last rooms on the second floor, which I can enter and leave by the small stairway without being seen and without seeing anyone. Now tell me if, in strict politeness, you can refuse me the favor."

"If you knew even the rudiments of politeness you would not ask it of me, and you would not insist after hearing me refuse you."

She does not answer, and I stride up and down the room like a maniac. I consider having her put out the door. I think I have the right to treat her as insane, then I reflect that she has relatives, and that she herself, treated without any consideration, will become my enemy and perhaps take some horrible revenge. Finally I think that Madame . . . would disapprove any violent means I might resolve upon to get rid of the viper.

"Very well, Madame," I say, "you shall have the apartment, and an hour after you enter it I will go back to Soleure."

"Then I accept the apartment, and I will move into it day after tomorrow, and I do not believe you will be so foolish as to go back to Soleure on that account. You would set the whole town laughing."

So saying, she rose and left. I let her go without stirring from where I was; but a moment later I repented of having yielded, for her errand and her effrontery were equally beyond all bounds. I called myself stupid, a coward, a fool. I ought not to have taken the thing seriously, I should have laughed at it, made a mock of her, told her clearly that she was mad and forced her to leave, calling in the caretaker's whole family and my servants as witnesses. When I told the widow Dubois what had happened she was amazed. She said behavior of that sort was incredible, and that my giving in to such high-handed proceedings was equally so, unless I had very strong reasons for what I had done.

Seeing that her reasoning was sound, and not wanting to tell her anything, I took the course of saying no more to her on the subject. I went for a walk until suppertime, and I remained at table with her until midnight, finding her ever pleasanter company, full of intelligence and most amusing in all the little stories she told me about herself. Her mind was extremely unprejudiced, but she maintained that if she did not follow the principles of what are called prudence and honor she would be made unhappy. So her good behavior resulted rather from her philosophy than from her virtue; but if she had not been virtuous she would not have had the firmness to practice her philosophy.

I considered my encounter with the F. woman so extraordinary that I could not keep from going the next morning early to regale Monsieur de Chavigny with it. I told my helpmate that she might dine without waiting for me if she did not see me back by the usual hour.

The Ambassador had been informed that Madame F. was coming to see me, but he burst out laughing when I told him how she had succeeded.

"Your Excellency finds it comic, but not I."

"So I see; but, believe me, you must pretend to laugh at it too. Act at all times as if you did not know she was in your house, and she will be sufficiently punished. People will say she is in love with you and that you will have none of her. I advise you to go and tell the whole story to Monsieur . . . and invite yourself to stay for dinner with him. I have talked with Lebel about your beautiful housekeeper. He meant no harm. Having gone to Lausanne an hour after I charged him to find you a respectable chambermaid, he remembered it, spoke of you to La Dubois, and the thing was done. It is a lucky find for you, because when you fall in love she won't keep you languishing."

"I don't know, for she has principles."

"I am sure you will not be taken in by them. I will come to you for dinner tomorrow and will enjoy hearing her talk."

"Your Excellency will afford me the greatest pleasure."

Monsieur . . . greeted me warmly and at once congratulated me on the admirable conquest[10] which was sure to make my stay in the country a pleasure. Though she suspected the truth, his wife congratulated me too; but I saw that they were both astounded when I told them the whole story in detail. Monsieur . . . said that if the woman really became a burden to me I need only ask the government to serve her with an immediate order never to set foot in my house again. I replied that I did not want to employ that resource, since, in addition to being dishonorable to her, it would prove me a weakling, for everyone must know that I was master in my own house and that she could never come to lodge there without my consent. His wife said thoughtfully that I had done well to let her have the apartment and that she would go to call on her, for she had herself told her she would have an apartment in my house the next day. I said no more about it, and, invited to take potluck with them for dinner, I stayed. Since I had shown Madame . . . nothing but ordinary politeness, her husband could have no suspicion that we were in communication. She seized an opportunity to tell me that I had done well to let the spiteful woman have the apartment and that I could invite her husband to come and spend two or three days with me after Monsieur de Chauvelin, who was expected, had gone. She also said that the wife of the caretaker of my house was her nurse, and that she would write me through her when the need arose.

After calling on two Italian Jesuits who were passing through Soleure and inviting them to dinner the next day, I went home. My helpmate kept me entertained until midnight with philosophical problems. She was devoted to Locke.[11] She said that the faculty of thought was not a proof of the spirituality of our soul, since God could give the property of thought to matter. I laughed heartily when she said there was a difference between thinking and reasoning.

"I think," I said, "that you would be reasoning well if you let yourself be persuaded to go to bed with me, and you think you are reasoning very well in refusing."

"Believe me," she answered, "that between a man's reason and a woman's there is the same difference that there is between the two sexes."

We were drinking our chocolate at nine o'clock the next morning when Madame F. arrived. I did not even go to the window. She dismissed her carriage and went to her apartment with her chambermaid. Having sent Leduc to Soleure to wait for letters for me, I asked my helpmate to dress my hair, saying that we should have the Ambassador and two Italian Jesuits for dinner. I had already told my cook to prepare good fast-day and meat dishes, it being a Friday. I saw that she was delighted, and she dressed my hair perfectly. After shaving, I offered her my first salutation of the day, and she accepted it with good grace, though she refused me her beautiful lips. It was the first time I kissed her cheeks. Such was the footing on which we lived together. We loved each other, and we were virtuous; but she must have suffered less than I did because of the coquetry which is only too natural to the fair sex and often stronger than love.

Monsieur de Chavigny arrived at eleven o'clock. I had not invited the Jesuits to dinner before consulting him, and I had sent my carriage for them; while waiting we went for a stroll. He asked my housekeeper to join us as soon as she had seen to all her domestic duties. He was one of those men whom France, when she was a monarchy, kept to send, at the proper time and as circumstances demanded, to win over the powers she wished to have embrace her interests. Such was Monsieur de l'Hospital,[12] who was able to gain the heart of Elisabeth Petrovna,[13] such the[14] Duke of Nivernais,[15] who did as he pleased with the Court of St. James's[16] in 1762, such were a number of others whom I knew. Walking in my garden, the Marquis de Chavigny found in my housekeeper all the qualities necessary to make a young man happy; and she enchanted him completely at table, where she overwhelmed the two Jesuits with sallies informed by a humor which was never unkind. After spending the whole day with the greatest enjoyment, he went back to Soleure, asking me to dine with him as soon as he sent me word that Monsieur de Chauvelin had arrived.

That agreeable man, whose acquaintance I had made at the Duke of Choiseul's in Versailles,[17] arrived two days later. He at once recognized me and introduced his charming wife,[18] who did not know me. Since chance put me at the table beside Madame . . . , I was in such high spirits that I said most amusing things. Monsieur de Chauvelin said that he knew some very pleasant stories about me.

"But," replied Monsieur de Chavigny, "you do not know the Zurich story"; and he told it to him.

Monsieur de Chauvelin said to Madame . . . that, to have the honor of serving her, he would have turned coachman, but Monsieur . . . replied that I was far more squeamish, for the lady who had made such an impression on me was staying as my guest in a house I had rented in the country.

"We will pay you a visit," Monsieur de Chauvelin said to me.

"Yes," Monsieur de Chavigny answered, "we will all go together."

And he instantly asks me to lend him my beautiful reception room to give a ball in no later than the following Sunday.

It was thus that the old courtier kept me from undertaking to give the ball myself. It was a piece of braggadocio which would have done me harm. I should have infringed on the right, which was the Ambassador's alone, to entertain these illustrious foreigners during the five or six days they were planning to spend in Soleure; and, besides being a blunder, it would have let me in for a great deal of expense.

In connection with the plays which were acted at Monsieur Voltaire's, the conversation turned to L'Écossaise, and my table companion was praised, and blushed, and became as beautiful as a star. The Ambassador invited us all to his ball the next day. I returned home madly in love with the charming woman whom Heaven had destined from birth to cause me the greatest grief I have ever suffered in my life. I leave my reader to judge.

My helpmate had gone to bed when I returned, and I was glad of it, for Madame . . .'s eyes had not left me a grain of reason. She found me sad the next morning, and she rallied me on it with wit tempered by kindness. While we are breakfasting Madame F.'s chambermaid suddenly appears and hands me a note. I tell her I will send an answer. I unseal it and I find:

"The Ambassador has sent me an invitation to his ball. I have replied that I did not feel well, but that if I felt better by evening I would go. I think that since I am in your house, I should go with you or not at all. So if you do not wish to do me the favor of escorting me, I beg you to do me that of saying I am ill. Excuse me if I have thought I might break our agreement in this one instance, for it is a case of at least making a show of good manners in public.''

Furious, I take a pen and write:

''You have seized, Madame, on a good subterfuge. It will be announced that you are ill, for I beg to forgo the honor of escorting you, on the principle of enjoying complete freedom.''

My housekeeper laughed at the note the lady had written me and declared that she had deserved my reply. I sealed it and sent it to her. I spent a very pleasant night at the ball, for I talked a great deal with the object of my passion. She laughed at my answer to Madame F.'s note, but she disapproved of it— ''for,'' she said, ''the poison of anger will circulate through her veins, and God knows what ravages it will make when it bursts out.''

I spent the next two days at home, and very early on Sunday the Ambassador's servants came to bring everything needed for the ball and the supper, and to make all the arrangements for the orchestra and for lighting the whole house. The major-domo came to make his bow to me while I was at table. I had him sit down, and I thanked him for the fine present he had made me by giving me such a pleasant housekeeper. He was a handsome man, no longer young, honest, witty, and with his trade at his fingertips.

''Which of you two,'' he asked us, ''is the worse fooled?''

''Neither of us,'' said the widow Dubois, ''for we are equally satisfied with each other.''

The first to arrive, about nightfall, was Madame . . . , with her husband. She spoke very politely to my helpmate, without showing the least surprise when I said she was my housekeeper. She said it was my bounden duty to take her to see Madame F., and I had to obey. She received us with every appearance of good will, and she went out for a stroll with us, escorted by Monsieur . . . . After a turn around the garden Madame . . . told me to take her to her nurse.

"But who is your nurse?"

"The caretaker's wife," Monsieur . . . answered; "we will wait for you in Madame's apartment."

"Tell me something," she said on the way. "Your housekeeper certainly sleeps with you."

"No, I swear it. I can love no one but you."

"If that is the case you ought not to keep her, for no one can believe it."

"I do not care, so long as it is not you who believes me to be in love with her."

"I will believe nothing but what you tell me. She is very pretty."

We call on the caretaker's wife, who, addressing her as "daughter," gives her countless caresses; then she goes off to make us a lemonade. Left alone with her, I could do no more than give her fiery kisses, which rivaled hers. She had on only a very light petticoat under a taffeta dress. God, what charms! I am sure that her excellent nurse would not have come back so soon if she could have guessed how much we needed her to delay. But not a bit of it. Never were two glasses so quickly filled with lemonade!

"It was all made, was it?"

"No, Monseigneur; but I am quick."

The innocence of the question and the answer made my beautiful angel burst out laughing. On the way back to Madame F.'s she said that since time was always against us we must wait to seize it until her husband decided to spend three or four days with me. I had already invited him, and he had promised to come.

Madame F. set preserves before us and praised them, especially a quince marmalade which she begged us to taste. We excused ourselves, and Madame . . . trod on my foot. She told me afterward that she was suspected of having poisoned her husband.

The ball was magnificent, as was the supper at two tables, each laid for thirty, in addition to the buffet at which more than a hundred people ate. I danced only one minuet with Madame de Chauvelin, having spent almost the whole night talking with her husband, who was highly intelligent. I presented him with my translation of his short poem on the Seven Deadly Sins,[19] which greatly pleased him. When I promised to visit him in Turin he asked me if I would bring my housekeeper with me, and, on my answering no, he said I was making a mistake. Everyone thought her charming. She was urged to dance, but in vain; she told me afterward that if she had accepted, all the women would have hated her. She danced very well.

Monsieur de Chauvelin left on Tuesday, and at the end of the week I received a letter from Madame d'Urfé telling me she had spent two days at Versailles pursuing the matter in which I was interested. She sent me a copy of the pardon signed by the King in favor of Monsieur . . .'s cousin. She said that the minister had already sent it to his regiment, thus restoring the culprit to the rank he had held before the duel.

Scarcely have I received her letter before I order my horses harnessed to take me to Monsieur de Chavigny with the news. My soul was flooded with joy, and I did not hide it from the Ambassador, who congratulated me in the most flattering terms, for through my intervention Monsieur . . . had obtained, without spending a copper, what he would have paid very dearly for if he had been obliged to buy it. To make the thing appear even more important, I asked the Ambassador to tell the news to Monsieur . . . himself. He instantly sent him a note asking him to come at once.

The Ambassador received him by handing him a copy of the pardon, at the same time saying that he was indebted for it entirely to me. The worthy man, beside himself with contentment, asked me how much he owed me.

"Nothing except your friendship; but if you wish to give me a token of it, come and spend a few days with me, for I am dying of boredom. The thing you asked me to do for you must have been very easy, for you see how quickly you have been satisfied."

"Very easy? I have been working for a year, moving heaven and earth, and not succeeding; and in two weeks you have accomplished everything. My life is at your disposal."

"Embrace me, and come to see me. I consider myself the happiest of mortals when I can oblige such men as you."

"I must be off now to tell my wife, who will jump for joy."

"Yes, go to her," said the Ambassador, "and come to dinner tomorrow with just the four of us."

The Marquis de Chavigny, an old courtier and a man of intelligence, made some reflections on the court of a monarch, where nothing was easy or difficult in itself, for the one was constantly becoming the other. He knew Madame d'Urfé from having courted her when the Regent loved her in secret. It was he who had nicknamed her Égérie[20] because she said she learned everything from a Genius who was with her every night she slept alone. He then talked to me of Monsieur . . . , who must have conceived the greatest friendship for me. He was persuaded that the sure way to reach a woman who had a jealous husband was to conquer the husband, because friendship by its very nature excluded jealousy.

The next day at the dinner for four, Madame . . . , in her husband's presence, showed me a friendliness equal to his, and they promised to come and spend three days with me during the following week.

I saw them arrive one afternoon without having sent me word. When I saw her chambermaid get out of the carriage too, my heart leaped for joy; however, its transports were moderated by two unpleasant announcements: the first, conveyed to me by Monsieur . . . , was that he must return to Soleure on the fourth day; the second, conveyed by Madame . . . , was that Madame F. must constantly be of the company. I at once took them to the apartment which I had chosen for them and which was the most suitable for my plans. It was on the ground floor on the opposite side of the house from mine. The bedroom had an alcove with two beds separated by a partition in which there was a communicating door. It was entered through two anterooms, the door to the first of which gave on the garden. I had the key for all these doors. The chambermaid was to sleep in the room above their bedroom.

Obedient to my goddess's decree, we called on Madame F., who received us very cordially, but who, on the excuse of leaving us free, declined to spend all of the three days in our company. However, she saw fit to yield when I told her that our agreement should be in force only when I was alone. My housekeeper supped in her room without my having had to tell her to do so, and the ladies did not ask about her. After supper I escorted Madame and Monsieur to their apartment, after which I could not avoid escorting Madame F. to hers; but I excused myself from being present at her evening toilet, despite her urging. When I wished her good night she said with a knowing look that after I had behaved so well I deserved to attain what I desired. I made no answer.

The next day toward nightfall I told Madame . . .

that, having all the keys, I could enter her room and her bed at any hour. She replied that she expected to have her husband with her, for he had treated her to the flatteries he always bestowed on her when he had that in mind; but that it could be the next night, for he had never yet wanted to amuse himself two days in succession.

Toward noon we saw Monsieur de Chavigny arrive. A fifth place was quickly laid; but he protested loudly when he learned that my housekeeper was to dine alone in her room. The ladies said he was right, and we all went to make her lay by her needlework. She was the soul of our dinner; she kept us wonderfully entertained with amusing stories about Lady Montagu. When no one was within earshot Madame . . . told me it was impossible that I did not love her. After saying that I would show her otherwise I asked her to confirm her permission for me to spend two hours in her arms.

"No, my dear, for he told me this morning that the moon changes today at noon."

"Then he has to have permission from the moon to discharge his duty to you?"

"Exactly. According to his astrology, it is the way to preserve his health and to have a boy by the will of Heaven, for if Heaven does not take a hand I see no likelihood of it."

I could only laugh and resign myself to waiting for the next day. When we were taking our stroll she said that the sacrifice to the moon had been made, and that to be perfectly safe and free from any fear she would persuade him to make an extra one, after which he would fall asleep. So, she added, I could come an hour after midnight.

Sure that my happiness was imminent, I surrender to the joy which such a certainty inspires in a lover who has long been in a state of desire. It was the only night in which I could hope, for Monsieur . . . had decided to sleep in Soleure the next day; I could not expect a second night which might have been more animated than the first.

After supper I escort the ladies to their apartments, then retire to my room and tell my helpmate to go to bed, since I have much writing to do.

Five minutes before one o'clock I leave my room, and, the night being dark, I grope my way around half the house. I go to open the door of the apartment in which my angel was; but I find it open, and it does not occur to me to ask why. I open the door of the second antechamber, and I feel a grip. The hand she puts over my mouth tells me I must not speak. We let ourselves fall on the wide couch, and I instantly attain the height of my desires. It was the summer solstice. Having but two hours before me, I did not lose a minute; I used them in giving reiterated proofs of the fire which was devouring me to the divine woman I was sure I held in my arms. I thought that her decision not to wait for me in her bed had been supremely farsighted, since the sound of our kisses might have waked her husband. Her furies, which seemed to exceed mine, raised my soul to heaven, and I felt certain that of all my conquests this was the first in which I could rightly take pride.

The clock tells me I must leave; I get up after giving her the sweetest of kisses, and I return to my room, where I surrender to sleep in perfect contentment. I wake at nine o'clock, and I see Monsieur . . . , who with the greatest satisfaction shows me a letter he had just received from his cousin, telling him his good news. He asks me to come and take chocolate in his room, since his wife is still at her toilet. I quickly put on a dressing gown, and, just as I am starting off with Monsieur . . . , in comes Madame F., who thanks me in a tone of great glee and tells me she is going back to her house in Soleure.

"Wait a quarter of an hour, we are to breakfast with Madame . . . ."

"No, I have just wished her good morning, and I am off. Good-by."

"Good-by, Madame."

No sooner has she left than Monsieur . . . asks me if she has gone mad. There was reason to think so, for, having been treated with perfect politeness, she ought at least to have waited until evening and left with Monsieur and Madame.

We went to take breakfast and indulge in commentaries on her sudden departure. Then we set out to stroll in the garden, where we found my housekeeper, whom Monsieur . . . approached. I thought Madame seemed a trifle depressed, so I ask her if she slept well.

"I did not go to sleep until four o'clock, after sitting up waiting for you in vain. What mishap kept you from coming?"

This question, which I could not possibly expect, freezes my blood. I look at her, I do not answer, I cannot shake off my surprise. It leaves me only when I am horror-struck, guessing that the woman I had held in my arms was F. I instantly withdraw behind the hedge to recover from an agitation which no one can rightly conceive. I felt that I was dying. To keep from falling I leaned my head against a tree. The first idea which came to me, but which I instantly dismissed, was that Madame . . . meant to disavow our meeting; any woman who gives herself to a man in a dark place has the right to deny it, and it may be impossible to convict her of lying; but I knew Madame . . . too well to suppose her capable of such perfidy, of a baseness inconceivable to any woman on earth except those veritable monsters who are the horror and shame of the human race. At the same moment I saw that if she had told me she had waited in vain merely to enjoy my surprise, she would have been lacking in delicacy, for in a matter of this sort the slightest doubt is already a degradation. So I saw the truth. F. had supplanted her. How had she managed it? How had she known? It was something to be reasoned out, and reasoning does not follow from an idea which oppresses the mind until the oppression has lost the greater part of its power. So I am left with the horrible certainty that I have spent two hours in the company of a monster from hell, and the thought which kills me is that I cannot deny having felt happy. That is what I cannot forgive myself, for the difference between the one woman and the other was immense and subject to the infallible tribunal of all my senses; however, sight and hearing could not enter in. But that is not enough for me to forgive myself. Touch alone should have sufficed me. I cursed Love, Nature, and my own cowardly weakness in consenting to receive into my house the monster who had dishonored my angel and made me despise myself. At that moment I sentenced myself to death, but fully determined, before I ceased to live, to tear to pieces with my own hands the Megaera[21] who had made me the most wretched of men.

While I am plunged in this Styx[22] Monsieur . . . appears, asking me if I feel ill, and is horrified to see my pallor; he says that his wife had been uneasy over it; I reply that I had left her because of a slight attack of dizziness, and that I already felt well again. We rejoin them. My helpmate gives me eau des Carmes[23] and says playfully that what had affected me so strongly was Madame F.'s departure.

When I was again with Madame . . . and at a distance from her husband, who was talking with the widow Dubois, I said that what had troubled me was that what she had said was certainly a joke.

"I was not joking, my dear; so tell me why you did not come last night."

At this answer I thought I should drop dead. I could not bring myself to tell her the reality, and I did not know what I should invent to justify myself for not having gone to her bed as we had agreed. Somber and speechless, I was in this state of irresolution when Dubois's little maid came to give her a letter which Madame F. had sent by express messenger. She opens it and gives me the enclosure, which was addressed to me. I put it in my pocket, saying that I will read it at my convenience, they do not urge me, they laugh. Monsieur . . . says it is love; I let him chatter on, I gain control of myself; dinner is announced, we go; I cannot eat, but it is laid to my indisposition. I could not wait to read the letter, but I had to find the time. After we get up from table I say that I feel better, and I take coffee.

Instead of getting up the usual game of piquet, Madame . . . says that it is cool in the covered walk and we should take advantage of it. I give her my arm, her husband gives his to the widow Dubois, and we go.

As soon as she was certain they could not hear what she had to tell me, she began as follows:

"I am sure you spent the night with that evil woman, and I may, though I don't know how, be compromised. Tell me all, my dear, this is my first intrigue; but if I am to learn from it I must know everything. I am sure that you loved me; alas, do not leave me now to believe that you have become my enemy!"

"Good heavens! I your enemy!"

"Then tell me the whole truth, and above all before you read the letter you have received. I implore you in Love's name to hide nothing from me."

"Here is the whole story in a few words. I enter your apartment at midnight, and in the second anteroom I feel a grip, a hand over my mouth tells me not to speak, I clasp you in my arms, and we fall on the couch together. Do you understand that I must be certain it is you, that I cannot possibly doubt it? So, never saying a word to you, and never hearing you speak to me, I spent the two most delicious hours I have spent in all my life; accursed two hours, the memory of which will make this world hell to me until my last breath. At a quarter past three o'clock I left you. You know all the rest."

"Who can have told the monster that you would come to my room at one o'clock?"

"I have no idea."

"Admit that, among the three of us, I am the most to be pitied and perhaps the only one who is unhappy."

"In God's name never believe that, for I am planning to go and stab her and then kill myself."

"And in the scandal which will follow, to leave me the most unfortunate of all women. Let us be calm. Give me the letter she wrote you. I will read it among the trees, you shall read it afterward. If they saw us reading it we should have to let them read it too."

I give it to her, and return to Monsieur . . . , whom my helpmate was convulsing with laughter. After our dialogue I felt a little more sane. The assurance with which she had insisted on my giving her the monster's letter had pleased me. I was curious about it, yet I felt loath to read it. It could only enrage me, and I feared the effects of a righteous anger.

Madame . . . rejoined us, and after we had separated again she handed me the letter, telling me to read it alone and in a calm frame of mind. She asked me to give her my word of honor that I would do nothing in the matter without first consulting her, sending her word of all my ideas through the caretaker's wife. She said we need not fear that F. would tell what had happened, since she would be the first to publish her own shame, and that our best course was to dissimulate. She made me still more curious to read the letter by saying that the harpy gave me a warning which I must not ignore.

What pierced my soul during my angel's very sensible discourse was her tears, which streamed from her eyes without any distortion of her beautiful face. She tried to moderate my all too visible distress by mingling smiles with her tears; but I saw only too well what was taking place in her noble and generous soul not to understand the pitiable state of her heart from her certainty that the vile F. knew beyond peradventure that there was an illicit understanding between us. It was this which made my despair unbounded.

She left at seven o'clock with her husband, whom I thanked in words so unfeigned that he could not doubt that they sprang from the purest friendship, and really I was not deceiving him. What natural sentiment can prevent a man who loves a woman from feeling the most sincere and affectionate friendship for her husband, if she has one? Many laws only serve to increase prejudices. I embraced him, and when I started to kiss Madame's hand he generously asked me to do her the same honor. I went to my room impatient to read the letter from the harpy who had made me the most wretched of men. Here it is, in a faithful copy, except for a few expressions which I have corrected:

"I left your house, Monsieur, sufficiently content, not because I had spent two hours with you, for you are not different from other men and in any case my whim was only something to amuse me, but because I have avenged myself for the public marks of contempt which you have shown me, for I have forgiven you the private ones. I have avenged myself on your scheming by unmasking your designs and the hypocrisy of your . . . , who in future can no longer look down on me with the show of superiority which she borrowed from her pretended virtue. I have avenged myself by making her wait up for you all last night, as she must have done, and by the comic dialogue between you this morning in which you must have let her know that I had appropriated what was intended for her, and by your no longer being able to believe her a miracle of nature, for if you took me for her I cannot be in any way different from her, and hence you must be cured of the mad passion which possessed you and made you adore her in preference to all other women. If I have opened your eyes you are indebted to me for a good deed; but I dispense you from any gratitude, and I even permit you to hate me, provided your hatred leaves me in peace, for if in future I consider your behavior insulting I am capable of coming out with the whole story, having nothing to fear on my account, for I am a widow, my own mistress, and in a position to laugh at what anyone may say about me. I need no one. Your . . . , on the other hand, is obliged to keep up a front. But here is a warning I give you, to convince you that I am kind.

"Know, Monsieur, that for ten years I have had a slight indisposition which I have never been able to cure. You did enough last night to contract it; I advise you to take remedies at once. I warn you, so that you will be careful not to transmit it to your beauty, who in her ignorance might give it to her husband, and to others, which would make her miserable, and I should be sorry, for she has never harmed me or wronged me. Since I thought it impossible that the two of you would not cuckold the dear man, I came to stay in your house only to convince myself by clear evidence that my conclusion was not unfounded. I carried out my plan without needing anyone's help. After spending two whole nights in vain on the couch which you well know, I resolved to spend a third there too, and it crowned my enterprise with success. No one in the house ever saw me, and my chambermaid herself does not know the purpose of my nocturnal wanderings. Hence it lies with you to bury the episode in silence, and I advise you to do so.

"P.S.—If you need a doctor, impress discretion upon him, for it is known in Soleure that I suffer from this little ailment, and people might say you got it from me. That would be insulting."

The calculated insolence of this letter struck me as so out of all proportion that it almost made me laugh. I knew perfectly well that F. could only hate me, after the way in which I had treated her; but I should never have believed that she could carry her revenge to such lengths. She had given me her disease; I could not yet see the symptoms, but I had no doubt of it; the misery of having to cure it already possessed me. I had to give up my love affair, and even go away to be cured to avoid the gossip of malicious tongues. The prudent decision I reached in two hours of dark meditation was to say nothing, but with the firm determination to have my revenge the moment an opportunity arose.

Having eaten nothing at dinner, I really needed to sup well and get a sound sleep. I sat down at table with my helpmate, whom, in the sorrow of my soul, I never once looked in the face all through supper.

CHAPTER VII

The preceding chapter continued. I leave Soleure.

BUT AS soon as the servants had gone and we were left sitting face to face, the young widow, who was beginning to love me because I made her happy, took it upon herself to make me talk.

"Your sadness," she said, "is not like you, and it frightens me. It might relieve you to confide your concerns to me. I ask it only because you interest me; I might be able to help you. Be sure of my discretion. To encourage you to speak freely and to have some confidence in me, I can tell you everything I now know about you without having made any inquiries or used any of the other means by which an indiscreet curiosity could pry into what it is not for me to know."

"Very well, my dear. Your frankness pleases me; I see that you are my friend, and I am grateful to you for it. So begin by telling me frankly all that you know about the things which are troubling me at this moment."

"Gladly. You and Madame . . . are lovers. Madame F., who was here, and whom you treated very badly, played some spiteful trick on you, which, I think, very nearly resulted in a misunderstanding between you and Madame . . . ; then she left your house with a rudeness which nothing can condone. This upsets you. You fear there will be further consequences; you are painfully aware that you must decide on a course; your heart and your mind are at odds, passion and sentiment war in you. I'm not sure. I am only guessing. What I am sure of is that yesterday you looked happy, and today I feel you are to be pitied, and I feel it because the friendship you have inspired in me could not be greater. I outdid myself today keeping Monsieur . . . amused, I tried my best to entertain him, so that he would leave you free to talk with his wife, who seems to me well worthy to possess your heart."

"All that you have said is true; your friendship is precious to me, and I value your intelligence. Madame F. is a monster who has made me wretched in order to avenge herself for my scorn; and I cannot take any revenge on her. Honor forbids me to tell you more; besides, neither you nor anyone else can possibly give me advice which could lift the burden of my grief from me. I may well die of it, my dear; but meanwhile I beg you to remain my friend and always to talk to me with the same sincerity. I will always listen to you attentively. This is the way in which you can be useful to me, and I shall be grateful to you for it."

I spent a cruel night, which has always been a most unusual thing for a man of my temperament. Righteous anger alone, mother of the desire for revenge, has always sufficed to keep me awake, and sometimes, too, the announcement of a great happiness which I did not expect. Intense satisfaction deprives me of the comfort of sleep, and of appetite as well. Otherwise, even in the greatest anguish of mind, I have always eaten well and slept still better; in consequence, I have always extricated myself from situations to which, but for that, I should have succumbed. I rang for Leduc very early; the little girl came to tell me Leduc was ill and that Madame Dubois would bring me my chocolate.

.She came, and she said I looked like a corpse and that I had done well to forgo my baths. No sooner had I drunk my chocolate than I vomited it up, for the first time in my life. It was my helpmate who had made it for me; otherwise I should have believed that F. had poisoned me. A minute later I vomited all that I had eaten for supper and, with great effort, a bitter, green, viscous phlegm which convinced me that the poison I had vomited had been administered by black rage, which, when it is strong enough, kills the man who denies it the revenge it demands. It was demanding F.'s life, and, but for the chocolate which drove it out, it would have killed me. Exhausted by my efforts, I saw my helpmate crying.

"Why are you crying?"

"I don't know what you may think."

"Be easy, my dear. I think that my condition is gaining me the continuance of your friendship. Leave me, for now I hope to sleep."

And in fact I woke restored to life. I was happy to find that I had slept for seven hours. I ring, my helpmate comes in and tells me that the surgeon from the next village wants to speak with me. She had come in very sad; suddenly I see her become cheerful, I ask her the reason, and she says that she sees me brought back to life. I tell her we will dine after I have heard what the surgeon has to say. He comes in and, after looking all around the room, whispers in my ear that my valet has the pox. I burst out laughing, for I expected something terrible.

"My dear friend, take care of him and spare no expense; I will recompense you generously; but next time don't put such a long face on your confidences. How old are you?"

"Eighty in a few days."

"God preserve you!"

As I feared that I was in the same condition, I felt sorry for my poor Spaniard, who, after all, was having the accursed plague for the first time, whereas I was at something like my twentieth.[1] It is true that I was fourteen years older than he.

My helpmate, coming back to dress me, asks me to tell her what the old fellow had said to make me laugh so hard.

"Gladly; but first tell me if you know the meaning of the word 'pox.'"

"I do. One of Lady Montagu's couriers died of it."

"Excellent; but pretend you don't know. Leduc has it."

"Poor fellow! And is that what made you laugh?"

"It was because the surgeon made such a mystery of it."

After combing my hair she said that she, too, had a great confidence to make to me, after which I must either forgive her or dismiss her on the spot.

"More trouble! What the devil have you done? Out with it!"

"I robbed you."

"What! When? How? Can you give it back? I didn't think you were a thief. I never forgive thieves, or liars either."

"How hasty you are! Yet I am sure you will forgive me, for I robbed you only half an hour ago, and I will restore it to you this minute."

"If it was only half an hour ago, you deserve a plenary indulgence, my dear; now give me back what you have no right to keep."

"Here it is."

"F.'s letter? Have you read it?"

"Of course. That was my theft."

"Then you have stolen my secret, and the theft is of the gravest because you can't restore what you took. O my dear Dubois, you have committed a great crime."

"I know it. Such a theft cannot be made good; but I can assure you that what I took shall remain in me as if I had utterly forgotten it. You must forgive me, quickly, quickly."

"Quickly, quickly! You are a strange creature. Quickly, quickly, then, I forgive you, and I embrace you; but in future refrain not only from reading but even from touching my papers. I have secrets[2] which I am not free to divulge. So forget the horrors you have read."

"Listen, please. Permit me not to forget them, and you may be the gainer. Let us discuss this terrible business. It made my hair stand on end. The monster has dealt your soul a mortal blow and your body another, and the foul creature has got Madame . . .'s honor in her keeping. This, my dear master, I think her greatest crime; for, despite the affront, your love will survive, and the disease the harridan has given you will go away; but Madame . . .'s honor, if the foul creature does what she threatens to do, is lost forever. So do not order me to forget, but on the contrary let us discuss the situation and try to find a remedy. Believe me, I am worthy of your trust and I am sure that before long I shall win all your esteem."

I thought I was dreaming when I heard a young woman of her station in life talk to me more sensibly than Minerva did to Telemachus.[3] It took no more than what she had just said to gain her not only the esteem for which she hoped but my respect as well.

"Yes, my dear friend," I said, "let us consider how to deliver Madame . . . from the danger which threatens her, and I am grateful to you for believing that it is not impossible. Let us think of it and talk of it day and night. Continue to love her, and forgive her for her first misstep, guard her honor, and pity my state; be my true friend, cease to use the odious title of 'master,' and replace it by that of 'friend'; I shall be that to you so long as I live, I swear it. Your wise words have won my heart; come to my arms."

"No, no, there's no need for that; we are young and we could only too easily be led into offending. To be happy I want only your friendship, but I do not want it for nothing. I want to deserve it by convincing proofs which I shall give you of mine. I will go and order dinner served, and I hope you will feel perfectly well after it."

So much discretion astonished me. It might be assumed; for after all to counterfeit it the widow Dubois had only to know its principles; but that was not what troubled me. I foresaw that I should fall in love with her and risk becoming the dupe of her morality, which her self-esteem would never let her abandon even if she fell in love with me in the full sense of the word. So I decided to leave my budding love unfed. Leaving it forever in infancy could not but make it die of boredom. Boredom kills the young. At least such was my hope. I forgot that it is impossible to feel nothing but friendship for a woman whom one thinks pretty, whom one sees constantly, and whom one suspects of being in love. Friendship at its apogee becomes love, and, relieving itself by the same sweet mechanism which love needs to make itself happy, it rejoices to have become stronger after the fond act. This is what befell the fond Anacreon[4] with Smerdis, Cleobulus, and Bathyllus.[5] A Platonist [6] who maintains that one can be merely the friend of a pleasing young woman with whom one lives is a visionary. My housekeeper was too attractive and too intelligent; it was impossible that I should not fall in love with her.

We did not begin to talk until we had eaten a good dinner, for there is nothing more imprudent and dangerous than talking in the presence of servants, who are always malicious or ignorant, who misunderstand, who add and subtract, and who think they are privileged to reveal their masters' secrets without being taken to task for it because they know them without having been entrusted with them.

My helpmate began by asking me if I was sufficiently convinced of Leduc's loyalty.

"He is, my dear, a rascal at times, a great libertine, brave, even daring, quick-witted and ignorant, a brazen liar whom no one but myself can shake. With all his faults the scoundrel has one great good quality—whatever orders I give him he carries out blindly, braving any danger to which his obedience may expose him; he defies not only the cudgel but even the gallows if he sees it only in the distance. When I am traveling and it becomes necessary to know if I can risk fording a river in my carriage, he undresses without a word from me and sounds the bottom swimming."

"That will do. He is all you need. I announce to you, my dear friend—for so you will have me call you—that Madame . . . has nothing more to fear. Do as I tell you, and if Madame F. will not behave herself she will be the only one to be dishonored. But without Leduc we can do nothing. However, we must first learn the whole story of his pox, for there are several things which could thwart my plan. So go at once and find out from him yourself, and above all learn if he has told the servants about his misfortune. After you have learned everything, order him to keep the strictest silence concerning your interest in his illness."

Not racking my brains to guess her plan, I immediately go up to Leduc's quarters. I find him alone and in bed, I sit quietly down beside him and promise to get him cured provided he will tell me, without deviating from truth in anything, every least circumstance of the disease he had caught. He said that on the day he had gone to Soleure to fetch my letters he had dismounted halfway along the road to drink a glass of milk at a dairy where he had found an accommodating peasant girl who in only a quarter of an hour had bestowed on him what he instantly showed me. What was keeping him in bed was a great swelling of one testicle.

"Have you confessed this to anyone?"

"To no one, for I should be laughed at. Only the surgeon knows of my illness; but he doesn't know whom I caught it from. He told me he would rid me of the swelling at once, and that I can wait on you at table tomorrow."

"Very good. Continue to say nothing."

As soon as I repeated all this to my Minerva, she asked me these questions:

"Tell me if Madame F. can really swear that she spent those two hours on the couch with you."

"No, for she neither saw me nor heard me speak."

"Good. Then answer her infamous letter at once, saying that she has lied because you never left your room, and that you are going to make all necessary inquiries in your household to learn who the poor wretch is whom she infected without knowing him. Write, and send her the letter this instant; and in an hour and a half you shall send her a second letter, which I will now write and you shall copy."

"My charming friend, I see your ingenious plan; but I gave Madame . . . my word of honor that I would take no steps in the matter without telling her beforehand."

"Then there's nothing for it but to break your word of honor. It is love which keeps you from going as far as I do; but everything hinges on speed and on the time between the first letter and the second. Do it, my dear friend, and you shall know the rest when you read the letter I am going to write. Write the first one now.''

What made me act was nothing short of an enchantment, which I cherished. Here is a copy of the letter I wrote in the firm persuasion that my helpmate's plan was unparalleled:

''The shamelessness of your letter is as surprising as the three nights you spent convincing yourself that your vile suspicion had a foundation. Know, monster from hell, that I did not leave my room, so you spent the two hours with God alone knows whom; but I may find out, and I will inform you. Give thanks to Heaven that I did not unseal your infamous letter until Monsieur and Madame . . . had gone. I received it in their presence, but scorning the hand which had written it I put it in my pocket, and neither of them asked about it. If they had read it I would certainly have pursued you and killed you with my own hands, woman unworthy of life. I am perfectly well, but I have no intention of convincing you of it to prove that it was not I who enjoyed your carcass.''

After showing it to the widow Dubois, who approved of it, I sent it to the wretch who had made me wretched. An hour and a half later I sent her this one, which I simply copied without adding a word to it:

''A quarter of an hour after I wrote to you the surgeon came to tell me that my valet needed his services because of a discharge he had recently contracted and symptoms which showed that he had absorbed the venomous poison of the pox. I ordered him to take care of him; and later I went alone to see the patient, who, not without some reluctance, confessed to me that it was from you he had received the fine gift. He told me that, having seen you enter Madame . . .'s apartment alone and in the dark after he put me to bed, he became curious to see what you were doing there, for if you had wished to call on the lady herself, who at that hour must be in bed, you would not have gone in by the door onto the garden. After waiting an hour to see if you would come out, he decided to go in too when he saw that you had left the door ajar. He swore to me that he did not go in with any idea of enjoying your charms, which I had no difficulty in believing, but to see if it was not some other man on whom that good fortune was being bestowed. He assured me that he nearly shouted for help when you seized him, putting one hand over his mouth, but that he changed his mind when he found himself pulled down on the couch and covered with kisses. He said that, feeling certain that you took him for someone else, he had done his duty by you for two hours on end in a manner which should have earned him a very different reward from the one you gave him, whose dismal symptoms he saw the next day. He left you, still without having spoken, at the first ray of dawn, fearing he would be recognized. Nothing could be easier than that you should have taken him for me, and I congratulate you on having enjoyed in imagination a pleasure which, being what you are, you would certainly never have obtained in reality. I warn you that the poor fellow is determined to pay you a visit, and that I cannot stop him; so be gentle with him, for he might tell the story, and you must realize the consequences of that. He will himself acquaint you with his demands, and I advise you to grant them.''

I sent it to her, and an hour later I received her answer to the first letter, which, having contained only ten or twelve lines, was not long. She said that my scheme was ingenious, but that it would get me nothing, since she was sure of the facts. She defied me to visit her within a few days to convince her that the state of my health was different from hers.

At supper my helpmate told me stories meant to cheer me up, but I was too gloomy to respond to them. We were now to take the third step which was to crown our work and drive the shameless F. to the wall; and since I had written the two letters in obedience to her instructions, I saw that I must obey her to the end. It was she who told me what orders I was to give Leduc when I summoned him to my room in the morning. She wanted to have the satisfaction of hiding in the alcove behind the curtains so that she could herself hear me tell him what to do.

So, having summoned him, I asked him if he was fit to ride to Soleure on an errand which was of the utmost importance to me.

"Yes, Monsieur; but the surgeon insists that I begin taking baths tomorrow."

"So you may. You will leave at once for Madame F.'s in Soleure, you will not have yourself announced as coming from me because she must not know that I have sent you to her. Say that you need to speak with her. If she will not receive you, wait in the street; but I think she will receive you, and even without witnesses. You will tell her that she has given you the pox without your asking her for it, and that you insist on her giving you the money you need to regain your health. You will tell her that she kept you at work for two hours in the dark without recognizing you, and that but for the nasty present she gave you, you would never have spoken; but that, finding yourself in the state which you will show her, she should not blame you for having come to her. If she resists, threaten to take her to court. That is all. You will come back without losing a minute to tell me what she answers you."

"But if she has me thrown out of the window, I shan't be back very soon."

"You need have no fear of that; I give you my word for it."

"It is a strange errand."

"You are the only person in the world who can carry it off."

"I am ready; but there are a few questions I need to ask. Has the lady really got the pox?"

"Yes."

"I'm sorry for her. But how am I to tell her she gave it to me when I've never talked with her?"

"Talking isn't the way it's given, you nincompoop. You spent two hours with her in the dark and without talking; she will learn that she gave it to you when she thought she was giving it to someone else."

"Now I begin to see it. But if we were in the dark, how can I know it was she I was with?"

"You saw her go in; but you can be sure she will not ask you any questions."

"I will be off at once. I'm more curious than you are to hear what she'll answer me. But here is something else I need to know. She may try to haggle over the money she is to give me for a cure; and in that case please tell me if I shall be content with a hundred écus."

"That's too much in Switzerland; fifty are enough."

"It's not much for two hours' work."

"I'll give you another fifty."

"That sounds more like it; I am off, and I think I understand everything. I won't say so, but I'll wager it's you to whom she gave the present, that you are ashamed of it and want to deny it."

"Possibly. Keep your mouth shut and go."

"Do you know, my friend, that he is a clown in a thousand?" said my helpmate, coming out of the alcove. "I almost burst out laughing when he told you he wouldn't be back soon if she had him thrown out of the window. I am sure he will do the thing marvelously well, and by the time he gets to Soleure she will already have sent off her answer to the second letter. I'm very curious to see it."

"You are the author of this farce, my dear; it is sublime, plotted in masterly fashion. One would not attribute it to a young woman with no experience in intrigues."

"Yet it is my first, and I hope it will succeed."

"If only she doesn't challenge me to show her that I am well."

"But you feel well so far, I think."

"Very well."

"It would be a good joke, if it weren't true that she must at least have the whites."[7]

"In that case I should have no fears for my health; but what would happen to Leduc? I cannot wait to see the end of the play, for the peace of my mind."

"You shall write it, and send it to Madame . . . ."

"There's no doubt of that. You understand I must say I am the author; but I will not cheat you out of the reward your work deserves."

"The reward I want is for you to have no more secrets from me."

"That's odd. How can you be so interested in my concerns? I cannot see you as naturally curious."

"That is an ugly fault. You will only make me curious when I see that you are sad. Your considerate behavior toward me is the reason I am fond of you."

"I am really touched, my dear. In future I promise I will confide to you anything that can keep you from being uneasy."

"Oh, how happy I shall be!"

An hour after Leduc left, a man arrived on foot and gave me a letter from F. and a package, saying that he was to wait for the answer. I told him to wait outside. My helpmate being present, I asked her to read the letter and myself went to the window. My heart was pounding. She called me when she had read it and said that all was well. Here is the letter:

"Whether all that you tell me is true or is an invention of your scheming mind—of which, unfortunately for you, all Europe is informed—I accept as true what I cannot deny has the appearance of truth. I am in despair that I have harmed an innocent person, and I willingly pay the penalty. I beg you to give him the twenty-five louis which I send you; but will you be generous enough to use all your authority as his master to bind him to the strictest silence? I hope so, for, knowing me as you do, you must fear my vengeance. Consider that if the story of this farce comes out I can easily put it in a light which will cause you distress and open the eyes of the honest man whom you are deceiving; for I will never let it drop. As it is my wish that we do not meet again, I have found an excuse to visit my relatives in Lucerne tomorrow. Write me if you receive this letter."

"I am sorry," I said to my helpmate, "that I made Leduc go, for she is a violent woman and something regrettable may happen."

"Nothing will happen. Send back her money at once. She will give it to him in person, and your revenge will be complete. She can have no more doubts. You will know all when he comes back in two or three hours. Everything has gone perfectly, and the honor of the charming and noble woman whom you love is completely safe. You have now only the unpleasant certainty that you bear the wretched creature's disease in your blood; but I think it is no great matter and can easily be cured, for persistent whites cannot be called the pox, and indeed it is not often, as I learned in London, that the whites are transmitted. We can also be very glad that she leaves tomorrow for Lucerne. Laugh, my dear friend, I beg you, for our play is still a comedy."

"Alas, it is a tragedy. I know the human heart; Madame . . . can no longer love me."

"It is true that some change—but this is not the time to think of that. Quick, answer her in a few lines and send her back the twenty-five louis."

Here is my brief answer:

"Your base suspicion, your horrible plan for revenge, and the shameless letter you wrote me are the reasons for your present repentance. Our messengers crossed, and it is not my fault. I send back your twenty-five louis. I could not stop Leduc from going to see you; but you can easily appease him. I wish you a good journey, and I promise to avoid any chance of seeing you. Learn, wicked woman, that the world is not entirely peopled by monsters who set traps for the honor of those who hold honor dear. If at Lucerne you see the Papal Nuncio,[8] mention me to him and you will learn what opinion Europe holds of my mind. I can assure you that my valet has told no one the story of his present indisposition, and that he will continue not to tell it if you have received him well. Good-by, Madame."

After having the widow Dubois read my letter, of which she approved, I sent it off with the money.

"The play is not yet over; we still have three scenes: the Spaniard's return, the appearance of your painful symptoms, and Madame . . .'s astonishment when she learns the whole story."

But two hours pass, then three and four, then the whole day, and Leduc does not appear, and I am thrown into real anxiety, although the widow Dubois, never yielding an inch, kept saying he could only be so late because he had not found F. at home. There are characters incapable of foreseeing disaster. Such was I until the age of thirty when I was imprisoned under the Leads. Now that I am entering my dotage everything I foresee is black. I see it in a wedding to which I am invited, and at the coronation[9] of Leopold II, I said: Nolo coronari ("I do not want to be crowned"). Accursed old age, fit to inhabit hell, where others have already placed it: tristisque senectus ("wretched old age").[10]

At half past nine, by the light of the moon, my helpmate saw Leduc riding up at a walk. I had no candle, she stationed herself in the alcove. He came in, saying that he was dying of hunger.

"I waited for her," he said, "until half past six, and, when she saw me at the foot of the stairs, she said she had nothing to say to me. I replied that it was I who had something to say to her, and she stopped to read a letter which I saw was in your handwriting, and she put a package in her pocket. I followed her into her room, where, finding no one present, I told her she had given me the pox and that I asked her to pay the doctor for me. I was getting ready to show her proof, but, looking away, she asked me if I had been waiting for her long; and when I replied that I had been in her courtyard from eleven o'clock, she went out, and, having learned from the servant whom it seems she sent here the hour at which he had got back, she returned and, closing the door, gave me this package, saying that I would find twenty-five louis in it to cure me if I was sick and adding that if I loved my life I must refrain from talking to anyone at all on the subject. I left, and here I am. Is the package mine?"

"Yes. Go to bed."

My helpmate then came out in triumph, and we embraced. The next morning I saw the first symptom of my wretched disease; but three or four days later I saw that it amounted to very little. A week later, after taking only eau de nitre,[11] I was entirely rid of it—quite unlike Leduc, who was in a very bad state.

I spent the whole morning of the next day writing to Madame . . . , telling her in great detail all that I had done despite the promise I had made her. I sent her copies of all the letters, and everything necessary to prove to her that F. had left for Lucerne convinced that her revenge had been entirely imaginary. I ended my twelve-page letter by confessing that I had just found I was ill but assuring her that in two or three weeks I should be completely well. I gave my letter to the caretaker's wife with the greatest secrecy, and on the next day but one I received eight or ten lines from her telling me that I would see her during the week with her husband and Monsieur de Chavigny.

Alas for me! I had to renounce any idea of love; but the widow Dubois, my only companion, who, Leduc being ill, spent every hour of the day with me, was beginning to preoccupy me too greatly. The more I abstained from attempting anything, the more I fell in love with her, and it was in vain I told myself that by dint of seeing her constantly and letting nothing come of it I should at last become indifferent to her. I had presented her with a ring, saying that I would give her a hundred louis for it if she ever wanted to sell it, and she assured me that she would not dream of selling it until she was in need after I had dismissed her. The idea of dismissing her seemed nonsense. She was unspoiled, sincere, amusing, with a natural intelligence which enabled her to reason in the soundest manner. She had never loved, and she had married an old man only to please Lady Montagu.

She wrote to no one but her mother, and I read her letters to please her. Having asked her one day to show me the replies, I could not help laughing when she said she did not answer her because she had never learned to write.

"I thought she was dead," she said, "when I came back from England, and it made me very happy when I reached Lausanne and found her in perfect health."

"Who escorted you?"

"No one."

"It is unbelievable. Young, with the figure you have, well dressed, thrown in the company of so many different kinds of people, young men, libertines, for they are everywhere—how were you able to defend yourself?"

"Defend myself? I never needed to. The great secret is never to look at anyone, to pretend not to hear, not to answer, and to lodge alone in a room, or with the hostess when one happens on a decent inn."

She had not had an adventure in all her life, she had never strayed from her duty. She had never had the misfortune—so she put it—to fall in love. She kept me amused from morning to night without a sign of prudery, and we often addressed each other as "tu." She talked to me admiringly of Madame . . .'s charms, and she listened with the utmost interest when I recounted my vicissitudes in love, and when I came to certain descriptions and she saw that I was concealing some too piquant circumstances, she urged me to tell her everything plainly with a charm so potent that I had to satisfy her. When my overfaithful descriptions were too much for her, she burst out laughing, got up, and after putting her hand over my mouth to keep me from going on, she ran away to her room, where she locked herself in to prevent me, she said, from coming to ask her for what at those moments she was only too desirous of granting me; but she did not tell me all this till we were in Bern. Our great friendship had reached its most dangerous period just when F. tainted me.

After supper on the day preceding the one on which Monsieur de Chavigny unexpectedly came to dine at my house with Madame . . . and her husband,[12] my helpmate asked me if I had been in love in Holland. I thereupon told her what had happened to me with Esther; but when I came to my examining her labia minora to find the little mark which she alone knew, my charming housekeeper ran to me to stop my mouth, shaking with laughter and falling into my arms. At that I could not refrain from searching her so-and-so for some mark, and in her spasms of laughter she could offer me very little resistance. Not being able to proceed to the great conclusion because of my health, I begged her to help me to a crisis which had become a necessity for me, at the same time doing her the same sweet service. It lasted scarcely a minute, and our curious eyes took their amorous but inactive share in it. After it was over she said, laughing but at the same time serious:

"My dear friend, we love each other, and if we are not careful we shall not long confine ourselves to mere trifling."

So saying, she rose, gave a sigh, and after wishing me good night went off to sleep with the little girl. It was the first time that we let our senses carry us away. I went to bed knowing that I was in love and foreseeing all that was bound to happen to me with this young woman, who had already gained a very strong hold on my heart.

We were pleasantly surprised the next morning to see Monsieur de Chavigny with Monsieur and Madame . . . . We strolled until dinnertime, then sat down at table with my dear Dubois, by whom I thought my two male guests were enchanted. Strolling after dinner, they never left her side; and for my part I had all the time I needed to repeat to Madame . . . the whole story I had written her, though I did not tell her it was Dubois who deserved the credit, for it would have mortified her to learn that her weakness was known to her.

Madame . . . told me that she had taken the greatest pleasure in reading the whole account simply because F. could no longer believe she had spent the two hours with me.

"But how," she asked, "were you able to spend two hours in that woman's company without knowing, even despite the dark, that it was not I? I am humiliated that the difference between her and me had no effect on you. She is shorter than I am, much thinner, and what amazes me is that her breath is foul. Yet you were deprived only of sight, and everything escaped you. It is unbelievable."

"I was intoxicated with love, my dear; then, too, the eyes of my soul saw only you."

"I understand the power of imagination, but imagination should have lost all its power in the absence of one thing which you knew beforehand you would find in me."

"You are right; it is your beautiful bosom, and when I think today that all I had in my hands was two flabby bladders I want to kill myself."

"You were aware of it, and it did not disgust you?"

"Sure that I was in your arms, how could I find anything in you disgusting? Even the roughness of the skin and the too commodious retiring room did not have the power to make me doubt or to lessen my ardor."

"What are you saying! Loathsome woman! Foul, stinking sewer! I cannot get over it. Could you forgive all that in me?"

"Since I believed I was with you, everything could not but seem divine."

"Not at all. Finding me such, you should have thrown me on the floor, even beaten me."

"Ah, my love! How unjust you are now!"

"That may well be, my dear, I am so angry with the monster that I do not know what I am saying. But now that she has given herself to a servant, and after the mortifying visit she could not refuse, she must be dying of shame and anger. What amazes me is her believing him, for he is four inches shorter than you; and can she really believe that a valet could do the thing as you must have done it to her? I am sure that she is in love with him even now. Twenty-five louis! It's obvious. He would have been satisfied with ten. How lucky that the fellow was so conveniently ill! But did you have to tell him everything?"

"How can you think so! I let him suppose she had arranged to meet me in the anteroom and that I really spent two hours with her. Reasoning from what I ordered him to do, he saw that, in my disgust at knowing I was infected, and being in a position to deny the whole thing, I had hit on a plan which would punish her, avenge me, and keep her from ever boasting that she had possessed me."

"It's a delightful comedy. The fellow's impudence is astonishing and his boldness even more so, for F. could have lied about being ill, and then you see what a risk he took."

"It occurred to me, and it gave me some qualms, for I was perfectly well."

"But now you are under treatment, and I am the cause of it. I am in despair."

"My illness, my angel, is trifling. It is a discharge resembling the one called the whites. I drink nothing but eau de nitre; I shall be well in a week or ten days, and I hope—"

"Ah, my dear!"

"What?"

"Let us think of it no more, I implore you."

"That is a revulsion which may be very natural when love is not strong. Alas for me!"

"No—I love you, and you would be unjust if you ceased to love me. Let us be fond friends and no longer think of giving each other proofs of it which might be fatal to us."

"Accursed and infamous F.!"

"She has gone, and in two weeks we, too, will leave for Basel, where we shall remain until the end of November."

"The die is cast, and I see that I must submit to your decision, or rather, to my destiny, for everything that has happened to me since I came to Switzerland has been disastrous. What consoles me is that I have been able to save your honor."

"You have won my husband's esteem, we shall always be true friends."

"If you must leave I see that I had better leave before you. That will make the horrible F. even more convinced that our friendship was not illicit."

"You think like an angel, and convince me more and more that you love me. Where will you go?"

"To Italy, but first I shall stop in Bern and then in Geneva."

"So you will not come to Basel, and I am glad, because people would talk. But, if you can, look happy during the few days you are to be here, for sadness does not become you."

We rejoined the Ambassador and Monsieur . . . , whom the widow Dubois's talk had not left time to think of us. I reproached her for being so chary of her wit when she was with me, and Monsieur de Chavigny told us he thought we were in love; whereupon she took him up, and I continued to walk with Madame . . . .

"That woman," she said, "is a masterpiece. Tell me the truth, and before you leave I will show you my gratitude in a way which will please you."

"What do you wish to know?"

"You love her and she loves you."

"I think so, but until now—"

"I do not want to know more, for if it is not yet done it will be done, and that comes to the same thing. If you had told me you did not love each other I should not have believed you, because it is impossible for a man of your age to live with such a woman and not love her. Extremely pretty, very intelligent, gay, with a ready tongue—she has everything to enchant, and I am sure you will find it hard to part from her. Lebel has done her a bad turn, for her reputation was excellent; but now she will not find employment with decent people."

"I shall take her to Bern with me."

"An excellent idea."

Just as they were leaving I said that I would come to Soleure to bid them good-by, since I had decided to leave for Bern in a few days. Reduced to giving up all thought of Madame . . . , I went to bed without supping, and my helpmate felt she should respect my grief.

Two or three days later I received a note from Madame . . . telling me to come to her house at ten the next day and ask to stay for dinner. I obeyed her exactly. Monsieur . . . said he would be delighted, but that he had to go to the country and could not be sure he would be back until one o'clock. He added that if I wished I could keep his wife company until he returned, and as she was at her embroidery frame with a girl I accepted on condition that she would not let me interrupt her work.

But toward noon the girl went away, and, left alone, we went to enjoy the fresh air on a terrace adjoining the house where there was an arbor from which, sitting at the back of it, we could see all the carriages that entered the street.

"Why," I instantly said, "did you not procure me this happiness when I was in perfect health?"

"Because then my husband believed you had only played the waiter for my sake and that I must dislike you; but your behavior has made him perfectly easy, to say nothing of your housekeeper, with whom he believes you are in love and whom he loves so much himself that I think he would gladly change places with you for a few days at least. Would you consent to the exchange?"

Having only an hour before me, and it no doubt the last in which I could convince her of the constancy of my love, I threw myself at her feet, and she put no obstacles in the way of my desires, which to my great regret had to be held in check, never going beyond the limits prescribed by the consideration I owed her blooming health. In what she allowed me to do, her greatest pleasure must certainly have consisted in convincing me how wrong I had been to be happy with F.

We ran to the other end of the arbor and into the open when we saw Monsieur . . .'s carriage enter the street. It was there that the worthy man found us, excusing himself for having been gone so long.

At table he talked to me almost constantly about the widow Dubois, and he did not seem satisfied until I told him I intended to take her to her mother's arms in Lausanne. I bade them farewell at five o'clock in order to call on Monsieur de Chavigny, to whom I told the whole story of my cruel adventure. I should have thought it a crime not to tell the lovable old man the whole of the charming comedy which he had done so much to set in motion.

Admiring the widow Dubois's quick intelligence—for I concealed nothing from him—he assured me that, old as he was, he would consider himself happy if he could have such a woman with him. He was very much pleased when I confided to him that I was in love with her. He said that without going from house to house I could take my leave of all the good society in Soleure by attending his evening assembly, not even staying for supper if I did not want to get home too late; and that is what I did. I saw my beauty, expecting that in all probability it would be for the last time; but I was mistaken. I saw her ten years later; and in the proper place my reader shall learn where, how, and on what occasion. I accompanied the Ambassador to his room, thanking him as he deserved and asking him for a letter to Bern, where I planned to spend some two weeks, and at the same time I asked him to send me his major-domo so that I could settle our accounts. He promised to have him bring me a letter for Monsieur de Muralt,[13] Avoyer of Thun.

Back at my lodging and sad at my imminent departure from a city where I had enjoyed only trifling gains in comparison with the real losses I had suffered there, I quietly thanked my helpmate for her kindness in waiting up for me, and I bade her good night, informing her that we would leave for Bern in three days and asking her to pack my trunks.

"Then you are taking me with you?" she said.

"Yes—that is, if you are interested enough in me to be glad you are coming."

"I am very glad; and the more so because I see that you are sad and in a way ill, whereas you were healthy and very gay when I entered your service. If I had to leave you I think the only thing that would make up to me for it would be to see you happy."

Just then the old surgeon came to tell me that Leduc was so ill that he could not get out of bed.

"I will have him treated at Bern. Tell him we shall leave day after tomorrow in time to dine there."

"Though it is only seven leagues he cannot make the journey, for he has lost the use of all his limbs."

I go to see him, and, as the surgeon had said, I find him unable to move. He had the use of nothing but his lips to speak and his eyes to see.

"Otherwise I feel perfectly well," he said.

"I believe you; but I want to dine at Bern tomorrow, and you cannot move."

"Have me carried, and find someone to cure me there."

"Very well; I will have you carried in a litter on two poles."

I ordered a manservant to look after him and to arrange everything necessary to get him to Bern at the "Falcon" inn,[14] hiring the two horses needed to carry the litter.

At noon I saw Lebel, who gave me the letter to Monsieur de Muralt which the Ambassador had written for me. He presented his account already receipted, and I paid him with the greatest pleasure, having found him honest in everything. I had him dine with me and the widow Dubois, and I was glad I had done so, for he amused us greatly. She held his attention from the beginning to the end of dinner; he told me that it was only now that he could say he had become acquainted with her, for at Lausanne he had spoken with her only two or three times, and formally. Getting up from table, he asked me to allow him to write to her, and it was she who gave him no time to retract and held him to his promise.

Lebel was a pleasant man, not yet fifty, and with a thoroughly honest face. When he left he embraced her in the French fashion, without asking my permission, and she submitted with good grace.

She said after he left that since his acquaintance could only be useful to her she was delighted that they were to correspond.

We spent the next day getting everything ready for our short journey. I saw Leduc set off in the litter to spend the night four leagues from Soleure. The next day at four o'clock in the morning, after liberally tipping the caretaker's family, the cook, and the lackey I was leaving behind, I set off in my carriage with my dear helpmate, and at eleven o'clock I arrived in Bern, putting up at the "Falcon," where Leduc had arrived two hours before me. After coming to an agreement with the host—for I knew very well what sort of men Swiss innkeepers were—I ordered the manservant I had kept, and who was from Bern, to take good care of Leduc and put him in the hands of the best-known doctor for the pox in the city. After dining with my helpmate in her room--for I had a room of my own—I delivered my letter to Monsieur de Muralt's porter, then went for a walk wherever chance should direct me.

CHAPTER VIII

Bern. La Matte. Madame de la Saône. Sara. My departure. Arrival at Basel.

ARRIVED AT a high point in the city from which I saw the wide countryside and a small river,[1] I went down at least a hundred steps and stopped upon seeing thirty or forty cabins which could only be booths for people wanting to take baths.[2] An honest-looking man asked me if I wished to bathe, and I having answered that I did he opened a cabin, and any quantity of bath girls came running up to me. The man said that each of them hoped for the honor of attending me in the bath, and that I was free to choose the one I wanted. He said that a petit écu would pay for the bath, the girl, and my breakfast as well. Like the Grand Turk, I throw my handkerchief to the one who most attracts me, and I go in.

She fastens the door inside, she changes my shoes for slippers, and, frowning and never looking me in the face, she puts a cotton cap on my front hair and my pigtail, and she undresses me: when she sees I am in the bath she undresses too and gets in, without asking my leave; and she begins rubbing me everywhere except on the place which, seeing that I kept my hand over it, she guessed I did not want her to touch. When I felt I had been rubbed enough I ask her for coffee. She gets out of the bath, rings, and opens the door. Then she gets back into the bath, as free in her movements as if she had been dressed.

A minute later an old woman brings us coffee, then leaves, and my bath girl gets out again to fasten the door, then returns to where she was.

I had already seen, though without letting my eyes linger on her, that the girl had all the beauties which an ardent lover imagines the object of his passion to possess. True enough, I felt that her hands were not soft, so contact might well prove her skin not to be so either, nor did I see on her face the look of distinction which we term nobility, or the smile with which good breeding prophesies sweetness, or the subtle glances which suggest things unspoken, or the pleasing expressions of reserve, respect, timidity, and modesty. Except for all that, my Swiss girl at the age of eighteen had everything to delight a man who was in good health and no enemy to nature; nevertheless she did not tempt me.

"What is this?" I said to myself. "The girl is beautiful, her eyes are large, her teeth white, the rose of her complexion bespeaks her good health, and she affects me not at all? I see her stark naked, and she does not arouse the slightest emotion in me? Why? It can only be because she has nothing of what coquetry borrows to inspire love. It follows that we love the false and the artificial, and the true no longer seduces us unless it is heralded by a vain show. If in our acquired habit of going clothed and not stark naked the face which one shows to everyone is what matters least, why should we make the face the most important thing of all? Why is it what makes us fall in love? Why do we decide upon its sole testimony if a woman is beautiful or not, and why are we even able to forgive her if the parts she does not show us are the very opposite of what her pretty face has led us to assume? Would it not be more natural and reasonable, would it not be better, to go always with the face covered and the rest stark naked, and fall in love with an object in that way, asking nothing else to crown our flame but a countenance corresponding to the charms which would already have made us fall in love? It would certainly be better, for then we would fall in love only with perfect beauty, and we could easily forgive it when, the mask removed, we found an ugly face where we had imagined a beautiful one. It would follow that only ugly women could never resolve to uncover their faces, and that the only ones who would consent would be the beauties; but the ugly ones at least would not make us sigh for fruition; they would grant us everything to avoid being forced to unmask, and they would only bring themselves to that when, by the enjoyment of their real charms, they had convinced us that we could easily do without the beauty of a face. Besides, it is obvious and indisputable that inconstancy in love exists only because of the diversity of faces. If faces were not seen, a man would always remain the constant lover of the first woman who had pleased him.''

Getting out of the bath, I handed her the towels, and when I was sufficiently dried I sat down and she put on my shirt, then, just as she was, dressed my hair. Meanwhile I put on my nether garments, and, after buckling my shoes, she dressed in a minute, the air having already dried her. As I left I gave her a petit écu and then six francs for herself; but she returns them with a scornful look and leaves. This gesture sent me back to my inn mortified, for she was not a girl to be slighted, and she thought I had slighted her.

After supper I could not refrain from telling my helpmate the whole story, to which she listened with great attention, adding her own commentary. She said she certainly was not pretty, for I could not have resisted the desires she would have inspired in me, and that she would very much like to see her. I offered to take her there, and she said she would enjoy it, but that she would have to dress as a man. So saying, she rises, and a quarter of an hour later I see her before me, wearing a well-fitting coat of Leduc's but without breeches, for she had not been able to put them on. I told her to take her choice among mine; and we put off the expedition until the next morning.

At six o'clock I saw her before me completely dressed and with a blue redingote which disguised her perfectly. I dressed quickly and, not bothering to eat breakfast, we went to La Matte. This is the name of the place. Animated by her pleasure in the outing, my good housekeeper was radiant. It was impossible that anyone should see her and not know that her clothing was not that of her sex, so she kept herself as closely wrapped in her redingote as she could.

We had scarcely got down the steps when the same man appears and asks us if we want a bath for four, and we enter the cabin. The girls appear, I show my helpmate the pretty one who had not seduced me, and she takes her; I take another, tall and well built and with a proud look, and we lock the door. I quickly let my girl put a cap over my hair, I undress and get into the bath, and my new attendant does likewise. My helpmate was taking her time; the newness of the thing astonished her, she seemed to regret having undertaken it, she laughed to see me there in the hands of the big Swiss girl, who was rubbing me all over, and she could not bring herself to take off her shift; but finally one shame prevailed over the other, and she got into the bath, as if only the force of circumstances had compelled her to show me all her beauties; but she had to let me wait on her, though without excusing the other girl from coming in and doing her duty.

The two girls, who had more than once taken part in similar diversions, prepared to entertain us with a spectacle which I knew very well but which was completely new to my helpmate. They began doing to each other the same thing they saw me doing with the widow Dubois. She watched them, in great astonishment at the fury with which the girl I had taken played the man's role to the other. I was somewhat surprised myself, despite the furies which M. M. and C. C. had displayed before my eyes six years earlier, and than which it was impossible to imagine anything finer. I should never have believed that anything could distract me when I was for the first time holding in my arms a woman I loved and who possessed to perfection everything which could engage my senses; but the strange combat in which the two young Maenads were embroiled occupied her too. She told me that the supposed girl I had taken was a boy despite her bosom, and that she had just seen it. I turn, and the girl herself, seeing my interest, displays a clitoris, but enormous and stiff. I tell my amazed helpmate what it is, she replies that it cannot possibly be that, I make her touch and examine it, and she has to give in. It looked like a thick, nailless finger, but it was flexible; the wench, who coveted my beautiful housekeeper, told her that it was stiff enough for her to put it into her if she would permit, but she refused, and it would not have amused me. We told her to continue her endeavors with her friend, and we laughed a great deal, for the congress of the two young girls, though comic, yet excited us to the height of voluptuousness. It was too much for my helpmate, she surrendered completely to nature, even anticipating me in all that I could desire. It was a celebration which continued for two hours and which sent us back to our inn thoroughly satisfied. I gave the girls, who had entertained us very well, two louis; but not with any intention of going back there. We had no need of that to go on exchanging proofs of our love. My helpmate became my mistress, and a perfect mistress she was, making me completely happy, even as I made her, during all the time I spent in Bern. Since I was already completely cured, no unfortunate consequences marred our mutual satisfaction. If pleasures are transitory, so too are pains, and when, in a season of enjoyment, we remember the pains which preceded it, we love them, et haec aliquando meminisse juvabit (''and one day it will be pleasant to remember even these things'').[3]

At ten o'clock the Avoyer of Thun was announced. Dressed in black and in the French fashion, grave, gentle, mannerly, and well on in years, he pleased me. He was one of the wise heads in the government. He insisted on reading me the letter Monsieur de Chavigny had written him; I said that if it had been unsealed I would not have delivered it. He invited me to dinner the next day in mixed company and to a stag supper on the day after. I left with him, and we went to the library,[4] where I met Monsieur Felix,[5] an unfrocked monk, who was rather facile than erudite, and a promising young scholar named Schmid,[6] already well known in the republic of letters. A man learned in natural history[7] who had the names of ten thousand different shells by heart bored me because I knew nothing of his science. Among other things he told me that the Aar, the famous river of the canton, had gold in its sands; I said that all large rivers had it, and he seemed not to agree with me.

I dined at Monsieur de Muralt's with the four or five Bernese women who enjoyed the highest reputation, and I thought they deserved it, especially a Madame de Sacconay,[8] who was most agreeable and very well educated. I would have paid court to her if I had stayed longer in the capital of Switzerland—if Switzerland could have a capital.

The Bernese ladies dress well, though not elaborately, since luxury is forbidden by law; their manner is easy, and they speak excellent French.[9] They enjoy the greatest freedom, and they do not abuse it, despite the gallantry which is the life of social occasions, for decency is everywhere observed. I noticed that husbands are not jealous there, but they insist that their wives shall always be at home by nine o'clock for family supper. During the three weeks[10] I spent in the city a woman eighty-five years of age interested me by her knowledge of chemistry. She had been the intimate friend of the famous Boerhaave.[11] She showed me a sheet of gold which he had made in her presence and which before being transmuted was copper. She assured me that he possessed the stone,[12] but she said it had the power to prolong life only a few years beyond a century. According to her, Boerhaave had not known how to use it. He had died of a cancer between the heart and the lungs before reaching the perfect maturity which Hippocrates[13] sets at the age of seventy. The four millions which he left his daughter showed that he possessed the art of making gold. She said he had given her a manuscript which contained the whole process, but that she found it obscure.

"Publish it."

"God forfend!"

"Then burn it."

"I haven't the heart."

About six o'clock Monsieur de Muralt came to take me to see some military maneuvers which the citizens of Bern, all of whom are soldiers, were performing outside the city. I asked him the meaning of a bear[14] at the gate, and he said that in German Bern meant "bear," and so it was the symbol of the canton, which was second[15] in rank though the largest if not the richest. It was a peninsula formed by the Aar, whose source was near that of the Rhine.[16] He talked to me about the power of his canton, its lordships and bailiwicks, and he explained what an Avoyer was; then he launched into political institutions, describing the different systems of government which made up the Helvetian body politic.

"I can well understand," I said, "that since the cantons number thirteen, each of them can have a different government."

"There is even a canton," he said, "which has four."[17]

But what I greatly enjoyed was the supper with fourteen or fifteen men, all of them senators. No high spirits, no frivolous talk, no literature; but civil law, the interests of the State, commerce, economy, speculation, love of country, and the duty to value liberty above life. But toward the end of supper all these rigid aristocrats began to expand, sollicitam explicuere frontem ("to smooth the care-wrinkled brow"),[18] an inevitable effect of drink. They pitied me. They praised sobriety, but they thought I carried mine too far. However, they did not force me to drink, as the Russians and the Swedes do, and often the Poles.

At midnight the gathering broke up. It was an unheard-of hour in Switzerland. They thanked me and sincerely asked me to count on their friendship. One of them who, before he had become tipsy, had condemned the Republic of Venice for banishing the Grisons[19] became sufficiently enlightened by wine to ask me to excuse him. He said that every government could not but understand its own interests better than all the foreigners who criticized what it did.

Entering my room, I found my helpmate in my bed; I was delighted. I gave her countless caresses which must have convinced her of my affection and my gratitude. Why should we restrain ourselves? We were bound to consider ourselves husband and wife, and I could not foresee that the day would come on which we would part. When people love each other, that seems impossible.

I received a letter from Madame d'Urfé, asking me to offer my services to Madame de la Saône,[20] the wife of a Lieutenant-General of her acquaintance, who had left for Bern in the hope of curing a skin disease which disfigured her. The lady had already arrived with strong recommendations to all the leading families in the city. She gave a supper every day, having an excellent cook, and invited only men. She had announced that she would return no one's visits. I went at once to make my bow to her; but what a sad sight!

I see a woman dressed with the utmost elegance, who, when I appear, rises from the sofa on which she was voluptuously seated and, after dropping me a pretty curtsy, resumes her place, asking me to sit down beside her. She sees my surprise and confusion; but, pretending to notice nothing, she treats me to the usual amiabilities. This is how she looked:

She was very well dressed, and her hands and her arms, which she displayed to just above the elbow, could not be more beautiful. Under a transparent fichu one saw a white, youthful bosom down to its rosy buds. Her face was frightful; it aroused pity only after it had inspired horror. It was a blackish crust, as dreadful as it was disgusting—a hundred thousand pimples making up a mask which extended from the top of her neck to the top of her forehead and from ear to ear. Her nose was invisible. In short, all that one saw of her face was two fine eyes and a lipless mouth which she kept half open to show two incomparable rows of teeth and to talk in a delightful style seasoned with witticisms and jests in the best taste. She could not laugh, for the pain caused by the contraction of the muscles would have made her cry; but she seemed content to see her listeners laugh.

Despite her pitiful condition her mind was vivacious and well furnished, her bearing and her manners those of the Parisian nobility. She was thirty[21] years of age, and she had left three young and very pretty children behind in Paris. Her house was in the Rue Neuve des Petits-Champs,[22] and her husband was a very handsome man; he adored her and had never left her bed. All the soldiers in the world could not have had his courage; but he must certainly have refrained from kissing her, for the mere thought of it made one shudder. An overflow of milk had reduced her to this appalling condition after her first childbed [23] ten years earlier. The Paris Faculty[24] had labored in vain to rid her face of the monstrous infection, and she had come to Bern to put herself in the hands of a famous doctor who had undertaken to cure her and whom she was not to pay until he had kept his promise. This is the language of all empirical physicians, and it has no meaning except what the guilelessness of the patient gives it. Sometimes they cure him; but even if they do not, they manage to make him pay by the simple process of proving to him that if he was not cured it was his own fault.

But at the height of my conversation with her, in comes the doctor. She had begun taking his remedy. It was drops he compounded from a preparation of mercury. She told him that the itching which tormented her and which forced her to scratch seemed to have grown worse; he said that she would not be rid of it until the end of the cure, which would take three months.

"As long as I scratch," she replied, "I shall be in the same state, and the cure will be endless."

He beat about the bush. I left, and she invited me to supper every day. I went that evening, and I saw her eat everything with appetite and drink good wine. The doctor had forbidden her nothing. I foresaw—and I was right—that she would never be cured. She was in high spirits, and her talk kept the whole company amused. I understood very well that one could become accustomed to seeing her and not feel repelled. When I told my helpmate the whole story she said that despite her ugliness the lady might make men fall in love with her by her character, and I could only admit it.

Three or four days after this supper a handsome youth of eighteen or twenty, in a bookseller's shop to which I had gone to read the gazette, politely told me that Madame de la Saône was sorry not to have had the pleasure of seeing me again since I had supped with her.

"So you know the lady?

"Did you not see me at supper there?"

"Yes, now I recall you."

"I keep her supplied with books, for I am a bookseller, I sup there every evening, and what is more I breakfast alone with her every morning before she gets out of bed."

"I congratulate you. I would wager that you are in love with her."

"You mean that for a jest. The lady is more worthy of love than you suppose."

"I am not jesting. I agree with you; even so, I would wager you would not be brave enough to enjoy her final favors if she offered them to you."

"You would lose."

"Very well, let us wager; but how will you convince me?"

"Let us wager a louis; but be discreet. Come to supper there this evening. I will tell you something."

"You shall see me there, and the wager stands."

When I told my helpmate of my wager she became very curious to know what the upshot would be and how the young man would go about convincing me, and she begged me to tell her after he had done so. I promised her I would.

That evening Madame de la Saône reproached me most politely, and I found her supper as pleasant as the one before. The young man was present; but since Madame never once addressed him no one paid any attention to him.

After supper he saw me to the "Falcon," and on the way he told me I had only to say the word and I could see him in amorous combat with the lady if I would go there at eight o'clock the next morning.

"Her chambermaid," he said, "will tell you that she is receiving no one; but she will not stop you from going into the anteroom when you say you will wait. The anteroom has a door, glazed to the top from half way up, through which one would see the lady in bed if a curtain over the glass on the inside did not prevent it. I will draw the curtain back, leaving a small space uncovered, so that you will see everything. When I have done my business I will leave; she will ring, and then you can have yourself announced. At noon, if you will allow me, I will come to the 'Falcon' with books for you, and if your conscience tells you that you have lost the wager, you shall pay me."

I said I would not fail to be there, and I ordered the books he was to bring me.

Curious to see a feat so extraordinary—though I did not consider it impossible—I go at the appointed hour, the lady is not receiving, but the chambermaid makes no objection to my waiting until she is up. I enter the anteroom, I see the small piece of uncurtained glass, I put my eye to it, and I see the indiscreet young man at the side of the bed, holding his conquest in his arms. A bonnet covered her head so that no part of her lamentable face could be seen.

As soon as the hero became aware that I was where I could see him he did not keep me waiting. He rose and exposed to my sight not only his beauty's treasures but his own. Short, but of gigantic proportions where the lady wanted it, he seemed to be displaying the fact to arouse my jealousy and humiliate me, and perhaps to conquer me too. As for his victim, he showed her to me in front view, back view, and every possible profile in five or six different postures, which he employed with herculean vigor in the act of love, the disfigured woman responding with all her strength. I saw a body than which Phidias[25] could not have carved one more beautiful and a whiteness more perfect than that of the finest marble from Paros.[26] I was so excited by them that I fled. I went to the "Falcon," where, if my helpmate had not hastened to give me the palliative which I needed, I should instantly have had to go to La Matte for it. After I told her the whole story she became even more curious to make the acquaintance of its hero.

He came at noon, bringing the books I had ordered, for which I paid him, giving him an extra louis, which he took with a laugh and a look which said that I should be very glad to have paid the wager. He was right. After looking at him with great attention, my helpmate asked him if he knew her, and he said no.

"I saw you as a child," she said; "you are the son of Monsieur Mingard,[27] the minister of the Gospel. You must have been about ten years old when I saw you in Lausanne."

"It is possible, Madame."

"So you did not want to become a minister?"

"No, Madame. I felt too strongly drawn to love to choose that profession."

"You were right, for ministers must be discreet, and discretion is a hindrance."

At this thrust, which my housekeeper launched at him in pure high spirits, the poor fool blushed, but we did not let him lose heart. I asked him to dine with us, and though he never mentioned Madame de la Saône, he told us not only many of his own successes in love but also all the amorous adventures which gossip ascribed to the ladies of Bern or slander invented for them.

After he left, my helpmate, who had come to the same conclusion as myself, said that a young man of his character was worth seeing only once. I saw to it that he did not call on us again. I was later told that Madame de la Saône sent him to Paris and made him rich. I shall say no more of him or of the lady, to whose house I did not go again, except once to bid her good-by when I left Bern.

I lived happily with my dear mistress, who kept telling me that she was happy. No fear, no concern for the future troubled her fair soul; she was sure, as I was, that we would never part, and she constantly told me that she would forgive me all my infidelities provided I never failed to confess them to her frankly. She had the character I needed in a woman to live at peace and content; but I was not born to enjoy so great a happiness.

After two or three weeks of our stay in Bern my helpmate received a letter from Soleure. It was from Lebel. Having seen her read it carefully, I asked her what news it contained. At that she tells me to read it, and sits down in front of me to see into my soul.

The major-domo, wasting no words, asked her if she would become his wife. He said that he had put off proposing it to her until he had set his affairs in order and made sure that he could marry her even if the Ambassador should refuse his permission. He said that he had enough to live well on in B. without having to remain in service, but that he would not have needed to take these precautions since he had just talked with the Ambassador and had received his full consent. So he asked her to answer him at once, telling him, first, if she accepted him and, second, if she would prefer going to live with him in B., where she would be absolute mistress in her own house, or would rather remain in Soleure at the Ambassador's as his wife, which could only increase their capital. He ended by saying that whatever she brought him would be hers, and that he would guarantee the whole of it to her, up to a hundred thousand francs. That would be the amount of her dowry. He did not say a word about me.

"It is for you, my dear, to do whatever you wish; but I cannot imagine your leaving me and not making me the unhappiest of men."

"And I shall be the unhappiest of women the instant I am not with you, for, provided you love me, I do not care at all if you make me your wife."

"Very good. So what will you answer him?"

"You shall see my letter tomorrow. I will tell him politely but frankly that I am in love with you and happy, and, since that is the case, I cannot possibly accept the excellent match which Fortune offers me in him. I will even say that if I were wise I see I could not refuse his hand, but that, being madly in love, I can only obey the God of Love."

"I think your letter is excellently put, for to refuse such an offer you can have no other valid reason than the one you give him; besides, it would be absurd to try to make anyone believe we are not in love with each other, for it is only too obviously true. Nevertheless, my angel, his letter saddens me."

"But why, my dear friend?"

"Because I haven't a hundred thousand francs ready to give you this instant."

"Oh, my friend! I care nothing for that. You are certainly not a man to become poor; but even if you did, I feel that you would make me happy by sharing your poverty with me."

At this point we exchanged the usual tokens of love which happy lovers give each other in such situations, but in the effusion of our feeling a tinge of sorrow darkened our souls. Languishing love seems to double in strength, but this is not true. Love is a little wanton which wants to be fed on smiles and play; a different diet sends it into a consumption.

The next day she wrote to Lebel as she had instantly decided to do upon receiving the too serious news; and at the same time I thought it my part to write Monsieur de Chavigny a letter into which love, sentiment, and philosophy entered in equal measure. I asked him to give me his best advice on the matter, not hiding it from him that I was in love but that, being at the same time a man of honor, I found it as painful to resolve to tear out my own heart as to raise an obstacle to the widow Dubois's permanent happiness.

My letter pleased her greatly, for she would be glad to know what the Ambassador thought about the matter. Having received letters of introduction for Lausanne—from Madame d'Urfé to the Marquis Gentil de Langallerie,[28] and from the Baron de Bavois,[29] then colonel and proprietor of the Bala Regiment, to his uncle and aunt—I decided to spend two weeks there. My helpmate was delighted at the prospect. When one loves, one believes that the object of one's love is worthy of it, and that everyone must be jealous of the happiness he sees in another.

A Monsieur de M. F.,[30] a member of the Council of Two Hundred,[31] whom I had met at one of Madame de la Saône's suppers, had become my friend. He having come to see me, I had introduced my helpmate to him, he treated her as if she were my wife, he had introduced his own wife to her on the promenade, and he had come to supper with us, bringing her and their elder daughter, whose name was Sara,[32] who was thirteen years old, dark and decidedly pretty, and who, having a very keen mind, made us laugh with guileless remarks of whose effect she was perfectly conscious. In short, her great art lay entirely in making people believe she was ingenuous, and her father and mother really believed she was.

Holograph of a Letter from Bernard de Muralt to Albrecht von Haller

The girl had announced that she was in love with my helpmate; she lavished all sorts of caresses on her; she often came to us in the morning asking for breakfast, and when she found us in bed she called my helpmate her wife, and made her laugh by putting her hand under the covers, tickling her, and saying, with kisses, that she was her little husband and she wanted to give her a child. My helpmate laughed.

One morning, joining in the laughter, I said that she made me jealous, that I thought she was really a little man, and that I wanted to see if I was wrong. So saying, I lay hold of her; and the sly minx, protesting that I was wrong but offering very little resistance, left my hand perfectly free to convince me that she was a little girl. I then let her go, aware that she had trapped me, for such an investigation on my part was exactly what she wanted, and my helpmate told me so; but as I did not care one way or the other I did not believe her.

The next time, coming in just as I was getting up, and still pretending to be in love with my helpmate, she said that, since I had assured myself she was not a man, I could not object to her lying down in my place. My helpmate, who was in the mood for a laugh, tells her it is an excellent idea, and little Sara, jumping for joy, takes off her dress, unlaces her petticoat, and springs on top of her. At this point the spectacle began to interest me. I went and locked the door. My helpmate letting her do as she wished, the little jade, who was stark naked and who had uncovered all the other's beauties, took so many positions to accomplish her purpose that I began to feel a desire to show her how the thing was done. She looked on with rapt attention until the end, evincing great surprise.

"Do it to her again," she said.

"I can't," I replied, "for, as you see, I am dead."

Pretending innocence, she undertakes to bring me back to life, and she succeeds; whereupon my helpmate told her that since the credit for having revived me was hers, it was for her to do what would make me die again. She said she was very willing, but that she didn't have room enough to lodge me, and, so saying, she took a position which showed me she was speaking the truth and that it would not be her fault if I could not do it to her.

Assuming in my turn the innocent and serious air of a man who is willing to grant a favor, I contented the minx, who showed no sign from which we could swear she had not done the thing before. No exhibition of pain, no blood to indicate a rupture; but I had sufficient reason to assure my helpmate that Sara had never known another man.

Her expressions of gratitude made us laugh, together with her adjurations to say nothing to Mamma or Papa, for they would scold her just as they had scolded her the year before when she had got her ears pierced without their permission.

Sara knew that we were not taken in by her feigned naïveté, but she pretended not to know it in order to gain her ends. Then who had taught her the art? No one. Natural intelligence, less rare in childhood than in youth, but always rare. Her mother said that her naïveté was the dawning of intelligence, but her father took it for stupidity. If she had been stupid, our laughter would have disconcerted her and she would not have gone on. I never saw her so happy as when her father deplored her stupidity; she pretended to be astonished, and, to repair one deliberate blunder, she came out with a worse one. She plied us in turn with questions to which, since we could not answer them, we were reduced to replying only with laughter, for they always arose from the most logical reasoning. Sara could have pursued the argument and proved to us that the stupidity was on our side, but that would have betrayed her duplicity.

Lebel did not answer the widow Dubois, but the Ambassador wrote me a four-page letter in which, like the wise man he was, he showed me that if I were as old as he, and also in a position to make my housekeeper happy after my death, I should never let her go, especially since she was of the same mind as I, but that being young, and not intending to marry her, I should not only consent to a marriage which would undoubtedly make her happy but do my best to persuade her to enter into it, and the more so because, with the experience I had, I must foresee that I would one day repent of having let the present opportunity escape, for, in his view, it was impossible that, with the lapse of time, my love would not become pure friendship; in which case he left me to see for myself that, when I should need new loves, the widow Dubois, as merely my friend, could not but restrict my freedom and hence condemn me to repentance, which always makes a man unhappy. As if for form's sake he said that when Lebel had told him of his plan, far from withholding his consent he had encouraged him, for my housekeeper, in the four or five times he had seen her, had completely gained his good will, hence he would be very glad to see her so well situated in his house, where, without in the least offending against propriety, he could enjoy the charms of her intelligence without having any designs on those others of which, at his age, he could not think. He ended his eloquent letter by saying that Lebel had not fallen in love with Madame Dubois like a young man but after due reflection and that hence he would not hurry her. She would learn this from the answer he was now writing her. A marriage should never be entered into except composedly.

My helpmate, after reading his letter attentively, handed it back to me with an air of indifference.

"So what do you think now, my dear?"

"That I should do as the Ambassador says. If he considers that we need be in no hurry, that is all we want. So let us think no more of it and love each other. His letter is wisdom itself; yet I must tell you I cannot imagine our becoming indifferent to each other, though I know it can happen.''

''Not indifferent, you are wrong there.''

''I mean good friends.''

''But friendship, my dear, is never indifferent. All that is true is that love may cease to play any part. We know that, because it has been so ever since the human race has existed. So the Ambassador is right. Repentance may come to torture our souls when we no longer love each other. So let us get married tomorrow, and thus punish the vices of human nature.''

''We will get married too, but by the same token let us not be in a hurry.''

My helpmate received Lebel's letter on the next day but one. She thought it as reasonable as the Ambassador's; but we had already decided to give the matter no more thought. We resolved to leave Bern for Lausanne, where the people to whom I had letters of introduction were expecting me, and which offered much more in the way of amusements than Bern.

In bed and in each other's arms, my helpmate and I made an arrangement which we agreed was very promising and very wise. Lausanne was a small city, where she was sure I would be made much of and where for at least two weeks I would have only time to pay calls and attend the dinners and suppers which would be given for me every day. All the nobility knew her, and the Duke of Roxburghe,[33] who had been in love with her, was still there. Her appearance with me would be the daily gossip of every gathering, which in the end would be extremely annoying to us both. In addition, there was her mother, who would certainly not find fault with her but who in her heart would not be too happy to see her serving as housekeeper to a man whose mistress common sense alone would show everyone she must be.

After all these reflections we decided that she would go to her mother's at Lausanne by herself, and that two or three days later I would go to stay there, also alone, for as long as I pleased, though of course I could see her every day at her mother's. As soon as I left Lausanne and arrived in Geneva she would join me, and from there we would travel together wherever I wished so long as we loved each other.

It was on the next day but one after we made this arrangement that she set out, in fairly good spirits, for, being sure of my constancy, she was congratulating herself on doing a very wise thing; but she left me sad. Farewell visits occupied me for two days; and since I wanted to make the acquaintance of the celebrated Haller[34] before I left Switzerland, Monsieur de Muralt, the Avoyer, gave me a letter for him, to my great satisfaction. He was Bailiff of Roche.[35]

When I went to take leave of Madame de la Saône I found her in bed and was obliged to spend a quarter of an hour alone with her. Talking, as was to be expected, of nothing but her ailment, she brought the conversation around to the point where morality and propriety allowed her to show me that the sacred fire[36] which disfigured her face respected her entire body. I was no longer in such admiration of Mingard's bravery, for she would have found me prepared to do as much to her. Nothing could possibly be prettier, and it was easy to look only there. Exhibiting herself so readily, the poor woman avenged herself for the wrong nature did her by making her face hideous, and at the same time her sense of politeness may have made her think it her duty thus to reward a man well-bred enough to summon the strength to converse with her. I am sure that if she had had a pretty face she would have been very chary of all the rest of herself.

On the last day I dined at M. F.'s, where the charming Sara took me to task for having sent my "wife" off ahead of me. We shall see how I met her again in London three years later.

Leduc was still taking the cure and very weak; but I insisted on his leaving with me, for I had a great deal of luggage and I could trust no one else.

It was thus that I departed from Bern, which left so happy an impression on my memory that I am cheered every time I recollect it.

Having to consult the physician Herrenschwandt[37] on behalf of Madame d'Urfé, I stopped at Murten where he lived. He kept me for dinner to convince me of the excellence of the fish from the lake there; but on returning to the inn[38] I decided to spend the night because of a curiosity which my reader will kindly forgive me.

Dr. Herrenschwandt, after accepting two bright louis for his consultation on the tapeworm, putting it in writing for me, invited me to take a walk with him along the highroad to Avenches[39] as far as a chapel filled with bones of the dead.

"The bones," he told me, "are those of a party of Burgundians whom the Swiss killed in the famous battle." [40]

I read the Latin inscription, I laugh, and then I tell him in all seriousness that since it contained an insulting jest it became farcical and that the gravity of an inscription did not permit a wise nation to set those who read it laughing. The Swiss doctor would not agree. Here is the inscription: Deo. Opt. Max. Caroli inclyti, et fortissimi Burgundiae ducis exercitus Muratum obsidens, ab Helvetiis caesus, hoc sui monumentum reliquit anno 1476 ("To All-Good and Omnipotent God. The army of the famous and most valiant Charles, Duke of Burgundy, which, besieging Murten, was massacred by the Swiss, left this monument to itself in the year 1476").[41]

My notion of Murten until that moment was exalted. Its fame for seven centuries, three great sieges[42] sustained and repulsed—I expected to see something, and I saw nothing.

"Murten, I take it," said I to the physician, "must have been razed, destroyed, for—"

"Not at all, it is just what it has always been."

The man who wishes to be well informed will be wise to read, and then to travel to correct what he has learned. To know wrongly is worse than to know nothing. Montaigne[43] says that one must know rightly. But now for my adventure at the inn.

A girl in the household who spoke Romansh[44] struck me as something very much out of the ordinary, she looked like the stocking-seller[45] I had had in Little Poland; she made a great impression on me. Her name was Raton. I offer her six francs for her favors; but she refuses, saying that she is a decent girl. I order horses put to my carriage. When she sees me ready to leave she says, in a manner at once smiling and shy, that she needs two louis, and that if I will give them to her and not leave until the next day she will come and spend the night in my bed.

"I will stay, but remember to be kind."

"You will be satisfied."

When everyone had gone to bed she came with a trace of perturbation which was just the thing to increase my ardor. Having a call of nature, I ask her where the place is, and she points it out to me at the edge of the lake. I take the candle, go there, and, doing my business, read the nonsense which one always sees in such places, to right and left. Here is what I read to my right: "August 10, 1760. A week ago Raton gave me a ropy clap which is killing me."

I do not suppose there are two Ratons; I thank God, I am tempted to believe in miracles. I return to my room in seeming good humor, and I find Raton already in bed. So much the better. Thanking her for having taken off her shift, which she had thrown between the bed and the wall, I pick it up, and she takes fright. She tells me it is soiled by something perfectly natural; but I see how the case really stands. I reproach her, she does not answer, she dresses, weeping, and makes off.

Thus did I escape. But for a call of nature and the scribbled "to whom it may concern," I should have been doomed, for I would never have thought of examining a girl whose complexion was all lilies and roses.

The next day I went to Roche, to make the acquaintance of the celebrated Haller.

CHAPTER IX

Monsieur Haller. My stay in Lausanne. Lord Roxburghe. Mademoiselle de Sacconay. Dissertation on beauty. A girl theologian.

I SAW a stout man six feet tall, with a fine face, who, after reading Monsieur de Muralt's letter, did me all the honors of his house and opened his precious store of knowledge in the sciences to me, answering my questions accurately and above all with a modesty which could not but strike me as exaggerated, for even as he taught me he did his best to seem a schoolboy; by the same token, when he asked me scientific questions I found in them all that I needed in order not to answer them wrongly. He was a great physiologist, a doctor, an anatomist who, like Morgagni,[1] whom he called his master, had made new discoveries in the microcosm. During the time I stayed in his house he showed me a great many letters from him and from Pontedera,[2] who was professor of botany in the same university, for Haller was also a very learned botanist. Hearing me speak of these great men, whose milk I had sucked,[3] he mildly complained of Pontedera, whose letters were almost indecipherable,[4] besides being composed in very obscure Latin. A member of the Berlin Academy wrote him that the King of Prussia, after reading his letter, had given up the idea of suppressing the Latin language entirely. "A sovereign," Haller wrote him in his letter, "who should succeed in proscribing the tongue of Cicero and Horace from the republic of letters would raise an imperishable monument to his own ignorance. If men of letters should have a common language in which to communicate their knowledge to one another, the most suitable of all the dead languages is certainly Latin, for the reigns of Greek and Arabic have ended."

Haller was a great Pindaric[5] poet and a competent statesman who deserved well of his country; he told me that the only way to give precepts was to prove their validity by example. Being a good citizen, he could not fail to be an excellent husband and father; and such I saw that he was. He had a wife whom he had married some time after losing his first[6] and whose beautiful countenance testified to her sound intelligence, and a pretty daughter[7] eighteen years of age, who scarcely spoke at table except sometimes in low tones to a young man who was seated beside her. After dinner, when I was alone with my host, I asked him who the young man was whom I had seen seated beside his daughter.

"He is her tutor."

"Such a tutor and such a pupil might well fall in love with each other."

"Yes, please God."

This Socratic answer showed me the stupid impertinence of my remark. I open an octavo volume of his works[8] and I read: Ultrum memoria post mortem dubito ("I doubt if memory subsists after death").

"Then you do not believe," I said, "that the memory is an essential part of the soul?"

The philosopher was forced to tergiversate, for he had reasons not to render his orthodoxy open to doubt. At table I asked him if Monsieur de Voltaire often came to visit him. He smiled and repeated these lines from the great poet of reason: Vetabo qui Cereris sacrum vulgarit arcanae sub iisdem sit trabibus ("I will deny my roof to him who has revealed the rites of mystic Ceres").[9] After this answer I did not again mention religion to him during the three days I spent in his house. When I told him that I was eagerly looking forward to making the acquaintance of the famous Voltaire he replied without a trace of bitterness that I was justified in wanting to make his acquaintance but that a number of people had found him, despite the law of physics, "greater at a distance than nearby." *

I found Monsieur Haller's table very well supplied, but himself very abstemious. He drank only water and at dessert a small glass of liqueur drowned in a large glass of water. He talked to me at length of Boerhaave, whose favorite pupil [11] he had been. He said that, after Hippocrates, Boerhaave had been the greatest of all physicians and a greater chemist than Hippocrates and than all those who had existed after him.

"Then why did he not reach a ripe age?"

"Because contra vim mortis nullum est medicamen in hortis ('against the power of death there is no medicine in herb gardens');[12] but if Boerhaave had not been a born doctor he would have died before the age of fourteen from a malignant ulcer which no doctor could cure. He cured it by rubbing himself with his own urine in which he dissolved common salt."

"Madame[13] told me that he had the philosopher's stone." [14]

"So it is said, but I do not believe it."

---

* De loin c'est quelque chose, et de près ce n'est rien (La Fontaine).[10] (C.'s note.)

"Do you think it is possible to make the stone?"

"I have been working for thirty years to show that it is impossible, and I cannot convince myself of it. One cannot be a good chemist and not admit that the Great Work is a possibility within the laws of physics."

When I took my leave he asked me to write him my opinion of the great Voltaire, and this was the beginning of our correspondence in French. I have twenty-two letters[15] from him, the last of them dated six months before he, too, died prematurely.[16] The older I grow, the more I regret my papers. They are the real treasure which attaches me to life and makes me hate death.

At Bern I had read J. J. Rousseau's Hêloïse,[17] and I wanted to hear what Monsieur Haller would say about it. He told me that the little he had read of the novel, to satisfy his friend, had been enough for him to judge the whole work.

"It is," he said, "the worst of all novels because it is the most eloquent. You will see the Pays de Vaud.[18] It is beautiful country, but do not expect to see the originals of the brilliant portrayals Rousseau paints for you. Rousseau believed that it is permissible to lie in a novel. Your Petrarch[19] did not lie. I have his Latin works, which no one reads any more because his Latinity is awkward, but their neglect is unjustified. Petrarch was a man of learning, and no impostor in his love of his noble Laura,[20] whom he loved just as any other man loves a woman with whom he is enamored. If Laura had not made Petrarch happy, he would not have sung her praises."

It was thus that Monsieur Haller talked to me of Petrarch, dismissing the subject of Rousseau, even whose eloquence he disliked because he made it brilliant only by the use of antithesis and paradox. The stout Swiss was a learned man of the highest order, but in the most unostentatious way possible, showing it neither in the bosom of his family nor when he was with people who can find entertainment without recourse to scientific discussions. He accommodated himself to whatever company he was in, he was pleasant, and he offended no one. But what did he have to make everyone like him? I do not know. It is easier to say what he did not have than what he had. He did not have any of the faults to which wits, as they are called, and men of learning are prone.

His virtues were austere, but he took care not to display their austerity. He certainly despised the ignorant who, instead of remaining within the limits which their intellectual poverty prescribes, rattle on about everything under the sun and even try to turn the laugh against those who know something; but his contempt for them was never shown. He knew too well that ignorance scorned turns to hatred; and he did not want to be hated. Monsieur Haller was a learned man who did not leave his intelligence to be guessed at, for he showed it, but who did not want to take advantage of the reputation he enjoyed; he spoke well, he said things worth hearing without preventing anyone in the company from doing likewise. He never talked of his works, and when someone mentioned them to him he changed the subject; and when he was of a different opinion he contradicted his opponent only with reluctance.

No sooner had I reached Lausanne than, thinking I could preserve my incognito, I naturally gave the preference to my heart. I went to see the widow Dubois, without having to ask anyone where she lived, so well had she described for me the streets through which I had to pass to reach her house. I found her with her mother; but my surprise was extreme when I saw Lebel. She did not leave me time to show it. After giving a cry she sprang into my arms, and her mother welcomed me as politeness prescribed. I asked Lebel how the Ambassador was and how long he had been in Lausanne.

Assuming a cordial tone, the worthy man replied that the Ambassador was very well and that he himself had arrived in Lausanne that morning on business and, coming to see Madame Dubois's mother after dining, he had been very much surprised to find her daughter here.

"You know," he said to me, "what my intentions are; I must leave tomorrow; and when you have made up your mind, if you will write to me I will come for her and take her to Soleure, where I will marry her."

To this no less clear than honorable avowal I replied that I would never oppose the will of my dear helpmate; and she on her side said that she would never make up her mind to leave me until I dismissed her. Finding our answers too vague, he frankly told me that he must have a definite and final answer, whereupon, intending to reject his proposal in its entirety, I said I would write to him fully in ten or twelve days. He left for Soleure the next morning.

After he was gone my dear one's mother, whose native shrewdness served her for intelligence, talked sense to us in the style our state of mind compelled her to use, for, in love as we were, we could not resolve to part. Meanwhile, I settled it with my helpmate that she would wait for me every day until midnight, and that we would come to a decision, as I had promised Lebel we would do. She had her own room and a very comfortable bed, and she gave me a good enough supper. In the morning we were very much in love and not at all inclined to think about Lebel's proposal. However, we had a little discussion.

My reader may remember that my helpmate had promised to forgive me all my infidelities on condition that I would confess them to her frankly. I had none to confess, but at supper I told her the story of Raton.

"We must both consider ourselves very fortunate," she said, "because if you hadn't by chance needed to go to the place where you found the salutary warning, you would have lost your health, and since the disease would not have declared itself at once, you would have infected me with it."

"It is possible, and I should be in despair."

"I know that; and all the sadder because I would not complain of it."

"I see only one way to avoid such a misfortune. When I have been unfaithful to you I will punish myself by abstaining from giving you proofs of my love."

"That would be to punish me. If you really loved me you would find a better remedy, I think."

"What remedy?"

"Not being unfaithful to me."

"You are right. Please forgive me, and I will use it in future."

"I think you will find it hard."

The author of such dialogues is Love; but Love gains nothing by composing them.

The next morning at my inn, when I had dressed and was preparing to take my letters to the persons to whom they were addressed, I saw the Baron de Bercher, uncle of my friend Bavois.[21]

"I know," he said, "that my nephew owes his good fortune to you, that he is esteemed, that he will be made a general at the next promotion, and my whole family will be most happy, as I am, to make your acquaintance. I come to offer you my services, and I invite you to dine at my house today and after that to come there when you have nothing better to do; but at the same time I beg you to say nothing to anyone about the reprehensible step he took in becoming a Catholic, for it is a thing which, in the view of this country, is dishonorable to him, and the dishonor is of a kind which reflects on all his relatives."

I promised never to mention this episode in his life when I talked of him, and to go and eat family dinner with him at once. All the persons to whom I had letters impressed me as respectable, well-bred, most polite, and very talented. I thought Madame Gentil de Langallerie the most attractive among the ladies; but I did not have time to pay more particular court to one than to another. Dinners, suppers, and balls every day, at all of which politeness demanded my attendance, were a restraint on me almost beyond endurance. I spent two weeks in that small city, where I was never free precisely because all its inhabitants make a great point of enjoying freedom. I could not go to spend the night with my helpmate except once; I could not wait to be off with her to Geneva, where everyone wanted to give me letters to Monsieur de Voltaire; who nevertheless, I was told, was detested there because of his caustic turn of mind.

"What, Mesdames! Is not Monsieur de Voltaire good-natured, amiable, cheerful, and affable with you, who were kind enough to act in his plays[22] with him?"

"No, Monsieur. When he had us rehearse our parts he scolded us; we never said anything as he wanted it, we did not pronounce one word correctly; he criticized our voices, our manner, and it was even worse when we performed the play. What an uproar over an added or omitted syllable which had ruined one of his lines! He terrified us. One of us had laughed in the wrong place; another, in Alzire,[23] had only pretended to cry."

"Did he want you to cry in good earnest?"

"In good earnest; he wanted us to shed real tears; he maintained that an actor could not make his audience cry unless he really cried himself."

"There I think he was right; but a sensible author knows better than to be so strict with amateurs. Such things can only be demanded of professional actors; but every author has the same failing. He never thinks the actor has given his words the force needed to convey their real meaning."

“One day, thoroughly sick of his outbursts, I said it was not my fault if his words did not have the force they ought to have.”

“I am certain he only laughed.”

“Laugh? Say sneer! He is insolent, cruel, and, in short, unbearable.”

“But you overlooked all his faults, I am sure.”

“Don't be too sure of that, for we drove him away.”

“Drove him away?”

“Precisely; he suddenly gave up the houses[24] he had rented and went to live where you will find him, and he never comes here any more, even when he is invited, for after all we admire his genius and we only made him angry in order to avenge ourselves and teach him to behave. Get him to talk about Lausanne, and you'll hear what he'll say about us, though laughingly, for that is his way.”

I several times encountered Lord Roxburghe,[25] who had vainly loved my helpmate. He was a handsome young man, whose equal for taciturnity I have never met. I was immediately told that he was witty, well educated, and did not suffer from melancholy; in society, at assemblies and balls and dinners, his manners consisted only in bows; when he was addressed he replied very laconically in good French, but with a shyness which showed that questions made him uncomfortable. Dining at his house, I asked him something concerning his country which required five or six sentences, and he answered very well, but blushing. The famous Fox,[26] who was also at the dinner and who was then twenty years of age, made him laugh, but speaking to him in English. I saw the Duke again at Turin eight months later, in love with Madame Martin,[27] the wife of a banker, who knew how to loosen his tongue.

In the same city[28] I saw a girl eleven or twelve years old [29] whose beauty struck me. She was the daughter of Madame de Sacconay, whose acquaintance I had made in Bern. I do not know what destiny had in store for the girl, who made the strongest impression on me to no purpose.

Nothing on earth has ever had such domination over me as a beautiful woman's face, even if she is only a child. Beauty, I have been told, has that power. I agree, for what attracts me certainly seems to me beautiful; but is it really beautiful? I must doubt it, because what seems to me beautiful does not always have the general consensus in its favor. Hence perfect beauty does not exist or does not have such power in itself. All those who have discussed beauty have tergiversated; they should have kept to the name the Greeks and Romans gave it: Form. Hence beauty is nothing but form par excellence. What is not beautiful does not possess a form; and this deformis was the opposite of pulchrum or formosum. We do well to seek the definition of things, but when we have it in their names why need we look for it elsewhere? If the word "form," forma, is Latin, let us look at its accepted meaning in Latin, not in French—which, however, often says déforme[30] instead of laid ("ugly"), apparently unaware that its opposite must be a word which indicates the existence of form, which can only be beauty. We should note that informe in French as well as Latin means "without shape." It is a body which has no definite appearance.

So what has always exercised an absolute sway over me is the living beauty of a woman, but that beauty as it exists in her face. That is where the spell resides, and this is so true that the Sphinxes we see at Rome and Versailles almost make us fall in love with their bodies though they are deformed in the fullest sense of the word. Looking at their faces, we come to consider their deformity beautiful. But what is this beauty? We simply do not know; and when we try to reduce it to laws, or to state those laws, we tergiversate like Socrates.[31] All that I know is that the surface which enchants me, which transports me, which makes me fall in love, is what is called beauty. It is an object of sight, for which I speak. If my sight could speak it would speak of beauty to better purpose than I.

No painter outdid Raphael in the beauty of the figures produced by his brush; but if someone had asked Raphael what that beauty was, whose laws he knew so well, he would have replied that he had no idea, that he knew it by heart and believed that he had produced it when he saw it before his eyes. "This figures pleases me," he must have said, "hence it is beautiful." He must have thanked God for having been born with an admirable sense of beauty. But omne pulchrum difficile ("whatever is beautiful is difficult"). The only admired painters were those who excelled in the beautiful; their number is small. If we are willing to dispense a painter from giving his works the quality of beauty any man can become a painter, for nothing is easier than to produce ugliness. The painter who is not ordained to be such by God himself cannot but produce it. We may note how rare it is to find a good painter among those who have devoted themselves to portrait painting. It is the most material branch of their art. They are of three kinds. There are those who make ugly likenesses; if you ask me, they should be paid with cudgels, for they are impertinent and they never admit that they have made the sitter uglier, or less beautiful. The second kind, who must be allowed a certain merit, are those whose likenesses are perfect and even astonishing, for the portrait seems to speak.

But few, indeed very few, are those who catch likenesses perfectly and at the same time add an imperceptible touch of beauty to the faces they have portrayed on their canvases. Painters of this kind deserve the fortunes they have made. Such was Nattier,[32] of Paris, whom I knew at the age of eighty[33] in the fiftieth year of this century. He painted the portrait of an ugly woman; she perfectly resembled the face Nattier had given her on his canvas, nevertheless in the portrait everyone thought her beautiful. Yet, examining the portrait, it was impossible to find anything changed. All that had been added or taken away was imperceptible.

"What is the source of this magic?" I asked Nattier one day when he had just painted the ugly Mesdames de France[34] and made them as beautiful as stars.

"It proves the divinity of beauty, which everyone adores, though no one knows in what it consists; and it also shows how imperceptible is the difference between the beauty and the ugliness of a countenance, which nevertheless seems so great to those who have no knowledge of our art."

The Greek painters were pleased to make Venus, the goddess of beauty, squint. The commentators may say what they like. The painters were wrong. Two squinting eyes can be beautiful; but if they squint I am sorry for it and I find them less beautiful.

On the ninth day of my stay in Lausanne I supped and spent the night with my helpmate, and in the morning, drinking coffee with her and her mother, I told her that it would soon be time to say good-by. Her mother said that, in all honesty, I ought to undeceive Lebel before I left, and she showed me a letter from the worthy man which she had received the day before. He asked her to urge it upon me that if I could not make up my mind to resign her daughter to him before I left Lausanne I would find it even harder to do so when I had gone elsewhere and she had perhaps given me a living pledge of her affection which would increase my attachment to its mother. He said that he certainly had no idea of going back on his word, but that he would consider himself all the happier if he could say he had received the woman he had married from the hands of her mother.

The good mother left us, weeping, and I remained with my dear mistress, discussing this most important matter. It was she who had the courage to tell me that I must instantly write Lebel either to stop thinking about her or to come and take her away at once.

"If I write him to stop thinking about you, I must marry you."

"No."

After uttering which "no," she left me alone. Only a quarter of an hour's thought was enough to make me write Lebel a short letter in which I told him that the widow Dubois, being her own mistress, had decided to give him her hand, and that I could only consent and congratulate him on his good fortune. In consequence I asked him to set out from Soleure at once in order to receive her from her mother's hands in my presence.

I then went to her mother's room, handing the letter to her daughter and saying that if she approved of it she had only to add her signature to mine. After reading and rereading it, her mother weeping all the while, she fixed her beautiful eyes on my face for a moment, then signed. At that I told the mother to find a trustworthy man to take the letter to Soleure at once. The man came and at once set off with my letter.

"We shall see each other again," I said to my helpmate, embracing her, "as soon as Lebel arrives."

I returned to my inn and, to wrestle with my grief, I shut myself in my room, giving orders to say that I was indisposed.

Toward evening four days later Lebel appeared before me and, after embracing me, left, saying that he would wait for me at his fiancée's. I begged him to excuse me, saying that I would dine with him at her house the next day. I made all my arrangements for leaving after dinner, and the next morning said good-by to everyone. Toward noon Lebel came for me.

Our dinner was not melancholy, but neither was it cheerful. When I was about to leave I asked my ex-helpmate to give me back the ring I had let her have in exchange for a hundred louis, as we had agreed; and she took them very sadly.

"I wouldn't have given it back," she said, "for I am not in need of money."

"In that case," I said, "I give it back to you, but promise me you will never sell it, and keep the hundred louis as well, an inadequate recompense for the services you have rendered me."

She gave me the gold wedding ring from her first marriage, and she left me, unable to hold back her tears. After wiping mine away:

"You are," I said to Lebel, "about to take possession of a treasure which I cannot commend to you too highly. It will not be long before you know all its value. She will love you alone; she will take care of your household; she will never have a secret from you; she will amuse you with her wit and easily drive away the slightest shadow of ill humor which may visit you."

When I went to her mother's room with him to take a final leave, she asked me to put off my departure until I had supped with her once again, and I replied that, the horses being harnessed and at my door, the delay would cause talk; but I promised to wait for her, with her husband and her mother, at an inn which was two leagues[35] away on the road to Geneva, where we could stay as long as we pleased, and Lebel was delighted with the little excursion.

Everything being ready when I got back to the inn, I set out at once and stopped at the appointed place, where I immediately ordered supper for four. I saw them arrive an hour later. The unconstrained and happy air of the new bride surprised me, and especially the composure with which she came and embraced me. She made me feel awkward, she had better sense than I had. However, I had the strength to fall in with her frame of mind; it seemed impossible that she had loved me and that she could thus change in one jump from love to pure friendship; nevertheless I make up my mind to imitate her and I do not refuse to exchange the outward marks which are permitted to friendship and which are supposed not to arouse sensations which go beyond its limits.

During supper I thought I saw that Lebel was more delighted by his luck in obtaining such a woman than by the right he had acquired to possess her in order to satisfy a strong passion he had conceived for her beforehand. I could not be jealous of a man whose sentiments were such. I also saw that my helpmate's high spirits came only from her wish to communicate them to me and thus make her future husband certain that she would not fail him in anything. She must also have felt very well satisfied to have attained a regular and stable position in life, safe from the whims of Fortune.

These reflections at the end of supper, which lasted two hours, put me in the same frame of mind as my late helpmate. I was content to regard her as a treasure which had belonged to me and which, after making me happy, was going to make another man so with my full consent. I felt that I was giving my helpmate the reward she deserved, as a generous Mussulman gives freedom to a cherished slave in recompense for loyalty. I looked at her, I laughed at her jokes, and the memory of the pleasures I had enjoyed in her company stood me in stead of their present reality, without any bitterness and without any regret that I had deprived myself of the right to renew them. I even thought I felt sorry when, looking at Lebel, he did not seem to me a man to replace me. She, divining my thought, told me with her eyes that she did not care.

After supper, Lebel having said that they must really go back to Lausanne so that he could be at Soleure on the next day but one, I embraced him, asking him to remain my friend until death. While he was preparing to enter the carriage with her mother, my helpmate, going down the stairs with me, told me with her usual frankness that she would not be happy until the wound was entirely healed.

"Lebel," she said, "can gain no more than my esteem and my friendship, but that will not prevent me from being his alone. Be certain that I have loved no one but you, and that you are the only man who has taught me the power of the senses and the impossibility of resisting it when nothing stands in its way. When we meet again, as you lead me to hope, we shall be ready to be perfect friends and very glad that we decided on the step we have just taken; and as for you, I am sure that in a short time a new object, whether more or less worthy to fill my place, will end your grief. I do not know if I am pregnant, but if I am you will be satisfied with the care I will give your child, whom you shall take from my custody when you please. Yesterday we made an arrangement in that respect which will leave us in no doubt when I am brought to bed. We agreed that we will marry as soon as we reach Soleure; but we will not consummate the marriage until two months from then; thus we will be sure that my child is yours if I bear it before April; and we will gladly let the world believe that it is the legitimate fruit of our marriage. It is he who conceived this wise plan, which will bring peace to our house and free my husband's mind from the least doubt in the more than perplexed question of the power of the blood, in which he believes no more than I do; but my husband will love our child as if he were its father, and if you write to me I will answer, sending you news of my pregnancy and our household. If I have the happiness to give you a child, whether a girl or a boy, it will be a memento which I will cherish far more dearly than your ring. But we are in tears, and Lebel is looking at us and laughing."

I could only answer by clasping her in my arms, and I consigned her to her husband's in the carriage, he saying that our long conversation had given him the greatest pleasure. They set off, and the chambermaids, thoroughly tired of standing there with candles in their hands, were very glad of it. I went off to bed.

The next morning when I got up, a pastor of the Geneva church having asked me if I would be so good as to give him a seat in my carriage, I granted his request. We had only ten leagues to travel, but since I wanted to eat something at noon I let him make the arrangements.

A man of eloquence and a professional theologian, he kept me amused all the way to Geneva by the ease with which he answered every question, even the thorniest, which I could put to him on the subject of religion. There were no mysteries for him, everything was reason; I never encountered a priest to whom Christianity came as easily as it did to this worthy man, whose life, as I learned at Geneva, was of the purest; but I came to the conclusion that his way of being a Christian was not peculiar to him, his doctrine being that of his entire church. When I undertook to convince him that he was a Calvinist only in name since he did not believe that Jesus Christ was of the same substance as God the Father, he replied that Calvin[36] had never claimed to be infallible, like our Pope; I said that neither did we believe the Pope infallible except when he laid down the law ex cathedra, and, quoting the Gospels, I struck him dumb. I made him blush when I reproached him with Calvin's having believed that the Pope was the Antichrist of the Apocalypse. He replied that the error could not be eradicated in Geneva unless the government ordered the effacement of an inscription on the church, which everyone read and in which the head of the Roman Church was so designated.[37] He said that the populace was ignorant and stupid everywhere, but that he had a niece who, at the age of twenty, did not think like the populace.

"I hope," he said, "to make you acquainted with her. She is a theologian and pretty."

"I shall see her with pleasure, Monsieur, but God keep me from arguing with her."

"She will force you to argue, and you will be very glad of it, I promise you."

I asked him for his address, but instead of giving it to me he said he would come to my inn himself to take me to his house. I put up at the "Scales," [38] and was very well lodged. It was August 20, 1760.[39]

Going to the window, I happen to look at the panes and I see, written with the point of a diamond: "You will forget Henriette too." Instantly remembering the moment when she had written the words for me thirteen years[40] earlier, I felt my hair stand on end. We had stayed in that very room when she parted from me to return to France. I flung myself into a chair to indulge in all my reflections. Ah, my dear Henriette! Noble and fond Henriette whom I had so greatly loved, where are you? I had never heard or asked news of her from anyone. Comparing myself with myself, I decided that I was less worthy to possess her than I had been then. I could still love, but I found in myself neither the delicacy which was then mine, nor the exalted feelings which justify the errors of the senses, nor considerateness, nor a certain probity; and, what horrified me, I did not have the same vigor. Yet it seemed that the mere memory of Henriette restored it to me completely. Abandoned by my helpmate, as I had just been, I felt a rush of such strong enthusiasm that I would have gone to see her[41] on the instant if I had known where to find her, though her prohibitions were still in my memory.

Early the next morning I went to the banker Tronchin, who had all my money. After showing me my account he gave me, at my request, a letter of credit on Marseilles, Genoa, Florence, and Rome. In cash I took only twelve thousand francs. I had fifty thousand French écus[42] at my disposal. After taking my letters to their addresses I returned to the "Scales," impatient to see Monsieur de Voltaire.

I found the pastor in my room. He invited me to dinner, saying that I would find Monsieur Villars Chandieu[43] there, who after dinner would take me to Monsieur de Voltaire's, where I had been expected for several days. So after making a brief toilet I went to the pastor's house, where I found the whole company interesting, but especially his young niece,[44] the theologian, whom her uncle did not bring into the conversation until dessert:

"How did you entertain yourself this morning, my dear niece?"

"I read St. Augustine, but finding that I disagreed with him in the sixteenth section I dropped him; and I believe I have refuted him in a few words."

"On what point?"

"He says that the Virgin Mary conceived Jesus through the ears.[45] This is absurd for three reasons. First, because God, not being matter, did not need an opening to enter the body of the Virgin. Second, because the aural passages have no connection with the womb. Third, because, having conceived through the ears, she ought also to have given birth through the same channel; and in that case you," she said, looking at me, "would be right to believe her a virgin during and after her childbearing."

The surprise of all the guests was equal to mine, but we had to forbear. The divine spirit of theology can rise above any carnal sensation, at least it must be credited with possessing that great privilege. The erudite niece did not think she was abusing it, and in any case she was sure of forgiveness. It was to me that she turned for an answer.

"I should be of your opinion, Mademoiselle, if I were a theologian and, as such, allowed myself to examine miracles in the light of reason; but since I am not, allow me, at the same time that I admire you, to condemn St. Augustine for having tried to analyze the power of the Annunciation. What seems to me certain is that if the Virgin had been deaf the incarnation could not have taken place. It is also true anatomically that since the three pairs of nerves which actuate the sense of hearing do not send any branch to the womb it is impossible to conceive how the thing can have been accomplished; but it is a miracle."

She answered me very charmingly that it was I who had spoken like a great theologian, and her uncle thanked me for having given his niece a good lesson. The company made her talk on various subjects, but she did not shine. Her forte was the New Testament. I shall have occasion to speak of her when I go back to Geneva.

We went to Monsieur de Voltaire's, who was just getting up from table. He was surrounded by gentlemen and ladies, so my presentation became a solemn occasion. This solemnity was very far from predisposing Voltaire and the company in my favor.

CHAPTER X

Monsieur de Voltaire; my discussions with the great man. A scene at his house in connection with Ariosto. The Duke of Villars. The Syndic and his three beautiful girls. Argument at Voltaire's. Aix-en-Savoie. The Marquis Desarmoises.

"THIS," I said to him, "is the happiest moment of my life. At last I see my master; it is twenty years, Monsieur, since I became your pupil."

"Honor me with another twenty, and then promise to bring me my wages."

"I promise; but, on your side, promise to wait for me."

"I give you my word for it, and only death—not I—will break my word."

A general laugh greeted this first Voltairean sally. It was in the nature of things. The function of such laughter is to encourage one disputant, always at the expense of the other; and he to whom the laughers give their suffrage is always sure to win; they constitute a claque which operates in good society too. I expected as much, but I hoped that my turn would come to let fly at him.

Two newly arrived Englishmen are introduced. He rises, saying:

"These gentlemen are English. I wish I were."

A poor compliment, for it forced them to answer that they wished they were French, and perhaps they did not want to lie, or they should be ashamed to tell the truth. A man of honor, I think, has the right to put his own country above all others.

No sooner has he sat down again than he returns to me, saying politely, but still with a laugh, that as a Venetian I must certainly know Count Algarotti.[1]

"I know him, but not by virtue of being a Venetian, for seven eighths of my dear fellow countrymen are unaware that he exists."

"I should have said 'as a man of letters.' "

"I know him from having spent two months with him at Padua[2] seven years ago; and I admired him principally because I discovered that he admired you."

"We are good friends; but to deserve the esteem of all who know him he does not need to admire anyone."

"If he had not begun by admiring, he would not have achieved fame. Admiring Newton, he succeeded in making it possible for ladies[3] to talk about light."

"Did he really succeed?"

"Not as well as Monsieur de Fontenelle in his Pluralité des mondes;[4] but he can be said to have succeeded."

"That is true. If you see him in Bologna, be so good as to tell him that I am awaiting his letters on Russia.[5] He can send them to me in care of the banker Bianchi in Milan. I am told that Italians do not like his Italian."

"I can well believe it: his style, in all his Italian writings, is his alone; it is infected with gallicisms; we think it pitiful."

"But do not French turns of expression make your language more beautiful?"

"They make it intolerable, just as a French stuffed with Italian expressions would be, even if it were written by you."

"You are right, one must write purely. Livy has been taken to task; his Latin has been said to be tainted with Patavinity." [6]

"The Abate Lazzarini[7] told me, when I was beginning to write, that he preferred Livy to Sallust." [8]

"The Abate Lazzarini, author of the tragedy Ulisse il giovane? [9] You must have been very young, and I wish I had known him; but I knew the Abate Conti,[10] who had been Newton's friend and whose four tragedies cover the whole of Roman history."

"I, too, knew and admired him. When I was with those great men, I congratulated myself on being young; to-day, here with you, I feel as if I dated from day before yesterday, but it does not humiliate me; I wish I were the youngest member of the human family."

"You would be better off than if you were the oldest. May I ask to what branch of literature you have devoted yourself?"

"To none; but perhaps the time will come. In the meanwhile I read as much as I can, and I indulge myself in studying humanity by traveling."

"That is the way to know it, but the book is too big. The easier method is to read history."

"History lies; one is not certain of the facts; it is boring; and studying the world on the run amuses me. Horace, whom I know by heart, is my guidebook, and I find him everywhere."

"Algarotti knows all of him by heart too. You are certainly fond of poetry?"

"It is my passion."

"Have you written many sonnets?"

"Ten or twelve which I like, and two or three thousand which I may not even have reread."

"The Italians are mad about sonnets."

"Yes—provided one can call it madness to wish to bestow on a given thought a harmonious measure capable of putting it in the best light. The sonnet is difficult, Monsieur de Voltaire, for we may neither extend the thought for the sake of the fourteen lines nor shorten it."

"It is the bed of the tyrant Procrustes.[11] That is why you have so few good ones. We have not one,[12] but that is the fault of our language."

"And of the French genius, too, I believe, which supposes that expanding a thought makes it lose all its brilliance and force."

"And you are not of that opinion?"

"I beg your pardon, it is a matter of the nature of the thought. A witticism, for example, is not enough for a sonnet."

"Which Italian poet do you love best?"

"Ariosto; and I cannot say that I love him better than the rest, for he is the only one I love. Yet I have read them all. When, fifteen years ago, I read your strictures on him,[13] I at once said that you would retract when you had read him."

"I am grateful to you for thinking I had not read him. I had read him; but, being young, having an inadequate knowledge of your language, and being prejudiced by the Italian writers who worship your Tasso, I unfortunately published an opinion which I sincerely thought was my own. It was not. I worship your Ariosto."

"I breathe again. So have an excommunication pronounced on the book in which you ridiculed him."

"All my books are excommunicated already; but I will now give you good proof of my retraction."

It was then that Voltaire astonished me. He recited by heart the two great passages in the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth cantos of the divine poet in which he tells of Astolpho's conversation with St. John the Apostle,[14] never skipping a line, never pronouncing a word except in accordance with strict prosody; he pointed out their beauties to me, with reflections which only a truly great man could make. One could have expected nothing more from the greatest of all the Italian commentators. I listened to him without breathing, without once blinking my eyes, hoping in vain to catch him in a mistake; turning to the company, I said that I was overwhelmed with astonishment, and that I would inform all Italy of my wonder and the reason for it.

"All Europe," he replied, "shall be informed by me of the most humble amends which I owe to the greatest genius she has produced."

Insatiable for praise, the next day he gave me his translation of Ariosto's stanza: Quindi avvien che tra principi e signori.[15] Here it is:

> Les papes, les césars apaisant leur querelle
> Jurent sur l'Évangile une paix éternelle;
> Vous les voyez demain l'un de l'autre ennemis;
> C'était pour se tromper qu'ils s'étaient réunis:
> Nul serment n'est gardé, nul accord n'est sincère;
> Quand la bouche a parlé, le coeur dit le contraire.
> Du ciel qu'ils attestaient ils bravaient le courroux,
> L'intérêt est le dieu qui les gouverne tous.
>
> ("Popes and monarchs, ending their division, swear eternal peace on the Gospels; tomorrow you see them enemies; it was to deceive each other that they had assembled: no oath is kept, no agreement is sincere; when the mouth has spoken, the heart says the opposite. They dared the wrath of the heaven which they called to witness; interest is the god which governs them all.")

At the end of Monsieur de Voltaire's recitation, which brought him the applause of all present, though not one of them understood Italian, Madame Denis,[16] his niece, asked me if the famous passage her uncle had declaimed was one of the finest in the great poet.

"Yes, Madame, but not the very finest."

"Then judgment has been handed down as to the very finest?"

"Certainly—otherwise Signor Lodovico would not have received his apotheosis."

"I did not know he had been beatified."

At that all the laughers, with Voltaire at their head, were on Madame Denis's side—I alone excepted, who remained perfectly serious. Voltaire, nettled by my gravity:

"I know," he said, "why you do not laugh. You claim that it is by virtue of a superhuman passage that he was called 'divine.'"

"Precisely."

"What passage is it?"

"The last thirty-six stanzas of the twenty-third canto, which give a technical description of the way Orlando went mad. Since the beginning of the world no one has known how a person goes mad except Ariosto, who was able to write it, and who toward the end of his life went mad too.[17] Those stanzas, I am certain, have made you shudder; they inspire horror."

"I remember them; they make love terrible. I cannot wait to read them again."

"Perhaps Monsieur will be so kind as to recite them to us," said Madame Denis, with a sly glance at her uncle.

"Why not, Madame, if you will have the goodness to listen."

"Then you have taken the trouble to learn them by heart?"

"As I have read Ariosto through two or three times a year ever since I was fifteen years old, he has fixed himself in my memory from beginning to end with no effort on my part and, as it were, despite me, except for his genealogies and his historical passages, which tire the mind without touching the heart. Only Horace has remained imprinted entire in my soul, despite the often too prosaic verses in his Epistles."

"We can allow you Horace," added Voltaire; "but Ariosto is a great deal, for it is a matter of forty-six long cantos."

"Say fifty-one." [18]

Voltaire remained silent.

"Come, come," said Madame Denis, "let us have the thirty-six stanzas which make one shudder and which earned their author the appellation of 'divine.' "

I thereupon recited them, but not in the style of declamation which we use in Italy. To please, Ariosto has no need to be thrown into relief by a monotonous singsong on the part of the person who delivers him. The French are right in finding this singsong intolerable. I recited them as if they were prose, animating them by voice, eyes, and the varying intonation necessary to express feeling. My audience saw and felt feeling expressed. They saw and felt the effort I made to hold back my tears, and they wept; but when I came to the stanza:

> Poichè allargare il freno al dolor puote
> Che resta solo senza altrui rispetto
> Giù dagli occhi rigando per le gote
> Sparge un fiume di lacrime sul petto
>
> ("Because he who is alone, with no one to consider, may give the reins to his grief, from his eyes he pours a stream of tears which flow down his cheeks to his breast"),[19]

my tears burst from my eyes so impetuously and abundantly that everyone present shed tears too, Madame Denis shuddered, and Voltaire ran to embrace me; but he could not interrupt me, for Orlando, to go completely mad, had to discover that he was in the same bed as that in which Angelica had lately lain in the arms of the too fortunate Medoro,[20] which happened in the following stanza. My plaintive and mournful tone gave place to the tone of terror inspired by the madness whose prodigious force drove him to ravages such as only an earthquake or lightning could cause. At the end of my recitation I somberly received the congratulations of the entire company. Voltaire exclaimed:

"It is what I have always said: to draw tears, one must weep oneself; but to weep, one must feel, and then the tears come from the soul."

He embraced me, he thanked me, and he promised to recite the same stanzas to me the next day and to weep as I had done. He kept his word.

Pursuing the subject of Ariosto, Madame Denis said it was astonishing that Rome had not put him on the Index. Voltaire replied that, on the contrary, Leo X[21] had issued a bull excommunicating all who dared to condemn him. The two great families of Este and Medici[22] found it to their interest to support him:

"But for that," he added, "the one line on Constantine's donation of Rome[23] to Sylvester,[24] which says that it puzza forte ('stinks strongly'),[25] would have been enough to bring an interdict on the poem."

I said that, begging his pardon, the line which had caused even more of an outcry was the one in which Ariosto throws doubt on the resurrection of the whole human race at the end of the world.

"Speaking of the hermit who tried to prevent Rodomonte from capturing Isabella, Zerbino's[26] widow," I said, "Ariosto describes the African as tiring of his preaching, seizing him, and throwing him so far that he breaks him to pieces against a rock, where he is instantly killed and remains in a sleep such

Che al novissimo dí forse fia desto.

('That he perhaps may wake on the last day.')

"That forse ('perhaps'), which the poet inserted only as a rhetorical ornament, caused an outcry which would have made the poet laugh heartily."

"It is a pity," said Madame Denis, "that Ariosto did not abstain from his hyperboles."

"Be quiet, my niece; they are all deliberate and all of the greatest beauty."

We talked on other subjects, all of them literary, and the conversation finally turned to L'Écossaise, which had been acted at Soleure. The whole story was known. Voltaire told me that if I would act in his house he would write Monsieur de Chavigny to persuade Madame . . . to come and act Lindane and that he would take the part of Monrose. I declined, telling him that Madame . . . was at Basel and that in any case I had to leave the following day. At that he protested vehemently, roused the whole company against me, and maintained that my visit became an insult if I did not stay for at least a week. I replied that, having come to Geneva only for him, I had nothing else to do there.

"Did you come here to talk to me or to hear me talk?"

"Principally to hear you talk."

"Then stay here three days at least, come to dine with me every day, and we will talk."

I said I would do so, and then took my leave to go to my inn, for I had a great deal of writing to do.

A Syndic[27] of the city, whom I will not name and who had spent the day at Voltaire's, came a quarter of an hour later, asking me to let him sup with me.

"I was present," he said, "at your argument with the great man, though I said nothing. I hope I may have you to myself for an hour."

I embraced him and, asking him to excuse me for receiving him in my nightcap, said that he could spend the whole night with me if he wished.

The amiable man spent two hours with me, never speaking of literature, but he had no need of that to please me. He was a great disciple of Epicurus and Socrates; capping anecdotes, outdoing each other in laughter, and talk about every kind of pleasure to be procured in Geneva kept us occupied until midnight. When he left, he invited me to sup with him the following evening, assuring me that our supper would be amusing. I promised to wait for him at my inn. He asked me not to mention our engagement to anyone.

The next morning young Fox came to my room with the two Englishmen whom I had seen at Monsieur de Voltaire's. They proposed a game of quinze[28] with stakes of two louis, and, having lost fifty louis in less than an hour, I stopped. We made a tour of Geneva and at dinnertime went to "Les Délices."[29] The Duke of Villars[30] had just arrived there to consult Tronchin,[31] who had kept him alive by his art for ten years.

During dinner I said nothing; but afterward Voltaire made me talk about the Venetian government, knowing that I must bear it a grudge. I disappointed his expectation; I attempted to prove that there is no country on earth in which one can enjoy greater freedom. Seeing that the subject was not to my liking, he took me out to his garden, which he told me he had created. The principal walk ended at a stream; he said it was the Rhone, which he was sending to France. He made me admire the fine view of Geneva and the Dent Blanche,[32] which is the highest of the Alps.

Deliberately turning the conversation to Italian literature, he began talking away on the subject with great wit and erudition, but always ending with an erroneous judgment. I did not contradict him. He spoke of Homer, Dante, and Petrarch, and everyone knows what he thought of those great geniuses. His inability to refrain from writing what he thought harmed him. I only said that if these authors had not deserved the esteem of all who studied them they would not have been given the high place they held.

The Duke of Villars and the famous physician Tronchin joined us. Tronchin—tall, well built, handsome, polished, eloquent though not talkative, a learned natural scientist, a wit, a physician, favorite pupil [33] of Boerhaave, and without either the jargon or the charlatanism of the pillars of the Faculty—captivated me. His principal medicine was only diet; but to prescribe it he had to be a great philosopher. It was he who cured a consumptive of venereal disease by the mercury which he gave him in the milk of a she-ass which he had subjected to thirty rubbings by the strong arms of three or four porters. I write this because I have been told it, but I find it hard to believe.

The person of the Duke of Villars caught all my attention. Examining his bearing and his face, I thought I saw a woman of seventy[34] dressed as a man, thin, emaciated, weak, but who in her youth might have been beautiful. His blotched cheeks were covered with rouge, his lips with carmine, his eyebrows were blackened, his teeth were false, as was the hair which was glued to his head by quantities of pomade scented with ambergris, and in his top buttonhole was a large bouquet which came up to his chin. He affected grace in his gestures, and he spoke in a soft voice which made it difficult to understand what he said. Withal he was very polite, affable, and mannered in the style of the Regency.[35] I have been told that when he was young he loved women, but that in his old age he assumed the modest role of wife to three or four handsome minions, each of whom in turn enjoyed the honor of sleeping with him. The Duke was the Governor of Provence. His whole back was gangrened, and according to the laws of nature he should have died ten years earlier; but Tronchin kept him alive by diet, feeding the sores, which if they had not been fed would have died and taken the Duke with them. This is truly to live by art.

I went with Voltaire to his bedroom, where he changed his wig and the bonnet he wore over it to keep from catching cold. On a large table I saw the Summa[36] of St. Thomas and some Italian poets, among them the Secchia rapita of Tassoni.[37]

"It is," he said, "the only tragicomic poem which Italy possesses. Tassoni was a monk, a wit, and a learned genius as a poet."

"The rest perhaps—but not learned, for, ridiculing the Copernican system, he says that, following it, one could not arrive at the theory either of lunations or of eclipses."

"Where does he say anything so stupid?"

"In his discorsi academici."[38]

"I haven't them, but I will get them."

He wrote down the title.

"But Tassoni," he went on, "criticized your Petrarch[39] very well."

"And thereby disgraced his taste and his reading, as did Muratori."[40]

"Here he is. Admit that his erudition is immense."

"Est ubi peccat" ("He is sometimes wrong").[41]

He opened a door, and I saw an archive of nearly a hundred bulky packages.

"That," he said, "is my correspondence. You see nearly fifty thousand [42] letters, which I have answered."

"Have you copies of your answers?"

"Of most of them. It is the duty of a valet whom I keep for no other purpose."

"I know printers who would give a great deal of money to possess themselves of this treasure."

"Beware of printers when you are ready to give something to the public, if you have not already begun."

"I will begin when I am old."

And in this connection I quoted a macaronic verse of Merlin Cocai.[43]

"What is that?"

"It is a verse from a famous poem[44] in twenty-four cantos."

"Famous?"

"And what is more, worthy to be; but to appreciate it one must know the Mantuan dialect."

"I shall understand it. Have it sent me."

"I will present it to you tomorrow."

"I shall be obliged to you."

We were fetched from there, and we spent two hours in conversation with the company, in which the great, brilliant poet kept everyone amused, always applauded though satirical and often caustic, but always laughing and never failing to raise a laugh. He maintained a princely establishment, and only at his house did one find choice fare. He was then sixty-six years of age and had an income of a hundred and twenty thousand livres. They who said and say that he became rich only by cheating the booksellers are mistaken. On the contrary, the booksellers cheated him badly, except the Cramers,[45] whose fortune he made. He gave them all his works for nothing, and thus it was that they circulated so widely. At the time I was there he gave them La Princesse de Babylone,[46] a charming tale which he wrote in three days.

My Epicurean Syndic came to the "Scales" for me as he had promised. He took me to a house on the right-hand side of the next street, which runs uphill. He presented me to three young ladies,[47] two of them sisters, and all made for love though one could not call them beautiful. An easy and gracious welcome, intelligent faces, and a promise of gaiety which was not disappointed. The half hour before supper was spent in decent but unrestrained conversation; during supper, however, the Syndic having set the tone, I foresaw what would happen after supper.

The day being hot, on the pretext of cooling ourselves, and being sure that no one would come to interrupt us, we were soon very nearly in the state of nature. I should have given offense if I had not followed the example of the four others. What an orgy! We rose to such a pitch of gaiety that, having recited Grécourt's[48] Y grec, I took it upon myself to demonstrate to the three girls in turn why the decree Gaudeant bene nati ("Let the well-born rejoice") had been promulgated. I saw the Syndic pluming himself on the present of my person which he had made to the three girls, who, from what I saw, must have fared very poorly with him, whose concupiscence affected only his head. It was their sense of obligation which an hour after midnight made them give me an ejaculation I really needed. I repeatedly kissed the six fair hands which humbled themselves to the task, which is always humiliating to any woman made for love, but which could not be so in the farce we had played, for having had the kindness to spare them, I had, with the help of the voluptuous Syndic, done them the same service. They thanked me endlessly, and I saw that they were in raptures when the Syndic invited me for the next day.

But it was I who thanked him again and again when he saw me to my inn. He told me that he alone had been responsible for bringing up the three girls, and that I was the first man whose acquaintance he had allowed them. He begged me to continue to be on my guard against making them pregnant, for it would be a fatal misfortune for them in a city as captiously strict on the point as Geneva.

The next day I wrote Monsieur de Voltaire an epistle in blank verse, which cost me more trouble than if I had rhymed it. I sent it to him with Teofilo Folengo's[49] poem; and I made a great mistake in sending it, for I should have known he would not like it. I then went to Mr. Fox's, where the two Englishmen offered me my revenge. I lost a hundred louis. After dinner they left for Lausanne.

Having learned from the Syndic himself that his three girls were not rich, I went to a jeweler to have six doblones de a ocho[50] melted, ordering him to make me three balls of two ounces each immediately. I knew how I could go about giving them to the girls without humiliating them.

At noon I went to Monsieur de Voltaire's, who was not visible, but Madame Denis made up to me for it. She had a sound intelligence, excellent taste, learning without pretension, and a great dislike for the King of Prussia. She asked me for news of my beautiful housekeeper, and she was very glad to hear that the Ambassador's major-domo had married her. She asked me to tell her how I had escaped from the Leads, and I promised to satisfy her request some other day.

Monsieur de Voltaire did not come to the table. He did not appear until about five o'clock, carrying a letter.

"Do you know," he asked me, "the Marchese Albergati Capacelli,[51] Senator of Bologna, and Count Paradisi?"[52]

"I do not know Paradisi, but I know Signor Albergati by sight and reputation; he is not a Senator but a 'Forty,'[53] born in Bologna, where the Forty are fifty."

"Heaven preserve us! What a riddle!"

"Do you know him?"

"No; but he sends me Goldoni's[54] plays, Bologna sausages, the translation of my Tancrède,[55] and he is coming to see me."

"He will not come, he is not so foolish."

"What do you mean by that? Though it is true that coming to see me is foolish."

"I am talking about Albergati. He knows he would be the loser by it, for he enjoys the idea you may have of him. He is sure that if he comes to visit you, you will see his nothingness or his whole bag of tricks, and good-by illusion! In other respects he is a worthy gentleman with an income of six thousand zecchini and theatromania.[56] He is a good actor and the author[57] of prose comedies which are not funny."

"You paint a pretty picture of him. But how can he be both forty and fifty?"

"As noon at Basel is eleven o'clock."[58]

"I understand—just as your Council of Ten numbers seventeen."[59]

"Even so. But the accursed Forty of Bologna are another matter."

"Why accursed?"

"Because they are not answerable to the Exchequer, and so they commit all the crimes they please and go to reside outside the State, where they still live on their revenues."

"That's a blessing, not a curse; but let us continue. No doubt the Marchese Albergati is a man of letters."

"He writes well, for he knows his language; but he bores his reader because he enjoys the sound of his own voice and he is diffuse. And he has nothing in his head."

"He is an actor, you said."

"Excellent when he plays something of his own, especially in the part of the lover."

"Is he handsome?"

"On the stage, but not in ordinary life. His face has no expression."

"But his plays are liked?"

"Not at all. They would be booed if people understood them."

"And what do you say of Goldoni?"

"He is our Molière."

"Why does he call himself poet to the Duke of Parma?"[60]

"To give himself a title, for the Duke knows nothing about it. He also calls himself an advocate,[61] but he is one only in posse. He is a good writer of comedies, and that is all. I am his friend, and everyone in Venice knows it. In society he does not shine, he is as insipid and sweet as marshmallow.''

''So someone wrote me. He is poor, and he wants to leave Venice. The owners of the theaters where his plays are performed must not like that.''

''There was talk of giving him a pension; but the decision went against it. It was thought that if he had a pension he would stop working.''

''Cuma[62] refused Homer a pension for fear that all blind people would demand one.''

We spent the day very pleasantly. He thanked me for the Macaronicon[63] and promised to read it. He introduced a Jesuit[64] whom he had in his service, saying that his name was Adam but that he was not the first of men; and I was told that, amusing himself playing backgammon with him, when he lost he often threw the dice and the dicebox in his face.

I was scarcely back at my inn in the evening before I received my three gold balls, and a moment later I saw my dear Syndic, who took me to his orgy.

On the way he discussed the sense of modesty which prevents our displaying the parts which from childhood we have been taught to keep covered. He said that modesty of this kind could often derive from a virtue; but that the virtue was weaker than the force of education, since it could not resist an attack when the aggressor knew what he was about. The easiest strategy, in his opinion, was not to admit its existence, to show that one had no regard for it and ridicule it; the thing to do was to surprise it by setting the example, leaping the barriers of shame, and victory was certain; the boldness of the attacker made the modesty of the person attacked vanish instantly.

"Clement of Alexandria," [65] he said, "a man of learning and a philosopher, said that the modesty which seems so firmly rooted in women's minds was really only in their underclothes, because as soon as they were persuaded to take those off not a shadow of it remained."

We found the three young ladies, lightly clad in linen dresses, sitting on a large sofa, and we sat down in front of them on armless chairs. The half hour before supper was devoted to charming badinage like that of the evening before and to quantities of kisses. It was after supper that the combat began.

As soon as we were sure that the maid would not come to interrupt us again, we made ourselves comfortable. The Syndic began by taking from his pocket a package of English coveralls, praising that admirable defense against a misfortune which could give rise to dread repentance. They knew of it, and they seemed satisfied, laughing at the shape which the inflated instrument took before their eyes, when I said that I certainly loved their honor even more than their beauty, but that I could never consent to seek happiness with them by wrapping myself in a piece of dead skin.

"Here," I say, taking from my pocket the three gold balls, "is what will safeguard you against any untoward consequences. After fifteen years' experience I am in a position to assure you that with these balls you have nothing to fear and that in future you will not need these miserable sheaths. Honor me with your complete confidence in this respect, and accept this small present from a Venetian who adores you."

"We are grateful to you," says the elder of the sisters; "but how does one use this pretty ball to avert a disastrous big belly?"

"All that is necessary is for the ball to be in the cabinet of love during the combat. It is an antipathic virtue in the metal which prevents pregnancy."

"But," remarks the cousin,[66] "the little ball may easily slip out of the place before the action is over."

"Not at all, when one knows how to go about it. There is a posture which will prevent the ball from coming out by its own weight."

"Show us," says the Syndic, taking up a candle to light me when I put the ball in place.

The charming cousin had said too much to withdraw and refuse the proof which her cousins wanted. I placed her at the foot of the bed in such a way that it was impossible for the ball, which I inserted, to fall out; but it fell out after the act, and she saw that I had cheated her, but she pretended not to notice it. She picked up the ball, and she challenged the two sisters to do as much. They underwent the operation with every sign of interest.

The Syndic, having no faith in the virtue of the ball, would not trust it. He limited his pleasure to looking on, and he had no reason to complain. After half an hour's respite I began the ceremonies again without the balls, assuring them that they ran no risk, and I kept my word.

When I left, I saw the three girls overwhelmed; they felt they had contracted obligations to me and had given me nothing. Bestowing countless caresses on the Syndic, they asked him how he had guessed that I was the man who deserved to be let into their great secret.

As we were leaving, the Syndic urged the three girls to ask me to stay another day in Geneva for their sake, and I assented. He was to be occupied the next day. For my part I really needed a day's rest. He saw me to my inn, treating me to the most flattering compliments.

After sleeping soundly for ten hours I felt fit to go and enjoy Monsieur de Voltaire's charming company; but the great man was pleased on that day to indulge in raillery, ill-humored jests, and sarcasm. He knew that I was to leave the next day.

He began at table by saying that he thanked me for my present of Merlin Cocai, certainly made with good intentions, but that he did not thank me for the praise I had bestowed on the poem, since I had been the cause of his wasting four hours reading nonsense. My hair stood on end, but I controlled myself. I replied quite calmly that on another occasion he might find it worthy of the greater praise which he himself could bestow. I cited several examples of the inadequacy of a first reading.

"True enough—but as for your Merlin, I leave him to you. I have put him beside Chapelain's[67] La Pucelle."

"Which pleases all competent critics, despite its versification. It is a good poem, and Chapelain was a poet; his genius has not escaped me."

My statement could not but offend him, and I should have known it after he told me that he would put the Macaronicon I had given him beside La Pucelle. I knew, too, that a filthy poem by the same name, which was widely circulated, was supposed to be by him; but since he disavowed it[68] I thought he would conceal the pain which my frankness must have caused him; but not a bit of it—he contradicted me sharply and I became no less sharp. I told him that Chapelain had the merit of making his subject agreeable without currying the favor of his readers by filth and impiety.

"Such," I said, "is the opinion of my master Monsieur de Crébillon." [69]

"You cite a great judge. But in what is my confrère Crébillon your master?"

"He taught me to speak French in less than two years. To show him my gratitude I translated his Rhadamiste[70] into Italian Alexandrine verse. I am the first Italian who dared to adapt that meter to our language."

"The first, if you will pardon me, was my friend Pier Jacopo Martelli." [71]

"Pardon me."

"Why, I have his works,[72] printed at Bologna, in my room."

"You can only have read verses of fourteen syllables[73] without alternating masculine and feminine rhyme. Yet he believed he was imitating Alexandrines, and his preface made me laugh. Perhaps you did not read it."

"Monsieur, I have a passion for reading prefaces. Martelli proves that to Italian ears his verses sound the same as Alexandrines do to the French."

"He is egregiously wrong, and I ask you to be the judge. Your masculine verse has only twelve syllables and your feminine thirteen; all Martelli's verses have fourteen, except those which end in a long syllable, which at the end of a verse always counts as two. Observe that Martelli's first hemistich is always and forever of seven syllables, whereas in the French Alexandrine it is forever and always of six. Either your friend Pier Jacopo was deaf or he had a bad ear."

"Then in the theory of your verse you follow all our rules?"

"All of them, despite the difficulty; for nearly all our words end in a short syllable."

"And how was your new meter received?"

"It was not liked, because no one knew the way to recite my verses; but when I delivered them myself in our literary circles I triumphed."

"Do you remember a passage from your Rhadamiste?"

"As many as you please."

I then recited to him the same scene which I had recited to Crébillon in blank verse ten years earlier, and he seemed impressed. He said that the difficulty was not perceptible, and it was the greatest compliment he could pay me. In his turn he recited a passage from his Tancrède, which I believe he had not then published and which was later rightly judged a masterpiece.

We should have ended on good terms, but a line of Horace which I quoted to applaud one of his ideas led him to say that Horace was a great master of the drama because of his precepts, which would never grow stale.

"You break only one of them," I said, "but you break it like a great man."

"Which one?"

"You do not write contentus paucis lectoribus ('satisfied with a few readers')." [74]

"If Horace had had to fight superstition he would have written for everyone, as I do."

"You might, it seems to me, spare yourself the trouble of fighting it, for you will never succeed in destroying it, and even if you did, pray tell me with what you would fill its place."

"I like that! When I deliver the human race from a ferocious monster which devours it, can I be asked what I will put in its place?"

"It does not devour it; on the contrary, it is necessary to its existence."

"Loving the human race, I should wish to see it happy as I am, free; and superstition cannot be combined with freedom. What makes you think that servitude can make a people happy?"

"Then you would wish to see sovereignty in the people?"

"God forbid! One alone must govern."

"Then superstition is necessary, for without it the people will never obey the monarch."

"No monarch—for the name makes me see despotism, which I must hate as I do servitude."

"Then what would you have? If you want the ruler to be one man, I can only consider him a monarch."

"I want him to command a free people, then he will be its leader, and he cannot be called a monarch, for he can never be arbitrary."

"Addison[75] tells you that such a monarch, such a leader, is not among possible beings. I am for Hobbes.[76] Between two evils, one must choose the lesser. A people without superstition would be philosophical and philosophers will never obey. The people can be happy only if they are cursed, downtrodden, kept in chains."

"If you have read me you will have found the proofs by which I demonstrate that superstition is the enemy of kings."

"If I have read you! I have read and reread you—and especially when I am not of your opinion. Your first passion is love of humanity. Est ubi peccas ('You are sometimes wrong').[77] That love blinds you. Love humanity, but you can only love it as it is. It is incapable of the benefits you would lavish upon it; and, giving them, you would only make it more unhappy and more wicked. Leave it the monster which devours it; the monster is dear to it. I never laughed so much as when I saw Don Quixote[78] having a very hard time defending himself from the galley slaves to whom he had just magnanimously given their freedom."

"Are you Venetians free?"

"As free as it is possible to be under an aristocratic government. The freedom we have is not as great as that which the English enjoy, but we are content. My imprisonment, for example, was an outright act of despotism; but knowing that I had myself abused my freedom, at certain moments I considered that they had been right to imprison me without the usual formalities."

"At that rate no one is free in Venice."

"Possibly; but grant that, to be free, it is enough to believe that one is so."

"I will not so easily grant it. Even the aristocrats who are members of the government are not free—for example, they cannot travel without permission."

"It is a law to which they deliberately subjected themselves in order to preserve their power. Would you say that a Bernese is not free because he is subject to the sumptuary laws?[79] It is he himself who is the lawmaker."

It was to change the subject that he asked me where I had come from.

"From Roche. I should have been very sorry to leave Switzerland without seeing the famous Haller. I am paying homage to my learned contemporaries—and you will be the savory at the end of the feast."

"You must have enjoyed Monsieur Haller."

"I spent three excellent days with him."

"I congratulate you. One should go down on one's knees to that great man."

"I think so too; you do him justice, and for his sake I regret that he is not so fair to you."

"So! Then possibly we are both mistaken."

At this answer, whose whole merit is in its quickness, all the company applauded.

There was no more talk of literature, and I played a silent part until, Monsieur de Voltaire having withdrawn, I went up to Madame Denis and asked her if she had any commissions for me in Rome.

I left rather well pleased that on this last day I had reduced the gladiator to reason. But I was left with a grudge against him which for ten years made me criticize everything I read, old or new, which the great man had given or was giving the public. I repent of it now, despite the fact that when I read what I published against him[80] I find that my censures were based on sound reasoning. I should have kept quiet, respected him, and doubted my own judgments. I should have reflected that but for the raillery with which he offended me on the third day I should have thought him sublime in everything. This reflection alone should have kept me silent, but an angry man always believes he is right. Reading me, posterity will number me among the Zoiluses,[81] and the very humble amends I make him today will perhaps not be read.

I spent part of the night and the next day writing down the three conversations I had with him, which I have now copied in abridged form. Toward nightfall the Syndic came for me, and we went to sup with his three young ladies.

In the five hours we spent there we indulged in all the extravagances I could invent. When I left, I promised to see them again on my return from Rome, and I kept my word. I departed from Geneva the next day after dining with my dear Syndic, who went with me as far as Annecy,[82] where I spent the night. The next day I dined at Aix-en-Savoie,[83] intending to spend the night at Chambéry;[84] but fate was against it.

Aix-en-Savoie is an ugly place where there are mineral waters and, at the end of summer, some people of fashion. I did not know it. I was dining quietly and in haste, intending to leave at once for Chambéry, when I see a company of gay and fashionable-looking people, both men and women, come in and prepare to sit down at the table. I watch them from where I sit, acknowledging their salutations with a bow. From their conversation I learn that they are all there to take the waters. A man of imposing appearance approaches me politely and asks if I am going to Turin; I reply that I am going to Marseilles.

Dinner is served, and they all sit down. I see attractive women and men of a stamp to be their husbands or their lovers. I decide that the place offers possibilities for amusement. They were all speaking French or Piedmontese, and they seemed to be people who did not stand on formality. I foresee that if I am asked I shall easily be persuaded to spend the night there.

Having finished dinner when they had not yet come to the roast, and my coachman not being able to leave for an hour, I go up to a pretty woman and congratulate her on the good which the waters of Aix must be doing her, since the appetite with which she was eating aroused it in anyone who watched her. She imperiously challenges me to prove that I am speaking the truth by sitting down beside her, and at the same time she offers me the slice of roast which she had been served. The chair being empty, I accept her challenge, and I eat as if I had not dined.

I then hear a voice saying: "It is the Abbé's place," and another voice answers: "He left half an hour ago." "Why did he go?" asks a third person; "he was to be here a week longer." Voices are lowered, the conversation is continued in whispers, but the departure of some abbé being of no interest to me I continue to eat, confining my attention to the lady, who serves me the best bits. I tell Leduc, who was behind my chair, to have champagne brought for me; the lady is fond of it and drinks with me; and the whole table orders champagne. I see that she is animated, I flirt with her; and I ask her if she is always so strict in holding all the men who offer her homage to their word. She replies that not all of them are worth the trouble. Pretty and witty—I try to think of a pretext for putting off my departure, and chance gives it to me.

"For once," says a lady to the beauty who was drinking with me, "an empty place proves to be just the thing."

"Very much so, for my neighbor was boring me."

"Did he have no appetite?" I ask her.

"Bah! gamesters have none except for money."

"Usually; but you have unusual powers, for I have never in my life dined twice."

"It was because you were challenged. I am sure you will not sup."

"Let us wager that I sup."

"We will wager the supper, but I want to see it."

"Done."

The whole table applauds; the lady blushes with pleasure, and I order Leduc to tell the coachman that I will not leave until the next day.

"It is my part," says the lady, "to order the supper."

"Yes, for it is you who will pay for it. My duty, in a wager of this kind, is to keep up with you. If I eat as much as you do, I have won."

At the end of dinner the man of imposing appearance called for cards and made a small bank at faro. I expected as much. He spread before him twenty-five Piedmontese pistoles,[85] and some silver money to amuse the ladies. The bank amounted to about forty louis. Remaining simply a spectator for the first deal, I saw that the banker was playing in a manner to do him credit.

While he was shuffling for the second deal the beautiful lady asked me why I was not playing. I whispered to her that she had made me lose my appetite for money; she smiled. Thinking that after this declaration I was bound to play, I took forty louis from my purse and lost them in two deals. I got up, answering the banker's condolences by saying that I never risked more than the amount in the bank. One of the company then asked me if I knew an Abbé Gilbert;[86] I answered that I had known a man of that name in Paris who came from Lyons and who owed me his ears, so I would cut them off wherever I met him. The questioner did not reply, and the company remained silent, pretending to notice nothing. I saw that the Abbé Gilbert must be the man whose place I had occupied. Having seen me arrive, he had taken flight. At my house in Little Poland I had entrusted him with a ring which had cost me five thousand florins in Holland, and he had decamped the next day.

Everyone having left the room, I ask Leduc if I am well lodged. He takes me to see a large unfurnished room in an old house a hundred paces from the inn, all the other rooms in which were occupied. The innkeeper told me he had no other room and that he would have a bed, chairs, and tables brought at once. I had to make the best of it. I told Leduc that he would sleep in my room, and to have all my luggage taken there immediately.

"What do you make of the Abbé Gilbert?" he said. "I did not recognize him till just as he was setting out, and I thought for a moment of taking him by the collar."

"It is a thought which you should have executed."

"Some other time."

Leaving the room, I see a man approaching me who congratulates himself on being my neighbor and offers to accompany me if I am going to see the fountain.[87] I thank him and accept. He was a tall, thin, blond man who at the age of fifty still had his hair, who must once have been handsome, and whose excessive affability should have made me suspect him; but I needed someone to chat with. On our way to the fountain he gave me an account of the people with whom I had dined. He began by telling me that the waters of Aix were good, but that no one in the company I had seen was there to take them.

"I am the only one," he said, "who is obliged to take them, for I am consumptive; I grow thinner every day, and if I do not find an effectual remedy I cannot live long."

"Then all these gentlemen have come here only to amuse themselves?"

"To gamble. They are all Piedmontese or Savoyards. As I come from Lorraine, I am the only Frenchman. My father, who is eighty years of age, is the Marquis Desarmoises.[88] He lives to infuriate me, for because of a marriage I contracted without his consent he disinherited me; but since I am the only son I shall have everything when he dies, if I outlive him. I have a house in Lyons; but I never never go there because of my elder daughter, with whom I have the misfortune to be in love. My wife prevents me from making her listen to reason."

"That is odd. Otherwise you think she would take pity on her amorous father?"

"She might, for she is a good, obedient girl."

CHAPTER XI

My adventures at Aix-en-Savoie. My second M. M. Madame Z.

WALKING TOWARD the fountain in the company of a man who, having no acquaintance with me, was telling me these things in perfect good faith and with not the slightest fear of horrifying me and making me think him a criminal of the deepest dye, I reflected that, supposing me to be the same sort of person as himself, he could only think he was doing me great honor. But, wanting to know him still better:

"Despite the Marquis your father's severity," I said, "you no doubt live very well."

"Very badly. I have a pension from the Department of Foreign Affairs as a retired courier. I let my wife have it to live on, and for my part I manage by traveling. I play backgammon very well, and all gambling games; by winning more than I lose, I live."

"Is what you have just told me known to all the company here?"

"To them all. Why should I hide it? I am a man of honor and I have a dangerous sword."

"I do not doubt it. Do you allow Mademoiselle Desarmoises to have a lover? If she is pretty—"

"Extremely pretty; I should not object; but my wife is pious. If you go to Lyons I will give you a letter to her."

"Thank you, but I am going to Italy. May I ask you who the gentleman is who made bank?"

"He is the famous Pancalieri, Marquis de Prié[1] since the death of his father, whom, since you are a Venetian, you must have known as Ambassador. The gentleman who asked you if you knew the Abbé Gilbert is the Chevalier Z,[2] husband of the lady with whom you are to sup. The others are all Piedmontese or Savoyard Counts or Marquises; two or three are sons of merchants, and the women are all related to one another or mistresses of some man in the company. They are all professional gamesters and very sharp; when a stranger passes through here, if he plays he can hardly escape them, for they are all in it together. They think they have you hooked; beware."

Toward nightfall we returned to the inn, where we found all the gamesters at various gambling games. My new friend played draughts with a Count Scarnafigi.[3] Since I had refused all invitations to play, the husband of my beauty offered to play faro with me, each dealing in turn, for forty zecchini. I had just lost that amount when supper was served. The lady found me no less gay on that account, and she paid the wager very honorably. During supper her glances, the source of which I knew, showed me only too clearly that she intended to dupe me, so I thought I was out of danger on the article of love; but I should have feared Fortune, who always favors bankers at faro and who had already given me a scratch. I should have left, but I did not have the strength of mind. All I could do was to promise myself I would be extremely careful, and since I had plenty of money at my disposal in good paper, and a sufficiency in cash, I should not have found a course of prudent play difficult.

Immediately after supper the Marquis de Prié made a bank which, adding up the gold and the silver, might be worth three hundred zecchini. This contemptible sum showed me that I could lose much and win little, for it was obvious that he would have made me a bank of a thousand zecchini if he had them. So I placed fifty lisbonini[4] before me, modestly saying that when I had lost them I would go to bed. Halfway through the third deal I broke the bank. The Marquis said he would put up another two hundred louis; I replied that I wanted to leave at dawn, and I withdrew.

Just as I was getting into bed Desarmoises came and asked me to let him have twelve louis, assuring me that he would repay them. I give them to him instantly and, after embracing me warmly, he said that Madame Z had undertaken to keep me in Aix for at least another day. I laughed. I ask Leduc if the coachman has been notified, and he replies that he will be at my door at five o'clock in the morning. Desarmoises leaves, saying that he would wager I will not leave. I go to bed, scoffing at his idea, and fall asleep.

The next day at dawn the coachman comes to tell me that, one of his horses being sick, he cannot leave. I see that Desarmoises has spoken the truth, but I laugh. I order the coachman out of my room, and I send Leduc to ask the innkeeper for post horses. The innkeeper comes and tells me he has no horses, and that to procure some would take all morning. The Marquis de Prié, having left an hour after midnight, had emptied his stable. So I tell him I will dine at Aix, but that I count on his promise and so will leave at two o'clock.

I go out to visit the fountain and, stopping at the stable, I see one of my coachman's horses lying down and the man himself crying. I believe there is no trickery, and I console him by paying him, saying that I have no further need for him. I go to the fountain. And now, my dear reader, for something straight out of a romance, but which is nevertheless true. If you think it fictitious, you are wrong.

Twenty paces before I reach the waters I see two nuns coming from that direction, both veiled, one whose figure leads me to conclude that she is young, the other obviously old. The thing which strikes me is their habit, for it is the same as that of my dear M. M., whom I had last seen on July 24, 1755. That had been five years ago. Their sudden appearance did not suffice to make me believe the nun I saw was M. M., but it was enough to make me curious. They were walking toward the fields, I turn back to intercept them, to see them face to face, and to show myself. But I tremble when I see the younger one, who was walking ahead of the older, raise her veil; I see M. M. I could not possibly doubt it, I had too much cause to know her. I walk toward her, she quickly lowers her veil, and she takes another path, obviously to avoid me. I instantly fall in with whatever reasons she may have, and I turn back, but without losing sight of her; I follow her at a distance to see where she will stop. Five hundred paces farther on I see her enter a solitary peasant's house. It is enough. I go back to the fountain to learn what I can.

"The charming and unfortunate M. M.," I said to myself on the way, "has fled from her convent, desperate, perhaps mad, for why did she not discard the habit of her order? Perhaps she has come to take the waters here with permission from Rome, and that is why she has a nun with her and must wear her habit. But such a long journey can only have been made on some false pretext. Can she have yielded to some inclination, of which the fatal result has been pregnancy? She may be in difficulties, and now she is glad to have found me. She will have found me ready to do anything for her she may want, and my constant friendship will convince her that I was not unworthy to possess her heart."

So musing, I come to the waters, where I see the whole company from the inn. They all say they are delighted that I have not gone. I ask the Chevalier Z after his wife, he replies that she is fond of lying in bed, and that I would do well to go and make her get up. I take leave of them to go to her, and the local doctor comes up to me and says the waters of Aix will make me twice as healthy. I ask him point-blank if he is the doctor of a pretty nun I had seen. He replies that she takes the waters but talks to no one.

"Where is she from?"

"Nobody knows; she is lodging in a peasant's house."

I leave the doctor, and nothing can stop me from going to talk with the peasant who is lodging her; but when I am a hundred paces from the house I see a peasant woman coming to meet me. She says that her ladyship the nun asks me to come back at nine o'clock, that the lay sister will be asleep then, and she can talk with me. I assure her that I will not fail to come, and I give her a louis.

I go back to the inn, certain that I will talk with the adorable M. M. at nine o'clock. I ask where Madame Z's room is, and, entering without knocking, I say that her husband has sent me to make her get up.

"I thought you had left."

"I shall leave at two o'clock."

I find the young woman even more appetizing in bed than at the table. I help her put on a corset, and I become ardent; but she overawes me. I sit down at her feet, I talk to her of the sudden blow which her beauty has dealt my soul, and of my unhappiness at having to leave without giving her adequate proof of my ardor; she laughs and answers that I am my own master and can stay if I will.

"Encourage me to hope for your favors, and I will put off leaving until tomorrow."

"You are in too much of a hurry, and I beg you to calm yourself."

Making the best of the little she let me do, though pretending, of course, to yield to force, I had to put myself to rights on the appearance of her husband, who, however, made some noise before coming in. It was she who told him that she had persuaded me to defer my departure until the next day. He congratulated her, and, saying that he owes me a revenge, he produces cards and sits down on the other side of his wife, making her serve as our table. I stop when a servant comes to announce dinner. Madame says that, not having time to dress, she will dine in bed; her husband says we will dine with her, and I agree. He goes to order dinner, and, on the strength of having lost another eighteen or twenty louis, I tell her clearly that I will leave after dinner if she will not promise to be kind to me in the course of the day. She replies that she will expect me for breakfast the next morning at nine, and that we will be alone. She gives me a more than trifling down payment, and I promise to stay.

We dine with her, sitting beside her bed; I send Leduc to tell the innkeeper that I will not leave until the next day after dinner, and I see both husband and wife well pleased. Madame wishes to get up, I leave her, promising to return in an hour to play hundred-point piquet with her. I go to my room for money, and I find Desarmoises, who assures me that the coachman had been paid two louis to substitute a sick horse for his own. I laugh and say that I cannot win on one side without losing on the other, that I am in love with Madame Z, and that I will put off my departure until she has satisfied me.

I went back to her room and played piquet at a louis a hundred with her until eight o'clock. I then excused myself on the pretext of a bad headache, paying her ten or twelve louis and reminding her that she was to wait for me in bed and give me breakfast at nine o'clock. I left her surrounded by people.

By the light of the moon I walked alone to the house where I was to talk with M. M., impatient to know the outcome of my visit, on which my destiny might depend. Suspecting the possibility of a trap, I had a pair of unfailing pistols in my pocket and my sword under my arm. At twenty paces from the house I see the peasant woman, who says that, since the nun cannot come downstairs, I must be prepared to climb up to her room, entering through the window. She takes me behind the house and shows me a ladder leaning against the window by which I am to go in. Seeing no light, I would have decided not to go; but hearing "Come and fear nothing" spoken to me by M. M. herself from the window, which in any case was not too high, I have no more doubts, I climb up, I enter, and I clasp her in my arms, covering her face with kisses. I ask her in Venetian why she has no candle, and I beg her to satisfy my impatience at once by telling me the whole story of what seemed to me a miracle.

But never in my life have I been so surprised as when I heard a voice which was not M. M.'s reply, not in Venetian but in French, that I did not need a candle to tell her what Monsieur de Cou. . .[5] had decided to do to extricate her from her fatal situation.

"I do not know Monsieur de Cou. . .; you are not the nun I saw this morning. You are not a Venetian."

"Alas for me! I have made a mistake; but I am the nun you saw this morning. I am French; I implore you in God's name to be discreet, and to go, for I have nothing to say to you. Speak in a whisper, for if my lay sister, who is asleep, should wake up I am ruined."

"Have no doubt of my discretion. What deceived me was a striking resemblance. If you had not shown me your face I should not have come here; forgive me the audacious caresses my love bestowed on you, thinking you another."

"You have amazed me. Would that I were the nun in whom you are interested! I am in the most terrible of quandaries."

"If ten louis, Madame, can be of service to you I beg you to accept them."

"Thank you, but I have no need of money. Permit me also to return the louis you sent me."

"I gave it to the peasant woman, and you surprise me more and more. What is your calamity, which money cannot cure?"

"It may be that God has sent you to help me. Perhaps you will give me good advice. So listen to me, just for a quarter of an hour."

"Yes, and with the greatest interest. Let us sit down."

"Alas, there is neither chair nor bed here."

"Then speak."

"I am from Grenoble. I was forced to take the veil at Chambéry. Two years later Monsieur de Cou. . . so far led me astray that I received him in my arms in the convent garden, which he entered by climbing the wall. Finding that I was pregnant, I told him so. The idea that I should bear the child in my convent being horrible, for they would have locked me in a cell to die, he thought of getting me out by the order of a doctor, who would threaten me with death if I did not come here to take these incomparable waters to cure me of the disease which the same doctor would say I have. The doctor was found, and Princess XXX,[6] who is always at Chambéry, let into the secret, persuaded the Bishop[7] to grant me three months' leave and to obtain the Abbess's consent to it. Having made my arrangements, I thought I should be leaving at the end of my seventh month; but apparently I was mistaken, for the three months are almost over and I am still pregnant. I absolutely must go back to the convent, and you will understand that I cannot bring myself to it. The lay sister whom the Abbess put to watch over me is the cruelest of women. She has orders not to let me speak to anyone and to keep me from showing myself. It was she who ordered me to turn back when she saw you change your direction to meet me. I raised my veil to let you see that I was she whom I believed you were seeking; luckily she did not notice it. The viper wants me to go back to the convent in three days on the ground that my sickness, which she believes to be dropsy, is incurable. She would not let me talk with the doctor, whom I might have won over by telling him the truth. I long for death. I am twenty-one years old."

"Do not weep so. But how could you have given birth here without your lay sister being aware of it?"

"The peasant woman who lets me this lodging, and in whom I confided, assured me that as soon as I felt the first pains a soporific which she bought in Annecy would put her to sleep. It is from the effect of the same drug that she is asleep now in the room under this garret."

"Why was I not let in by the door?"

"To hide you from the peasant woman's brother; he is malicious too."

"But what reason did you have to believe Monsieur de Cou. . . had sent me?"

"Because ten or twelve days ago I wrote him and described my distress so vividly that I think it impossible he will not find some way to rescue me. I thought he had sent you."

"Are you sure your letter reached him?"

"The peasant woman herself put it in the post at Annecy."

"You should have written to the Princess."

"I did not dare."

"I will go to the Princess myself, or to Monsieur de Cou. . . , or anywhere, even to the Bishop to get you an extension, for you cannot go back to the convent in your present condition. Decide, for I can do nothing without your consent. Do you want to come with me? I will bring you clothes tomorrow and take you to Italy, and I will look after you as long as you live."

Instead of an answer I hear only the sad sound of her sobs. Not knowing what more to say, I promised I would come back the next day to learn what decision she had taken, for she had to decide on one course or another. I went down by the same ladder, and, giving the peasant woman another louis, I told her I would come back the next day but that she must arrange to let me in by the door and must double the dose of opium she had given the lay sister.

I went home to bed, all in all very glad that I had been wrong in my idea that the nun might be my dear M. M.; but having seen such a likeness I was extremely curious to see her more closely. I was sure she would grant me the favor the next day. I laughed over the kisses I had given her. An unspoken presentiment told me that I would be of use to her. I felt that, when the worst came to the worst, I could not abandon her; and I congratulated myself when I saw that, to do a good deed, I did not need to be led into it by my senses, for as soon as I learned that it was not on M. M. that I had lavished my kisses I felt that they had been thrown away. It did not even occur to me to embrace her when I left.

Desarmoises told me in the morning that, not seeing me at supper, the whole company had racked their brains trying to guess where I might be. Madame Z had praised me in the highest terms, heroically withstanding the raillery of the two other ladies and boasting that she could keep me in Aix as long as she should stay there.

I had really become curious about her, and I should have been sorry to leave the place without having had her in due form at least once.

I enter her room at nine o'clock and find her dressed. I protest, she says it should make no difference to me, I sulk, and I take chocolate with her in silence. She offers me my revenge at hundred-point piquet, but I decline and get up to leave. She asks me to escort her to the fountain, and I reply that if she takes me for a child she is wrong, that I do not care to pretend I am pleased with her when I am not, and that she can get anyone she likes to escort her to the fountain.

"Good-by, Madame."

So saying, I went downstairs, not listening to what she was saying to keep me with her. At the inn door I told the innkeeper I would leave without fail at three o'clock, and, being at her window, she heard me. I went straight to the fountain, where the Chevalier Z asked me how his wife was; I told him I had left her in her room in good health. We saw her arrive a half hour later with a stranger who had just arrived and whom a Monsieur de Saint-Maurice greeted warmly. Madame Z calmly left him and took my arm. After complaining of my behavior she said that she had wanted to put me to a test and that if I loved her I should defer my departure again and come to breakfast with her the next morning at eight o'clock. I replied, quietly but seriously, that I would think it over. I maintained the same attitude all through dinner, having said two or three times that I would certainly leave at three o'clock; but needing to find some excuse for not leaving, since I had promised to visit the nun, I let myself be persuaded to make a bank at faro.

So I went to fetch all the gold I had, and I saw the whole company as surprised as they were pleased when I placed before me some four hundred louis in Spanish and French gold coins and fifteen or twenty in silver. I announced that I would stop at eight o'clock. The new arrival laughed and said that perhaps the bank might not last that long. It was three o'clock. I asked Desarmoises to serve as my croupier; and I began dealing, with all the slowness demanded by the presence of eighteen or twenty punters and my knowledge that they were all professional gamblers. At each deal I opened a fresh pack of cards.

About five o'clock, my bank being the loser, a carriage arrives. We are told that it is three Englishmen coming from Geneva and changing horses to go on to Chambéry. A moment later I see them enter and I greet them. It was Mr. Fox and his two friends who had played quinze with me. My croupier gives them each a livret,[8] they accept with pleasure, and room is made for them. Each of them punts at ten louis, stakes on two and three cards, makes paroli, sept et le va, and the quinze[9] as well; I saw that my bank was in danger of being broken, and, putting a good face[10] on it, I encouraged them. God being neutral, they could only lose; and he was neutral. At the third deal all their purses were empty. Their horses were harnessed.

While I was shuffling, the youngest of them takes a bill of exchange from his portfolio and, after showing it to his two friends, asks me if I will accept it on a card without knowing how much it is for.

"Yes," I replied, "if you will tell me on whom it is drawn and provided that the amount is not more than my bank."

After thinking for a little and looking at the bank, he said that his bill of exchange was not as much as my bank and that it was a sight bill on Zappata at Turin. I accept. He cuts, and puts his bill on the ace. The two others say they are in for a half share. The ace never turning up, I am left with twelve cards, and I calmly tell the Englishman that he is at liberty to withdraw. He refuses. I deal two hands; the ace does not appear; I had eight cards; there were four aces, and my last card was not an ace.

"My Lord," I said, "the odds are two to one that the ace is here; I am willing to let you off, withdraw."

"You are too generous," he answered; "deal."

The ace appeared and not in a doublet; I at once put the bill of exchange in my pocket without unfolding it, and the Englishmen left, laughing and thanking me. A minute later Fox came back and, roaring with laughter, asked me to lend him fifty louis. I instantly gave them to him with the greatest pleasure. He returned them to me in London three years later.

The whole company was curious to know the value of the bill of exchange, but I wanted to have the pleasure of satisfying no one's curiosity. Being curious myself, I found when I was alone that it was for eight thousand Piedmontese lire.[11]

After the Englishmen departed, Fortune decided to favor my bank. I stopped about eight o'clock, there being no one left except the ladies, who had won. All the men had lost. I won over a thousand louis, and Desarmoises received twenty-five, for which he was grateful. After stopping in my room to lock up my money, I went to see the nun.

The good peasant woman let me in by the door, saying that everyone was asleep and that she had not needed to double the dose to put the lay sister to sleep for she had never waked. What was this! I go up to the garret, and by the light of a candle I see my nun with her face covered by a veil. The peasant woman had put a long sack filled with straw against the wall; it served us as a seat, and a bottle on the floor served as the candlestick for the candle which gave us light.

"What decision have you reached, Madame?"

"None, for something has happened which has us in despair. My lay sister has been asleep for twenty-eight hours."

"She will die in convulsions or of apoplexy tonight, if you do not call a doctor who can perhaps summon her back to life with castoreum." [12]

"We have thought of that, but we do not dare. You see what the consequences would be. Whether he cures her or not, he will say we gave her the poison."

"God in heaven! I pity you. Even if you call the doctor now, I fear it is too late and you would call him to no purpose. Considering everything, you must bow to the decrees of Providence and let her die. The harm is done, and I know no remedy for it."

"We must at least think of her salvation and call a priest."

"A priest is certain to be ignorant and, wanting to appear the opposite, will tell everything. No priest, Madame; you shall have him sent for when she is dead; you will give him something to drink, and he, far from thinking that you could have poisoned her, will be concerned only to soothe your tears."

"Then must we let her die?"

"No. We must leave her to nature."

"If she dies I will send a messenger to the Abbess, who will send me another lay sister."

"And you will gain at least a week; and meanwhile you will perhaps bear your child; so you see that your happiness may depend on this misfortune. Do not weep, Madame; let us bow to the will of God; permit the peasant woman to come here, for I must impress the importance of silence on her and the absolute need for the utmost prudence in the matter, which may be the ruin of us all, for if it were discovered that I came here I should be thought the poisoner."

Summoned, the peasant woman comes up, and she understands everything. She realizes her own danger and promises me that she will not go for the priest until she sees that the lay sister is dead. I make her accept ten louis, to use as she sees best in the atrocious situation in which we all found ourselves. Seeing herself rich, she kisses my hands, she weeps, she kneels and promises to do whatever I tell her. She goes downstairs again.

The nun, sinking into somber reflections, weeps all the more; and, considering herself guilty of the murder, she thinks she sees Hell open, anguish chokes her, and she falls in a faint at the other end of the sack. Not knowing what to do for her, I run to the stairs and call the peasant woman, who comes up, then goes down again for vinegar. Having no alcoholic essence, I raise her veil and put a pinch of errhine into her nose, and I laugh, remembering how seasonably I had given a pinch of it to Madame . . . at Soleure.[13] The peasant woman comes back with vinegar, and, the errhine beginning to act, the nun sneezes; but I am as if petrified when, turning, she lets me see her face. I see M. M.'s, and such a perfect likeness that I cannot think I am deceived. I stand there motionless, letting the woman take off her coif to rub her temples with the vinegar she has brought. What recalls me from my amazement is her black hair and, a moment later, her eyes of the same color, which the strong sternutative had made her open. I am then convinced that she is not M. M., whose eyes were blue, but I fall madly in love with her. I take her in my arms, and the woman, seeing that she has revived, departs. I cover her with kisses, and she cannot defend herself because of her sneezing. She begs me in Jesus' name to respect her and let her put on her veil again, saying that otherwise she will incur excommunication, but her fear of excommunication at such a moment makes me laugh. She assures me that the Abbess had threatened her with it if she let a man see her.

I then left her to the peasant woman's ministrations, fearing that the effort of sneezing might bring on her delivery. I promised to see her again the next day at the same hour, and she implored me not to abandon her.

Such as I am, it was impossible for me to abandon her; but it was no longer to my credit; I had fallen in love with this new, black-eyed M. M. I was determined to do everything for her, and certainly not to let her go back to the convent in her condition. I felt that in saving her I was carrying out a command from God. God had willed that I should take her for M. M. God had made me win a great deal of money. God had provided Madame Z so that the curious could not guess the real reason for my deferred departure. What have I not attributed to God in the course of my life! Yet the rabble of philosophers have always accused me of atheism.

The next morning about eight o'clock I found Madame Z in bed and still asleep. Her chambermaid asked me to go in on tiptoe, and shut the door. Twenty years had passed since a Venetian woman whose sleep I had respected had laughed at me when she woke and would have nothing more to do with me. Madame Z tried to pretend she was a very sound sleeper, but she had to show me unmistakable signs of life when she felt too filled with it herself, and laughter succeeded the act. She said that her husband had gone to Geneva to buy her a repeating watch[14] and that he would not be back until the next day.

"You can," she said, "spend the night with me."

"Night, Madame, is for sleep. If you are not expecting anyone I will spend the whole morning with you."

"Very well. No one will come here."

She then put my hair in a cap of her husband's, and we were instantly in each other's arms. I found her as amorous as I could wish, and she was convinced that I was her match in every respect. We spent four splendid hours, often cheating each other but only to give us something to laugh at. After the last combat she asked me, in recompense for her love, to spend three more days at Aix.

"I promise, my beautiful Z, to remain here as long as you will give me such proofs of friendship as you have given me this morning."

"Then let us get up and go downstairs for dinner."

"Downstairs? If you could see your eyes!"

"Let them guess. The two Countesses will die of mortification. I want everyone to be certain that you are staying on only for my sake."

"I am not worth the trouble, my angel, but I will be glad to oblige you, even if I lose all my money in these three days."

"I should be sorry for that; but if you do not punt you will not lose, even though you let the ladies rob you."

"Believe me, I let myself be robbed only by ladies. You, too, took me for some parolis de campagne." [15]

"True, but not as often as the Countesses; and I regret it, for they may think you love them. After you left, the Marquis de Saint-Maurice said you should never have offered to let the Englishman withdraw on eight cards, for if he had won he might have thought you knew it."

"Tell Monsieur de Saint-Maurice that a man of honor is incapable of harboring such a suspicion, and that in any case, since I knew the young nobleman's character, I was morally certain that he would not accept my offer."

When we went down to dinner everyone applauded. The beautiful Z acted as if I were at her beck and call, and I assumed the utmost modesty. After dinner no one dared invite me to make a bank; they were all out of money. They got up a game of trente et quarante,[16] which went on all day. I lost only some twenty louis. Toward dusk I slipped away, and, after going up to tell Leduc that he was never to leave my room while I was in Aix, I started toward the house where the unfortunate nun must be impatient to see me appear; but despite the darkness I think I see that I am being followed. I stop, the people behind me overtake me and go on. Two minutes later I start off again, and I see the same pair, whom I would never have overtaken if they had not slowed their pace. Since it could still be natural, I leave the road, though not so as to lose my way, sure that I can return to it when I no longer have reason to think I am followed. But my suspicion becomes certainty when at some distance I see two phantoms; I stop under a tree and fire one of my pistols into the air. A minute later, seeing no one, I proceed to the peasant's house, after returning to the fountain to make sure I should not miss the road.

I go up to the usual place, and by the light of two candles on a small table I see the nun in bed.

"Are you ill, Madame?"

"I am well, thank God, after giving birth to a boy at two o'clock this morning, whom my kind hostess has taken God knows where. The Holy Virgin has answered my prayers. I had only one violent pain, and a quarter of an hour later I was sneezing again. Tell me if you are a man or an angel, for I fear to sin by worshiping you."

"You give me news which fills me with joy. And your lay sister?"

"She is still breathing, but we have no hope that she can escape death. Her face is distorted. We have committed a great crime."

"God will forgive you. Adore Eternal Providence."

"The peasant woman is sure you are an angel. It is your powder which brought on my confinement. I shall never forget you, even though I do not know who you are."

The woman comes up, and, after congratulating her on ministering so well to the nun in childbed, I again exhort her to make much of the priest she will summon when the lay sister has breathed her last, to prevent him from suspecting the cause of her death. She assures me that all will be well, that no one knew either that the lay sister had been ill or why Madame had stayed in bed. She said that she had herself taken the infant to Annecy, and that she had bought everything which could be needed in her house as things now stood. She said that her brother had gone away the night before and would not be back for a week, and so we had nothing more to fear. I gave her another ten louis, asking her to buy a few pieces of furniture and to have something ready for me to eat the next day; she said she still had a good deal of money, but when she heard me reply that all the money she had left was for her I thought she would go mad with gratitude. Seeing that my presence embarrassed the new mother, I left, promising that I would come to see her the next day.

I could not wait to be well out of this perilous situation, but I could not cry victory until the lay sister was buried. I trembled, for the priest, unless he was an idiot, must see beyond doubt that the dead woman had died from poison.

The next morning I found the Chevalier Z in his room with his wife, both engaged in examining the handsome watch he had bought for her. He congratulated her in my presence on having been able to keep me in Aix. He was one of those men who would rather be known as a cuckold than as a fool. I left him in order to accompany his wife to the waters, and on the way she told me she would be alone the next morning and that she would not again be curious about my eight o'clock walk.

"So it was you who had me followed?"

"Yes, I, just as a joke, for there are nothing but mountains in that direction; but I did not think you were so ill-natured. Luckily your shot missed."

"My dear, I fired into the air, for fear is enough to teach curiosity a lesson."

"So they won't follow you another time."

"And if they do, I may let them, for my walk is innocent. I am always back in my room by ten o'clock."

We were still at table when we saw a berlin drawn by six horses arrive, bringing the Marquis de Prié, a Chevalier of the Order of St. Louis,[17] and two charming ladies, one of whom, Madame Z told me, was the Marquis's mistress. Four places are immediately laid, everyone sits down again, and while waiting to be served the Marquis is told the whole story of the bank I had made and the arrival of the Englishmen. The Marquis congratulates me, saying he would never have expected to find me still at Aix, and Madame Z says that I would have left if she had not prevented me. Accustomed to her tactlessness, I admit it. He says he will make a small bank for me after dinner, and I answer that I will play against it. He made it a hundred louis, and I played, losing that amount in two deals, after which I rose and went to my room to answer several letters. At nightfall I went to see the nun.

"The lay sister is dead, Monsieur; she will be buried tomorrow, the day we were to return to our convent. Here is the letter I am writing the Abbess. She will send me another lay sister, unless she orders me to return to the convent with this peasant woman."

"What did the priest say?"

"He said she died of a lethargy arising from her brain which had liquefied, which must have brought on an apoplectic stroke. I would like to have fifteen masses said for her—may I?"

"You shall do as you wish."

I at once instructed the peasant woman to have them said at Annecy and to tell the priest only that he was to offer them according to the intention of the person who sent him the payment for them. She promised she would do so. She said that the dead woman was hideous, and that she had put two guards to watch her so that the witches would not come in the form of cats and steal one of her limbs.

"Tell me from whom you bought the laudanum."

"The woman who sold it to me is a very respectable midwife. We needed it to put poor Madame to sleep when the birth pangs took her."

"When you left the child at the hospital did anyone recognize you?"

"Have no fear. I put it in the wheel [18] when nobody saw me, with a note saying that it had not been baptized. The burial costs six francs, which the priest will be glad to pay, for, God forgive her, we found two louis on her. Madame said to let the priest keep the rest to say masses for her."

"Couldn't she have two louis with a clear conscience?"

"Madame says not."

She then told me that they had only two Savoyan soldi[19] a day, and that they could not have a copper without the Abbess's knowledge, on pain of excommunication.

"But now," she said, "I live like a princess, as you shall see at supper. Though this good woman knows that the money you gave her is hers, she keeps lavishing it on me. I can't stop her."

At that I encourage her to spend, giving her another ten louis. She said that she would buy some cows, and that I had made the fortune of her house.

Left alone with her, and her charming face, which reminded me only too much of M. M.'s, making me ardent, I talked to her about her seducer, saying that I was astonished he had not given her the help she needed in the cruel situation to which he had brought her. She replied that she could not have accepted even the smallest sum of money because of her vows of poverty and obedience, and that she would give the Abbess a louis she had left from the charity the Bishop had procured for her, and that as for her forsaken condition at the fatal moment when she had met me, she could only conclude that he had certainly not received her letter.

"Is he rich and handsome?"

"Rich, but extremely ugly, a hunchback and fifty years old."

"Then how could you fall in love with him?"

"I was not in love. He roused my pity. He wanted to kill himself. I was afraid. I went to the garden on the night he swore he would be there, only to beg him to leave it; and he left, but after having satisfied his wanton desire."

"So he forced you?"

"No, he could not have done that. He wept, and he begged me so hard that I let him on condition that he would not come to the garden again."

"Weren't you afraid of becoming pregnant?"

"I don't understand it at all, since I have always believed that for a girl to become pregnant she had to do it with a man at least three times."

"Unlucky ignorance! So he did not keep asking you for further meetings in the garden?"

"I refused, because our confessor made me promise, if I wanted absolution, that I would not see him again."

"Did you tell your confessor who your seducer was?"

"Of course not. That would have been to commit another sin."

"Did you tell your confessor that you were pregnant?"

"Not that either, but he must have supposed it. He is a saint, who may have prayed to God for me; and my meeting you is perhaps the fruit of his prayers."

I remained silent for a quarter of an hour, absorbed in deep reflection. All the girl's misfortunes had come from her candor, her innocence, and a mistaken feeling of pity which led her to grant a monster who was in love with her something which she regarded very lightly because she had never been in love. She was religious, but, her religion being merely a habit, it was very weak. With her, religion was a matter of calculation. She loathed sin because she had to purge herself of it by confession on pain of eternal damnation, and she did not want to be damned. She had plenty of common sense, and too little intelligence because she had never been taught by experience. Considering all this, I foresaw that she would be very reluctant to grant me what she had freely given to Monsieur de Cou. . . ; she had repented too sorely to run the same risk with another man.

The peasant woman came up, laid two places on a small table, and brought us supper. Everything was new—linen, plates, glasses, knives, spoons—and everything very clean. The wines were very good and the dishes exquisite because nothing was elaborate. Game, roast, delicious fish, and excellent cheeses. I spent an hour and a half eating, drinking, and talking. The nun ate almost nothing, but that did not keep me from emptying two bottles. I was on fire. The peasant woman, delighted with my praise, promises me the same sort of fare every night, she clears everything away, and goes downstairs. Again alone with a woman whose face was an enchantment and who filled me with desires which, after the appetizing supper, I could not restrain, I talk to her of her health and of the discomfort from which she must be suffering after childbirth. She said that she felt perfectly well and that she could go to Chambéry on foot.

"The only thing," she said, "which troubles me a little is my breasts; but the peasant woman assures me that by day after tomorrow the milk will recede and they will return to their natural condition."

"Will you allow me to examine them?"

"Look."

Naked in her bed, she pulls down her shift, and, thinking she is only being obedient and polite, even afraid that she is committing the sin of pride or is wronging me by supposing that my thoughts are anything but decent, she lets me look at the whole of her charming bosom and touch it all over and all round. Taking care not to alarm her candor, I control myself, I ask her without any show of excitement how she feels a little lower down, and, as I put the question, I extend one hand, but she stops it from reaching its goal, saying that she still feels a little uncomfortable. I beg her pardon; I tell her I hope to find her perfectly well the next day; I say that the beauty of her bosom only increases the interest she has inspired in me, and I give her a tender kiss, which she thinks it her duty to meet with one of her own. I feel carried away, and, convinced that I must either risk losing all her confidence or go at once, I leave her, calling her by the sweet name of "my dear daughter."

I arrived at my inn soaking wet, for it was raining. The next morning I rose late. I put in my pocket the two portraits I had of M. M. in her habit and stark naked, intending to astonish the nun. I went to Madame Z's room, and, not finding her there, went on to the fountain, where she reproached me. After dinner the Marquis de Prié made the bank; however, finding only a hundred louis in it, I saw that he hoped to win much but was willing to risk only a little. Nevertheless I took a hundred louis from my purse. He said that, if I wanted amusement, I should not stake on only one card. I replied that I would put a louis on each of the thirteen. He laughed and said I would lose.

But as it turned out, in less than three hours I won eighty louis. At every deal I won a quinze et le va and sometimes two. I left, as I did every day, at nightfall, and I found the invalid charming. She said she had a slight fever which, according to the peasant woman, she was bound to have, and that she would be well the next day and would get up. When I put out my hand to raise her coverlet she kissed it, saying that she was very glad to give me that token of her daughterly fondness. She was twenty-one years of age and I thirty-five. My affection for her was much stronger than a father's. I said that the confidence she showed me by receiving me undressed in her bed increased the fatherly fondness I felt for her, and that she would see me melancholy if on the next day I found her wearing her habit.

"Then you will find me in bed," she replied, "and willingly, for in the hot weather we are having my woolen habit stifles me. I thought that being all dressed, as decency demands, I might please you better; but I am content if you do not mind."

The peasant woman came up and gave her a letter from the Abbess which her nephew had that moment brought for her from Chambéry. She told her that she would send her two lay sisters who would bring her back to the convent and that, since she had recovered her health, she could make the short journey on foot and thus save the money for a better use; but she added that since the Bishop was in the country and she needed his permission the lay sisters could not set out for a week or ten days. She ordered her, on pain of excommunication, never to leave her room in the meanwhile and to speak to no man, not even to the owner of the house in which she was staying, who must have a wife. She ended by saying that she would have a mass sung for the repose of the deceased lay sister's soul.

The peasant woman asked me to face the window, since Madame needed to do something. After that I sat down close beside her on her bed again.

"Tell me, Madame," I said, "if during this week or ten days I may come to pay you my respects without offending your conscience, for I am a man. I have stayed here only for you, who have inspired the greatest interest in me; but if you are reluctant to receive me because of this strange excommunication, speak, and I will leave tomorrow."

"Monsieur, it is an excommunication which I have already incurred; but I hope that God will not confirm it, since instead of making me wretched it has made me happy, and I tell you frankly that your visits are now the joy of my life, and I consider myself doubly happy if you like coming to see me. But I wish you to tell me, if you can do so without indiscretion, for whom you took me the first time you came to me in the dark, for you cannot imagine my surprise nor the fear I felt. I had no notion of kisses like those with which you covered my face, but which could not make my excommunication worse because I did not consent to them; and you have told me yourself that you thought you were giving them to another woman."

"Madame, I will satisfy your curiosity. I can do so now I know you are aware that we are human, that the flesh is weak, and that it drives the strongest souls to commit sins despite reason. You shall now hear all the vicissitudes which marked the two years of a love affair with the most beautiful and most intelligent, if not the most prudent, of all the nuns in my country."

"Monsieur, tell me all; having fallen into the same fault, I should be unjust and inhuman if I were scandalized by any detail, for you certainly could not have done more with the nun than Cou. . . did with me."

"No, Madame. I was lucky. I did not give her a child; but if I had I would have carried her off and taken her to Rome where the Holy Father, seeing us at his feet, would have released her from her vows; and my dear M. M. would now be my wife."

"Good God! M. M. is my name."

This coincidence, which was really nothing, amazed us both. Strange, fickle chance, which nevertheless acts powerfully on predisposed minds and produces important consequences! After remaining silent for a few minutes I told her all that had befallen me with M. M., concealing nothing. At my vivid descriptions of our amorous combats I saw that she was often excited, and when at the end of my story I heard her ask if she really was so much like her that I took her for M. M., I drew her portrait as a nun from my portfolio and placed it in her hands.

"It is my portrait," she said, "except for the eyes and the eyebrows. It is my habit! It is wonderful. What a combination of circumstances! I owe all my happiness to this likeness. Thank God you do not love me as you loved this dear sister who has my face and even my name. Here are the two M. M.s. Inscrutable Divine Providence! All thy ways are adorable. We are but weak, ignorant, proud mortals."

The peasant woman came to serve us a supper even more appetizing than the one of the previous evening, but the invalid ate only a bowl of soup. She promised me she would sup heartily the next night.

An hour which I spent with her after the peasant woman had cleared away made her certain that I felt for her only a father's fondness. Of her own free will she showed me her bosom, which had not yet returned to its normal state, and let me touch it all over, never even thinking that it could arouse the slightest emotion in me, and she took all the kisses which I bestowed on her beautiful lips and her beautiful eyes for demonstrations of the most innocent friendship. She laughed and said she thanked God her eyes were not blue. When I reached the point at which I could no longer control myself I left her and went back to my room to go to bed. Leduc gave me a note from Madame Z in which she said we would see each other at the fountain because she had been invited to breakfast with the Marquis's mistress.

At the fountain she told me that the whole company maintained that, staking on thirteen cards, I was bound to lose, for it was false that in each deal there was a card which won four times, but that the Marquis had said that, even so, he would no longer allow me to stake in that way and that his mistress had undertaken to make me play as usual. I thanked her.

Back at my inn I lost fifty louis playing quinze with the Marquis before dinner, and afterward I let myself be persuaded to make a bank. So I went to my room for five hundred louis; then I install myself at the big table, prepared to defy Fortune. I took Desarmoises as my croupier, announcing that I would honor only cards on which money had been placed, and that I would stop at half past seven o'clock. As it happens, I am seated between the two most beautiful of the ladies, and in addition to the five hundred louis which I take from my purse I call for a hundred écus de six francs to amuse the ladies. But now for what happened.

Seeing only opened packs of cards before me, I demand fresh ones. The major-domo tells me he has sent a man to Chambéry to buy a hundred packs and that he must be back soon.

"Meanwhile," he says, "you can deal with these packs. They are as good as new."

"I don't want them as good as new, but new. I have principles, my friend, which all Hell cannot make me abandon. While I wait for your man I will simply look on. I am sorry I must wait to offer my services to these beautiful ladies."

No one dared say a word to me. I left my seat and gathered up my money. The Marquis de Prié made the bank, and played in a way to do him credit. I remained beside Madame Z, who made me her partner and the next day gave me five or six louis. The man who was to come back from Chambéry did not arrive until midnight. I considered I had escaped by the skin of my teeth, for in that part of the world there are people with amazingly sharp eyes. I went and put my money back in my strongbox, then went to see the nun, who was in bed.

"How are you, Madame?"

"Say 'my daughter,' for I wish you were my father so that I could embrace you without any fear."

"Well then, my dear daughter, fear nothing and open your arms to me."

"Yes, let us embrace."

"My infants are prettier than they were yesterday. Let them feed me."

"What madness! Dear Papa, I believe you are drinking your poor daughter's milk."

"It is sweet, my dear friend, and the little I have swallowed is balm to my soul. You cannot be sorry you have granted me this pleasure, for nothing is more innocent."

"No, of course I'm not sorry, for you gave me pleasure too. Instead of calling you Papa I'll call you my baby."

"How I love the good humor I find you in tonight!"

"It's because you have made me happy. I have no more fears. Peace has returned to my soul. The peasant woman told me that in a few days I'll be just as I was before I knew Cou. . . ."

"Not quite, my angel, for your belly, for example—"

"Be still. There's nothing to tell by, I'm amazed myself."

"Let me look."

"Oh, no, please, please! But you may touch it. Is it true?"

"Quite true."

"Oh, my friend! Don't touch that."

"Why not? You can't be different from my old M. M., who cannot be more than thirty now. I will show you a full-length portrait of her, she is stark naked."

"Have you it here? I'd like to see it."

I thereupon take it from my portfolio, and I see that she is in raptures. She kisses it. She asks me if it was all painted from nature, and she sees her own likeness more strikingly in the portrait of my M. M. nude than in the one where she had on her habit.

"But," she said, "it was you who ordered the painter to give her such long hair."

"Certainly not. In our country nuns are only obliged not to let men see their long hair."

"In our country too. They cut it, and then we let it grow again."

"Then you have long hair?"

"As long as hers; but you won't like it because it is black."

"What are you saying? I prefer dark hair to blond. In God's name, let me see it."

"You ask me in God's name to commit a sin, for I incur another excommunication; but I can refuse you nothing. I will show it to you after supper, for I don't want to scandalize the peasant woman."

"You are right. I think you are the most lovable of all beings, and I shall die of grief when you leave this happy cottage to return to your prison."

"I must go there to do penance for all my sins."

How happy I was! I felt sure that I would obtain everything after supper. When the woman appeared I gave her another ten louis. From her amazement I saw that she might think I was out of my mind. I told her I was very rich and that I wanted to convince her I did not think myself rich enough to reward her properly for her motherly care of the nun. She wept for gratitude. She gave us an exquisite supper, at which the invalid thought she could be guided by her appetite; but my state of contentment prevented me from following her example; I could not wait to see the beautiful black hair of this victim of her own goodness of heart. At that moment it was this appetite which dominated me and which left no room for another.

As soon as the woman left us alone together, she took off her coif, and at that I really believed I was seeing M. M. with black hair. She amused herself making it fall over her shoulders like the hair in the portrait I showed her, and she enjoyed hearing me say what was incontestable truth: the contrast provided by her hair and her black eyes made her appear whiter than M. M. It was not true. They were two whites which were equally dazzling but which differed in their tint; it was a difference perceptible only to the eyes of a lover. However, the living object triumphed over the painted image.

"You are whiter," I said, "more beautiful, and more dazzling because of the contrast between black and white; but I think my first M. M. was more loving."

"She may have been so, but not more tender-hearted."

"Her amorous desires must have been more intense than yours."

"I can believe it, for I have never loved."

"That is surprising. But nature and the impulse of the senses—"

"That is an inclination, my dear friend, which we easily satisfy in the convent; we accuse ourselves to our confessor, for we know it is a sin; but he treats it as childish trifling, for he absolves us without giving us any penance; he is a wise old priest, learned and austere in his life; we shall be very sorry when he dies."

"But when you are dallying with another nun like yourself do you not feel that you would love her better if at that moment she could become a man?"

"You make me laugh. It is true that if my little friend became a man I should not be sorry; but you may be sure that we really do not spend our time hoping for such a miracle."

"It can only be because of a lack in your temperament. M. M. was your superior in that way; she preferred me to C. C.; but you would not prefer me to your little friend at the convent."

"Certainly not, for with you I should be breaking my vow, and I should risk consequences which even now make me tremble every time I think of them."

"Then you do not love me?"

"How dare you say that! I love you so much that I am sorry you are not a woman."

"I love you too, but your wish makes me laugh. I would not become a woman to please you, and the more so because, as a woman, I am sure I should not think you so beautiful. Sit up, my accommodating friend, and let me see how your beautiful hair covers half of your beautiful body."

"Gladly. Must I take down my shift?"

"Of course. How beautiful you are! Let me suck the last sweet drops of your milk."

After granting me this delight, gazing at me with a look of the most perfect willingness and letting me clasp her in my arms, unaware, or pretending to be unaware, of the intensity of the pleasure I must be feeling, she said that if friendship was permitted such satisfactions it was preferable to love, for never in her life had her soul known a purer joy than I had given her by clinging to her breasts, as I had done.

"Let me," she said, "do the same to you."

"Here I am, my angel, but I have nothing there."

"Never mind. We'll do it for fun."

After she had satisfied herself we spent a quarter of an hour exchanging kisses. I could bear no more.

"Tell me the truth," I said. "In the fury of these kisses, in these transports which we are pleased to call childish, do you not feel a much greater desire?"

"I will confess that I feel it, but it is sinful; and certain as I am that you feel it too, we must end this dangerous trifling. Our friendship, my dear baby, has become love. Has it not?"

"Yes, love, and love which cannot be conquered. Let us yield to it."

"On the contrary, my dear friend, let us stop now. In future let us be prudent and not again risk becoming its victims. If you love me, you must think as I do."

So saying, she gathered up her hair, and, after putting it under her cap, I helped her to pull up her shift, the coarse linen of which struck me as unworthy of her soft skin; I told her so, and she replied that she was used to it, so it did not hurt her at all. My soul was in the greatest consternation, for the pain my restraint caused me seemed infinitely greater than the pleasure I should have gained from complete fruition; but I had to be certain I should not find the slightest resistance, and I was not certain of it. A folded rose petal spoiled the pleasure of the famous Smindyrides,[20] who loved a soft bed. So I preferred to bear my pain and leave, rather than risk finding the rose petal which troubled the voluptuous Sybarite. I left irretrievably in love. I returned to my lodging at two o'clock in the morning, and I slept until noon.

Leduc gave me a note he should have given me before I went to bed. He had forgotten it. Madame Z said that she would expect me at nine o'clock and would be alone; that she was giving a supper, to which she was sure I would come, and that she would leave afterward; she hoped that I would leave too, or that I would at least accompany her as far as Chambéry.

Though I still loved her, all the three points she made in her letter set me laughing. It was too late for me to breakfast with her. I could not accept her invitation to supper because of my nun, whom at that moment I would not have left for the greatest conquest; nor could I undertake to accompany her as far as Chambéry, for it might well happen that I could not leave M. M.

I found her in her room a minute before she went down to dinner. She was furious. She had expected me for breakfast. I told her I had received her note an hour earlier; and she went down without giving me time to tell her I could not promise either to sup with her or to have the honor of escorting her to Chambéry. At table she was sulky with me, and after dinner the Marquis de Prié told me he had new cards and that the whole company wanted to see me deal. There were ladies and gentlemen who had arrived from Geneva that morning; I went for money and made them a bank of five hundred louis. At seven o'clock I had lost more than half that amount, but I stopped nevertheless, putting what was left in my pocket. After giving Madame Z a melancholy glance, I went to my room to put away my money, then went to the cottage, where I saw my angel in a big brand-new bed, and a pretty Roman bed[21] for me beside the big one. I laughed at the discrepancy between all this furniture and the dirty garret we were in. Instead of a compliment I gave the peasant woman fifty louis, saying that they were for the rest of the time M. M. would be staying with her, but that she must spend no more on furniture.

Such is, I believe, the character of most gamblers. I should perhaps not have given her such a sum if I had won a thousand louis. I had lost three hundred, and I felt as if I had won the two hundred which were left. I gave her the fifty as if I were paying them on a winning card. I have always loved to spend, but I have never known myself to throw away money except in the course of play. I took the greatest pleasure in giving money which cost me nothing to a person who would set the greatest store by it. My soul was flooded with joy when I saw gratitude and admiration on the noble countenance of my new M. M.

"You must," she said, "be immensely rich."

"Make no mistake. I love you very passionately, that is all. Unable to give you anything directly because of your vow, I lavish what I possess on this good woman so that she will have more and more reason to make you happy during the few days you are yet to stay in her house. But by indirection it will, I hope, make you love me more and more."

"I cannot love you more. I am never unhappy now except when I remember that I must return to the convent."

"You told me yesterday that the thought made you happy."

"And it is just since yesterday that I have become a different woman. I spent a most dreadful night. I could never fall asleep without finding myself in your arms, always waking with a start just as I was about to commit the greatest of sins."

"You did not struggle so hard before committing it with a man whom you did not love."

"That is true, but it is precisely because I was not in love with him that I did not think I was committing a sin. Can you understand that, my dear friend?"

"It is a metaphysics conceived by your pure, divine, and innocent soul, and I understand it perfectly."

"Thank you. You fill me with contentment and gratitude. I rejoice when I think that you are not in a state of mind like mine. I am now sure that I shall gain the victory."

"I will not oppose you, though it distresses me."

"Why?"

"Because you will believe you must refuse me caresses which, though of no consequence, made my life happy."

"I have thought of that."

"You are crying?"

"Yes, and what is more, I love these tears. I have two favors I must ask of you."

"Ask, and be sure they will be granted."

CHAPTER I

Conclusion of my adventure with the nun from Chambéry. My flight from Aix.

"YESTERDAY," SHE said, "you left with me two portraits of my Venetian sister M. M. I beg you to make me a present of them."

"They are yours."

"I thank you. So much for that. The second favor I ask of you is to accept my portrait; such as it is, I will give it to you tomorrow."

"It will be, my dear friend, the most cherished of all my jewels; but I am surprised that you ask it of me as a favor, when in fact you are doing me one which I should never have dared ask of you. What can I possibly do to deserve your wanting my portrait?"

"Ah, my dear friend! It would be very precious to me; but God preserve me from having it at the convent."

"I will have myself painted in the dress of St. Aloysius Gonzaga,[1] or of St. Anthony of Padua."[2]

"It would damn me."

To my surprise she was wearing a dimity corset with pink ribbons and a cambric shift, on which, though politeness did not permit me to ask where they came from, I kept my eyes; but easily guessing my thought, she laughed and said they were a present the peasant woman had given her because she was fond of lying in bed.

"Finding herself rich," she said, "she tries to think of every way to convince her benefactor that she is grateful to him. Look at this great bed; she was certainly thinking of you; look at the fine sheets. This very fine shift, I must admit, pleases me. I shall sleep the better tonight, provided I can defend myself against the seductive dreams which set my soul on fire last night."

"Do you think this bed, these sheets, and such a shift can deliver your soul from the dreams which you fear?"

"On the contrary. Softness excites the senses to voluptuousness. I will leave her all these things, for what would they say at the convent if they saw me bedded in this fashion? But you seem sad. You were so gay last night."

"How could I be gay when I see myself constrained not to fondle you again because I am sure to give you pain?"

"Say instead 'sure to give me too much pleasure.'"

"Then consent to feel pleasure for the sake of the pleasure it lies with you to give me."

"But your pleasure is innocent, and mine is sinful."

"What would you do if mine were as sinful as yours?"

"You would have made me unhappy last evening, for I could have refused you nothing."

"Unhappy? Consider that you would not have had to fight against dreams and would have slept perfectly well. In short, by giving you this corset the peasant woman has given you a present which will make me unhappy all my life; for I should at least have seen my infants without fearing bad dreams."

"But you cannot be angry with the peasant woman on that account, for if she believes we love each other she must also know that nothing is easier than to unlace a corset. My dear friend, I do not want to see you sad. That is all that matters."

As she uttered these words her beautiful face became red as fire, and she let me cover it with kisses. The peasant woman came up to set a pretty, brand-new table, just as I was about to unlace her without seeing even a shadow of resistance on her face.

This favorable omen put me in a good humor; but, for her part, I saw M. M. become pensive. I took good care not to ask the reason, for I knew it, and I did not want to come to conditions which religion and honor would have made inviolable. I stimulated her appetite by setting her the example of mine, and she drank claret with as much relish as I did, untroubled by any apprehension that, not being accustomed to it, she might find it rousing her to a gaiety which is the inveterate enemy of continence, though favorable to the other virtues. She could not be aware of this, for her gaiety itself, by increasing the brilliance of her reason, made her think it all the more admirable and more firmly attached to pure sentiment than before supper.

As soon as we were alone I congratulated her on her high spirits, assuring her that it was all I needed to rid me of gloom and to make me pass whole hours with her as if they were minutes.

"Only be generous, my dear friend, of the same gifts you gave me last evening."

"I would rather damn myself, my dear friend, and die a hundred times, than risk seeming ungrateful to you. There."

With that, she pulled off her cap, let her hair fall, took off her corset, and, drawing her arms out of her shift, displayed herself to my amorous eyes even as we see the sirens in Correggio's[3] most beautiful canvas. But when

I saw her move over to make room for me, I understood that it was time to reason no more and that love demanded I should seize the moment.

I flung myself beside her rather than on her, and, clasping her in my arms, I pressed my lips to hers. A moment later she turned her head aside, and, since she closed her eyes, I thought she was going to sleep, so I moved a little away from her to contemplate the incalculable riches which fortune and love were offering me and of which I was to take possession. M. M. was asleep; she could not be pretending, she was asleep. But even if she had been pretending, could I hold her ruse against her? Be it real or feigned, her sleep tells the intelligent lover of an adored object that he is unworthy to enjoy her the moment he begins to wonder if he may or may not take advantage of it. If it is real, he risks nothing; if it is feigned, can he accord her a more inadequate or more dishonorable return than to doubt of her consent? But M. M. was incapable of feigning. The poppies of Morpheus made her face radiant. She muttered words which I could not understand; she was dreaming.

I decide to undress, though whether to court a sleep like hers, or to calm my ardor by taking possession of her, I do not know.

Having lain down beside her, I do not fear to wake her by clasping her in my arms; the movement she made to meet mine convinced me that she was continuing her dream, and that whatever I might do could only help to make it real. I finish drawing off her delicate shift, and she stirs like an infant which, feeling itself unswaddled, takes a deep breath. I consummated the sweet crime in her and with her; but before the climax she opened her beautiful eyes.

"Oh, God," she cried in a dying voice, "so it is true!"

After uttering these words she put her mouth against mine to receive my soul, giving me hers. But for that happy exchange we should both have perished. Four or five hours later, waking in the same position and seeing the faint light of dawn mingling with the pale light from the unsnuffed candles, we tranquilly and contentedly learned from each other all the links in our sweet story.

"But we will talk about it more this evening," she said; "let us dress quickly. We love each other, and we have crowned our love. I am freed at last from all my anxieties. We have followed our destiny, obeying the commands of imperious nature. Do you still love me?"

"Can you doubt it? I will answer you this evening."

I dressed again very quickly, and I left her in bed. I saw her laugh when she went to look for her shift, which she did not remember having taken off.

I reached my lodging in broad daylight. Leduc, who had not gone to bed, gave me a letter from Madame Z[4] which he had received at eleven o'clock. I had missed her supper and the honor of escorting her to Chambéry; but I had not even remembered either engagement. I was sorry, but I did not know what to do about it. I open her letter and see only six lines; but they said a great deal. She advised me never to go to Turin, for there she would find means to avenge herself for the cutting affront I had put on her. She reproached me for having publicly shown contempt for her by not going to her supper, saying that it dishonored her.

There was no possibility of my going there. I tore up her letter, I had my hair dressed, and I went to the fountain.

Everyone begins by chiding me for not having appeared at Madame Z's supper; in my defense I allege my regimen, which did not allow me to sup; but they laugh at me and say that all is known, and the Marquis's[5] mistress, taking my arm, tells me in so many words that I have the reputation of being fickle; politeness demands my replying that I do not have that base fault, but that in any case no one could reproach me with it if I had the honor of serving a lady like herself; my compliment flatters her; and I at once repent of having paid it when, in the most gracious way, she asks me why I do not come to breakfast at the Marquis's sometimes. I reply that I supposed he had things to do; she answers that he has not and that he would consider it a pleasure, and she ends by making me promise to go there the next morning, saying, as if in passing, that he always breakfasted in her room.

The woman was the widow of a man of rank, fairly young, indubitably pretty, and perfectly versed in all the chatter of the wits; but she did not appeal to me. Having just had Madame Z, and having crowned my desires with the nun, I was not able at the time to think even passingly of a new object. Yet I had to pretend I considered myself very fortunate in the lady's giving me the preference over anyone else. She asked the Marquis if she might go back to the inn, and he answered that he had business to finish with the person with whom he was talking, and that I might escort her. On the way she said that if Madame Z had not left she would not have dared to take my arm. I could answer only equivocally, for I had absolutely no wish to enter into a relationship with her. Nevertheless I had to see her upstairs to her room, where I had to sit down and where, since I had slept very little during the previous night, I found myself yawning. I asked her a thousand pardons, swearing that I was ill; and she believed it. Indeed, I should have gone to sleep if I had not put a little errhine under my nose; by making me sneeze it forced me to stay awake.

The Marquis arrived and, saying that he was pleased to find me still with her, proposed a game of quinze. I asked him to excuse me, and Madame said with a laugh that if I went on sneezing so hard I really could not play. We went down to dinner, and I let them persuade me to make the bank, all the more easily because my losses of the night before still rankled.

I made it, as always, of five hundred louis, and about seven o'clock I announced the last deal to the company, despite the fact that my bank was diminished by two thirds. But the Marquis and two other heavy players having undertaken to break me, Fortune favored me to such effect that in the end I had recouped and was the winner by two or three hundred louis. I left, promising the company that I would make the same bank the next day. All the ladies had won, because Desarmoises[6] had orders to let them play as they pleased so long as he saw that their stakes were not high. After going to put my money away in my room and telling Leduc that I would spend the night elsewhere, I arrived at my new idol's lodging, soaked to the skin by a heavy rain which caught me halfway there.

I found my love dressed as a nun and lying on the Roman couch. When the peasant woman had left, after drying me as well as she could, I asked M. M. why she had not waited for me in bed.

"I never felt better, my dear friend, except for a slight discomfort which, according to what my midwife says, will remain with me for another five weeks. So I got up to have supper at the table. If you wish, we will go to bed afterward."

"But I hope you will wish it too."

"Alas, I am lost! I believe I shall die when the time arrives for me to leave you."

"Come with me to Rome, and leave everything to me. You will become my wife. We will make each other happy until death."

"I could never bring myself to that, and I beg you not to speak of it again."

Since I was certain that I should spend the night with her, we passed an hour in pleasant talk. At the end of our supper the peasant woman brought her a package and wished us good night. I asked her what the package contained, and she said that it was the present she had promised me, her portrait to the life, but that I was not to see it until she had gone to bed. Being both curious and impatient to see it, I said that it was a foolish whim, and she said that I would approve of it.

I insisted on undressing her myself and taking off her cap; and when she was in bed she opened the package and handed me a piece of parchment, on which I saw a very good likeness of her, stark naked and in the same pose as M. M. in the portrait which I had given her earlier. I praised the skillful painter who had made so good a copy, only changing the color of the eyes and the hair.

"It is not a copy at all," she said, "for he would not have had time. He only made her eyes black, her hair like mine, and her fleece thicker. So you can now say that you have in one portrait the image of the first M. M. and the second, who ought by rights to make you forget the first, who disappeared in the decent portrait too, for there I am dressed as a nun and with black eyes. In such a portrait I can let everyone see me."

"You cannot conceive how dear this gift is to me. Tell me, my angel, how you got your plan so well carried out."

"I told it yesterday to the peasant woman, who said she had a foster son at Annecy who was learning to paint miniatures, but that she would only commission him to take the two miniatures to the most skillful miniature painter in Geneva, who for four or five louis would make the metamorphosis on the spot in two or three hours. I entrusted the two portraits to her, and here they are, executed to perfection. It seems she did not receive them until you saw her bring them to me. Tomorrow morning you can learn more of our little story from her."

"Your peasant is a woman among women, and I must reimburse her. But tell me why you did not want to give me your portrait before you undressed. May I guess the reason?"

"Guess."

"So that I can at once put you in the same pose as that in which you are painted."

"Exactly."

"That charming idea comes from love, but now you must wait for me to undress too."

Both of us thus being in the divine costume of innocence, I placed M. M. as she appeared on the parchment, and she submitted. Divining what I was about to do, she opened her arms; but I told her to wait a moment, for I, too, had something in a package which should be precious to her.

I then take from my portfolio a little jacket of very fine, transparent skin, eight inches long and closed at one end, and which by way of a pouch string at its open end had a narrow pink ribbon. I display it to her, she looks at it, laughs, and says I had used just such jackets with her Venetian sister, and that she was curious about it.

"I will put it on you myself," she said, "and you cannot imagine how glad I am. Tell me why you did not use it last night? I think it impossible that I did not conceive. Alas for me! What shall I do four or five months from now when I can have no doubt of my second pregnancy?"

"My dear friend, we must make up our minds not to think about it, for if the harm is done there is no remedy. But what I can tell you is that experience and deductions from the known laws of nature can lead us to hope that what we did yesterday in the intoxication of our senses will not have the result we fear. It has been said, and indeed written, that one cannot fear it before a certain thing appears which I believe you have not yet seen."

"You are right, it has not."

"So let us dismiss this panic terror, which at the moment can only be fatal to us."

"You console me completely. But, arguing from what you have just said, I do not see why you fear today what did not need to be feared yesterday. I am in the same condition."

"The event, my angel, has often proved the wisest natural scientists wrong, despite their so-called experiential proofs. Nature is wiser than they; let us beware of defying her, and forgive ourselves if we defied her yesterday."

"I love to hear you talk so wisely. So be it. Let us be prudent. There you are, caparisoned by my hands. It is nearly the same thing; but despite the fineness and transparency of the skin, the little fellow pleases me less well in costume. It seems that this covering degrades him, or degrades me—one or the other."

"Both, my angel; but let us at this juncture turn a blind eye to certain speculative ideas which can only spoil our pleasure."

"We will very soon recover it in all its purity; for the moment let me enjoy my reason, to which I have never before in all my life dared to give the reins on this subject; it was Love who invented these little jackets, but he had to ally himself with Precaution; and it seems to me that the alliance must have been displeasing to him, for it belongs only to the dark realm of Policy."

"Alas, that is true! You astonish me. But, my dear friend, we will philosophize afterward."

"Wait another minute; for I have never seen a man, and I have never been so curious to see one as I am now. Ten months ago I should have said that it was the devil who invented these pouches, and today I say that their inventor was not so devilish, for if the hunchback Cou . . . had used one he would not have exposed me to losing my honor and my life. But tell me, I beg you, how the shameless artisans who make these pouches are allowed to live in peace, for they must be known and should be excommunicated a hundred times, or subjected to large fines and corporal punishment if they are Jews, as I believe. Look. The one who made this one for you measured you badly. Here it is too narrow, there too wide; it is almost an arc; it is made for a curved body. What a fool, ignorant of his trade! But what do I see!"

"You make me laugh. It is your fault. Feel, feel. It was bound to happen. I foresaw it."

"You couldn't wait another minute? And you're still at it; I'm sorry, my dear friend; but you are right. O God, what a pity!"

"Oh, there's no great harm done."

"No great harm done? Alas for me! He is dead? You laugh?"

"Let me laugh; for your fear delights me. In a minute you will see the little fellow revived, and so full of life that next time he will not die so easily."

"It is unbelievable."

I take it off, I put it aside, and I offer her another one, which pleases her better for she thinks it will fit me better, and she bursts out laughing when she sees that she can put it on me. M. M. was ignorant of these miracles of nature. Before she knew me, her mind, under strict restraint, had been unable to find its way to truth; no sooner was it free than its own inner elasticity had carried it beyond its barriers with all the swiftness which was its natural endowment, after which it proceeded more slowly. She said that if the jacket should break at its end during the act, the precaution would be useless. I convinced her of the difficulty of such an accident; I informed her that these little pouches were made in England,[7] that one bought them in whatever sizes they happened to come, and I told her where such skins were to be obtained. After all this talk we surrendered to love, then to sleep, then again to love, until it was time for me to go back to my lodging. The peasant woman told me that her foster son had spent only four louis and that she had made him a present of two. I gave her twelve.

I slept until noon, not appearing for breakfast at the Marquis de Prié's, but I sent him word. His mistress was sulky with me all through dinner, but she softened when I let her persuade me to make the bank; however, seeing that she was playing for high stakes, I did not let her go on; after being stopped two or three times she retired to her room; but her lover was winning, and I losing, when the taciturn Duke of Roxburghe arrived from Geneva with Schmit,[8] his tutor, and two other Englishmen. He came to the bank, saying nothing to me except "How do you do, Sir,"[9] and played, urging his two friends to do likewise. After the deal, seeing my bank on its last legs, I sent Leduc to my room to bring me my strongbox, from which I took five rolls of a hundred louis. The Marquis de Prié said coolly that he would be my partner on half shares, and I no less coolly asked him to give me leave not to accept his offer. He continued to punt, taking no offense at my refusal, and when I laid down the cards to end the game, he was ahead by nearly two hundred louis; but most of the others having lost, and especially one of the two Englishmen, I was left with over a thousand louis. The Marquis having asked me to invite him for chocolate in my room the next morning, I replied that it would be an honor. After taking Leduc back to my quarters with my strongbox, I went to my cottage, rather well satisfied with my day's work.

I found my new angel with a look of sadness on her pretty face.

"A nephew of my hostess," she said, "a peasant lad who she assures me is very discreet and who knows a lay sister at my convent, arrived from Chambéry an hour ago and said that the lay sister had told him that day after tomorrow two lay sisters would leave at daybreak to come here and take me back to the convent. That is the whole reason for my sadness and my tears."

"She was not to send them until a week or ten days hence."

"She acted sooner."

"We are unhappy even in our happiness. Make up your mind. Let us go to Rome."

"No. I have lived enough. Let me return to my tomb."

After our supper I told the peasant woman that she must send her nephew to Chambéry with orders to leave there and come back to her the moment the lay sisters set out; traveling quickly, he would reach us at least two hours before they did; I promised my angel I would stay with her until they arrived. I thus dispelled her sorrow; but I left her at midnight in order to be at my lodging in the morning, having promised to give the Marquis breakfast; he came, accompanied by his mistress and by two other ladies with their lovers.

Besides chocolate I gave them everything I could think of which might be supposed appropriate to a so-called breakfast; and after it I ordered Leduc to lock my door and tell everyone I was ill and busy writing in bed, so that I could see no one. I told him that I would be out all day, all night, and all the next day. In conclusion, I ordered him to wait for me until I returned, never leaving my room except when he could not help it. I went to dine with my passion, determined not to leave her until a half hour before the arrival of the lay sisters. When she saw me and heard that I would not leave her until half an hour before the two women the Abbess was sending for her arrived, she trembled with joy. We conceived the idea of not having dinner, supping choicely, and going to bed afterward, not to get up again until the peasant lad came to announce the arrival of the two nuns. We immediately informed the peasant woman, who declared our plan sublime.

We did not find the hours long. Two lovers are never at a loss for things to talk about, since they are themselves the subjects of their discourse. After a very choice supper we spent twelve hours in bed, now making love, now sleeping. The next day after dining we went back to bed, and at four o'clock the peasant woman came up to tell us that the lay sisters would arrive at six. We then took leave of each other in every way of which we were capable, and I sealed our last farewell with my blood. If the first M. M. had seen it, the second was entitled to see it too, and she was terrified, but I easily calmed her. I begged her to keep fifty louis for me, assuring her that I would come for them to her grating before two years had passed, and she was well aware of the reason which prevented her from refusing me the favor. She spent the last quarter of an hour shedding tears, and I held mine back only that they might not increase her grief. After promising the peasant woman that I would see her again the next evening, I returned to my lodging, where I went to bed, only to rise at daybreak and start out on the road to Chambéry. A quarter of a league from Aix I saw my angel, walking slowly, and the two lay sisters, who asked me for alms in God's name. I gave them a louis and wished them a good journey. M. M. did not look at me.

Retracing my steps, I went to the peasant woman's, who told me that M. M. had set out at daybreak, charging her only to tell me that she would expect me at the grating. After giving her nephew all the silver money I had, I went and ordered all my luggage tied onto my coach, and I should have left at once if I had had horses. I return to the inn and go upstairs to the Marquis's room to take my leave. I find his mistress alone. I tell her that I am to leave at two o'clock; she replies that I shall not leave, that I will do her the favor of staying on for two more days. I say that I am greatly flattered by her urgency, but that business of the utmost importance obliges me to leave. Still saying that I must stay, she rises, goes to a large mirror, and unlaces her corset, ostensibly in order to lace it better after readjusting her shift. In the course of the maneuver she shows me two globes capable of making all resistance vain, but I pretend not to see them. I saw a calculated plan, but I was determined to foil it. She puts one foot on the edge of the sofa on which I was sitting, and, on the pretext of fastening a garter below her knee, she lets me see a perfectly turned leg, then, shifting to the other, she gives me a glimpse of beauties which would have conquered me if the Marquis had not arrived. He proposes a game of quinze at small stakes, the lady wants to go halves with me, I feel ashamed to refuse her; she sits down beside me and deals to him. When dinner was announced I stopped, losing forty louis. Madame said she owed me twenty of them. At dessert Leduc announces that my carriage is at the door. I rise, Madame says she owes me twenty louis, she insists on paying them, and she makes me accompany her to her room.

No sooner are we there than she tells me earnestly that if I leave I will dishonor her, for the whole company knows she has undertaken to make me stay. She says she does not think herself a woman to be scorned, she pushes me down on the sofa, and she returns to the charge, again fastening her accursed garters in my sight. Unable to deny seeing what she sees that I see, I praise everything, I touch, I kiss, she lets herself fall on me, and she triumphs when she finds the inevitable sign of my sensibility; kissing me mouth to mouth, she promises to be wholly mine the next day. Not knowing how else to get rid of her, I signify that I will hold her to her promise; and I am just saying that I will have the horses unharnessed when the Marquis comes in. I go downstairs as if intending to come back, hearing him tell me that he will give me my revenge. I do not answer. I walk out of the inn, I get into my carriage, and I leave.

CHAPTER II

The caretaker's daughters. The horoscopes. Mademoiselle Roman.

I STOPPED at Chambéry only to change horses and arrived at Grenoble, where, intending to stay for a week but being poorly lodged, I did not have my trunks untied. At the post I found all the letters I expected, among them one from Madame d'Urfé, containing another addressed to a Lorrainese officer, the Baron de Valenglart.[1] She said that he was a man of learning and that he would introduce me at all the good houses in the town.

I at once go to this officer, who, after reading the letter, offers to do anything for me which lies in his power. He was a pleasant, rather elderly man who fifteen years earlier had been a friend of Madame d'Urfé and, much more intimately, of her daughter the Princess of Estouteville.[2] I begged him to find me a good lodging, for I was very uncomfortable at the inn. After thinking for a little he said that he could arrange for me to lodge in a splendid house outside of the city,[3] from which I should see the Isère.[4] The caretaker was a cook, and for the sake of serving me in that capacity he would lodge me gratis, for, the house being for sale, he was hoping to find someone who would fall in love with it and buy it. It belonged to the widow of some judge whose name I have forgotten. We go to see it; I take an apartment of three rooms, I order him to prepare supper for two, impressing it upon him that I am an epicure, a hearty eater, and not at all stingy. At the same time I ask Monsieur de Valenglart to be so good as to sup with me. The caretaker says that if I am not satisfied I must tell him so; he at once sent a man to the inn with a note from me in which I ordered Leduc to come to my new quarters with all my luggage; and so I am well lodged. On the ground floor I see three charming girls and the caretaker's wife, who curtsy to me. Monsieur de Valenglart takes me to the concert,[5] saying that he will introduce me to everyone. I begged him to introduce me to no one, on the understanding that, when I had seen the ladies, I would tell him which of them had inspired me with a wish to make their acquaintance.

The only one who struck me in the whole large company was a tall young lady of modest demeanor, dark haired, very well built, and dressed very simply. This extremely interesting girl, after giving me a single glance from her beautiful eyes, stubbornly refused to look at me again. My vanity at once made me think that it was only so that I should be at full liberty to study her impeccable beauty. It was on this girl that I instantly set my sights, as if all Europe were only a seraglio provided for my pleasures. I told Valenglart that I wanted to make her acquaintance; he replied that she was discreet, received no one, and was extremely poor.

"Those three qualities increase my interest."

"I assure you there is nothing to be done there."

"That is what I want."

"When we leave the concert I will introduce you to her aunt—there she is."

After doing me that honor he came to supper with me. I thought the caretaker-cook a man of exactly the same pattern as Lebel.[6] He had me served at table by his two daughters, who were as pretty as sweethearts, and I saw Valenglart delighted to see me satisfied; but I saw him put out when he saw fifteen dishes in five courses.

"This fellow," he said, "is making fools of you and me."

"The fellow," I said, "has divined my taste. Did you not find everything excellent?"

"True. But—"

"Fear nothing. I love to spend."

"Then excuse me. I want you to be satisfied."

He gave us exquisite wines and at dessert a ratafia[7] superior to the Turkish visnat[8] which I had drunk in Yusuf Ali's[9] house seventeen years earlier. When he came upstairs at the end of supper I told him in the presence of his daughters that he deserved to be first cook to Louis XV.

"Do as well every day, and even better if you can; but always let me have the account the next morning."

"You are right."

"Please always give me ices too, and put two more lights on the table. What I see there are tallow candles, if I am not mistaken; I do not want to see any more of them. I am a Venetian."[10]

"It is your valet's fault, Monsieur, because he said he was sick and went to bed, but after eating a hearty supper."

"He is an imaginary invalid."

"He asked my wife to make you the chocolate he gave her for tomorrow morning; but I will whip it myself."

Surprised and very pleased, Valenglart said that apparently Madame d'Urfé had been making fun of him when she had instructed him to keep my expenditures in check. We remained at table until eleven o'clock, talking and emptying a bottle of the divine liqueur of Grenoble. It is composed of brandy, sugar, cherries, and cinnamon. I thanked him as I saw him to my carriage, which took him home; I asked him to share my table with me night and morning, and he promised to do so except on the days he would be on guard duty. During supper I gave him my bill of exchange on Zappata,[11] which I endorsed in his presence with the name Seingalt, by which Madame d'Urfé had announced me. He assured me that he would have it negotiated the next day, and he kept his word. At nine o'clock a banker brought me four hundred louis. I had thirteen hundred in my strongbox. I always dreaded being a pinchpenny. I took the greatest pleasure in the thought that Valenglart would write all that he had seen and heard to the avaricious Madame d'Urfé, who had a mania for preaching economy to me. I laughed when, returning to my apartment, I saw the caretaker's two daughters.

Leduc did not wait for me to tell him that he must trump up some excuse for not serving me. He knew that when there were pretty girls in the houses in which I stayed I did not like to see him about.

Seeing the two girls, who appeared to be perfectly virtuous, eagerly serving me with an air of the greatest confidence, I took it into my head to convince them that I deserved it. They removed my shoes and stockings, arranged my hair for the night, and put me into my nightshirt with the greatest decency. When I was in bed I told them to lock my door and to bring me my chocolate at eight o'clock.

I could not refrain from examining myself and finding that I was happy. In perfect health and in the prime of life, with no duties, with no need to look ahead, amply provided with money, dependent upon no one, lucky at cards, and favorably received by the women who interested me, I had every justification for saying to myself: "Saute, Marquis!"[12]

I fell asleep thinking of the young lady who had made so strong an impression on me at the concert. Certain that I would make her acquaintance, I was curious to see what would come of it. She was discreet and poor, and I discreet and rich; so she should not scorn my friendship.

The next morning at eight o'clock I see my door open and one of the caretaker's two daughters bringing me my chocolate, saying that Leduc had been feverish and that her cousin would take him a bowl of broth in bed. I say that my chocolate is very well prepared, I ask her her name, she replies that she is named Rose and her sister Manon, whereupon Manon herself appears with my shirt, which she had ironed. I thank her and tell her she must not go to so much trouble except for shirts with lace. The charming Manon says, blushing, that she dresses her father's hair; and Rose laughs and says she shaves him.

"In that case," I replied, "you will both be so kind as to do the same for me until Leduc recovers."

Curious to see how the girl would shave me, I quickly get up, while she goes to fetch hot water. Manon sets out powder, pomade, and everything she needed on my toilet table. Rose comes back, and acquits herself most skillfully, whereupon I offer her my freshly washed and shaven face for the first salutation of the day—it could not have been cleaner. She does not understand me; I tell her seriously but gently that she will mortify me if she refuses me a kiss. She excuses herself with a sly smile, saying that it is not the custom in Grenoble; I insist, I say she shall not shave me again; her father comes in with the account, he hears the dispute, he says that it is the custom in Paris, that she kissed him after shaving him, and that she should be as polite to me. She thereupon kissed me with an air of sweet submission which made Manon laugh.

"Your turn will come," he told her, "when you have dressed his hair."

It was the best way to keep me from reducing his bill; but he need not have used it, for I found him honest and, when I deducted nothing, I saw him leave well content. I established a fixed price for the future, as I did not want to be bothered with going over an account every day.

Manon dressed my hair as skillfully as my late housekeeper, whom I always remembered with pleasure, and kissed me afterward, showing less hesitation than her sister. I foresaw the best from them both. They went downstairs when they saw the banker, who announced himself by saying that he had brought me four hundred louis.

The banker, who was a young man, said after paying me over the amount that, being lodged in this house, I must be happy

"Certainly," I said, "for the two sisters are charming."

"And their cousin is even prettier. They are virtuous."

"And I think they are well off, too."

"Their father has an income of two thousand livres; they will marry merchants, and they will be free to choose."

After he leaves, I go downstairs, curious to see the cousin. I see the caretaker, I ask him where Leduc's room is, and he shows me the door. I enter, and I see him in bed in a dressing gown, with a book in his hand and a countenance which did not look like an invalid's.

"What is the matter with you?"

"I'm having a good time. I fell sick yesterday the minute I saw those three princesses, who are quite the equals of the housekeeper at Soleure who would not let me kiss her. However, I am kept waiting a little too long for my broth."

"Monsieur Leduc, you are a scoundrel."

"Do you want me to recover?"

"I want to see the end of this comedy, for it bores me."

I see the broth arrive, brought by the cousin. I decide that the banker was right. I notice that, waiting on Leduc, she looked the mistress of the house, while my Spaniard looked nothing but what he was.

"I will dine in bed," he said to her.

"You shall be attended to."

She leaves.

"She puts on great airs," he said, "but I know better. You think her pretty, don't you?"

"I think you are insolent. You are up to your monkey tricks, and you disgust me. Get up and serve me at table. Afterward you will eat by yourself; you will be shown respect, but you will no longer lodge in this room. The caretaker will tell you where you will find your bed."

Meeting the cousin as I go out, I tell her I am jealous of the honor she has done my valet, so I beg her to spare herself the trouble in the future. After that I told the caretaker to lodge him in a closet where I could ring for him at night if I needed him. Then I went to write until Valenglart arrived.

I received him, embracing him and thanking him for having found me a lodging such as I wanted. He said that he had just called on the lady to whom he had introduced me. She was the wife of an advocate named Morin[13] and the aunt of the young lady who had interested me; he had told her so, and she had promised to send for her and keep her with her all day.

After eating very well we went to call on Madame Morin, who received me with Parisian ease. She was the mother of seven children, whom she introduced to me. Her eldest daughter, who was neither pretty nor ugly, was twelve years old; I took her for fourteen and said so. At that she fetched a little book in which she showed me the year, day, hour, and minute of her birth. Seeing such precision, I ask if her horoscope has been cast; she replies that she has found no one able to do her the favor. I answer that there is still time; and God made me add that it would be I who would cast it for her.

Just then Monsieur Morin comes in, she introduces him to me, and after the customary compliments she returns to the subject of the horoscope. The gentleman says, very sensibly, that judicial astrology[14] is a science which, if not false, is at least highly suspect, that he had dabbled in it for a time, but that he had finally given it up, contenting himself with the truths he learned from astronomy. Valenglart, who believed in astrology, argues with him; in the meanwhile I copy down the moment of Mademoiselle Morin's birth. Her father smiles and bows his head, and I see what he is thinking; but I have no idea of backing out. I made up my mind that day to become an astrologer.

But in comes the beautiful young lady, and her aunt introduces her to me by the name of Roman-Coupier,[15] daughter of her sister. She at once tells her of the ardent desire to make her acquaintance which she had inspired in me at the concert. She replies only by blushing, dropping me a pretty curtsy, and lowering two black eyes than which I did not remember having seen any more beautiful. She was seventeen years of age[16] and had very fair skin, black hair with very little powder, an excellent figure, splendid teeth, and on her lips the charming smile of modesty coupled with obligingness.

After a little polite conversation among the company, Monsieur Morin having gone about his business, I was invited to play quadrille,[17] at which I was considered incredibly unlucky when I had lost a louis. In Mademoiselle Roman I found a sound mind without artificiality or glitter or pretension; unfailing good spirits, an admirable skill in pretending not to hear a too flattering compliment or a jest to which she could not have responded without showing that she knew what she was supposed not to know. Dressed very neatly, she had about her none of those superfluities which indicate a certain wealth, no earrings, no ring, no watch; around her neck she had only a black ribbon from which hung a small black cross. Except for that, I should not have allowed myself to look at her beautiful bosom, which was faultlessly proportioned and of which fashion and education had accustomed her to display a third as innocently and openly as she displayed her cheeks, in which lilies were mingled with roses. Examining her bearing to see if I might hope, I could make nothing of it; she did not indulge in a gesture; she made no response which could give me the slightest hope; but neither did she give me the slightest reason to despair. One small incident, however, led me to hope a little. During supper, on the pretext of arranging her napkin I squeezed her thigh without seeing anything in her face to indicate that she disapproved of the liberty I had taken. I invited the whole company to dine and sup with me the next day, telling Madame Morin that I should not go out, and so she could have the use of my carriage, which would be at her door awaiting her convenience. After dropping Valenglart at his house, I went to my lodging, building castles in Spain concerning my conquest of Mademoiselle Roman.

I at once informed the caretaker that we would be six for dinner and supper the next day. Leduc put me to bed, saying that to punish him I had punished myself, and asking if he should dress my hair. I told him he might take a walk about Grenoble, coming back only in time to serve at table.

"I will go and catch the pox."

"I will have you cured in the hospital."

Impudent, insolent, sly, lecherous, but obedient, discreet, and loyal—I had to put up with him. The next morning Rose, coming to bring me my chocolate, said with a laugh that my valet had sent for a carriage and a hire manservant and, after dressing like a lord, with a sword at his side, had gone—or so he had told her—to pay visits. We laughed. A moment later in came Manon. I at once saw that the girls had made a compact never to be alone with me separately. I did not like it. Two or three minutes after I got up I see their cousin come in with a package under her arm.

"I am delighted to see you, my beautiful young lady, and to see you laughing, for yesterday I thought you too serious."

"That is because Monsieur Leduc is apparently a greater gentleman than you are, and you can imagine that I did not dare to laugh; but you would have seen me laugh half an hour ago when I saw him get into his carriage all dressed up."

"Did he see you laugh?"

"If he wasn't blind."

"He will be mortified."

"I'm glad to hear it."

"You are charming. What have you in that package?"

"Some samples of our handiwork. They are gloves[18] for men and women, made and embroidered by us."

"They look very fine. How much is the whole lot worth?"

"Do you haggle?"

"Always."

"It is well to know."

After talking with the other girls for a little the cousin takes pen in hand, counts the dozens, writes down the various prices, then adds and says that the lot would cost me two hundred and ten livres. I hand her nine louis[19] and tell her to give me back four livres.

"You told me you haggle."

"You shouldn't have believed me."

She blushed and gave me the four livres. After I had Rose shave me they accepted my first salutations of the day as a matter of course, and the cousin, who came last, let me feel a tongue dipped in nectar. I saw that she would be kind at the first opportunity. Rose asked me if they might make bold to serve me at table.

''Please do.''

''But we should like to know whom you are having to dine, for if it is officers from the garrison they are almost all such libertines that we wouldn't dare.''

Thereupon I told them that I had invited Madame Morin and Mademoiselle Roman, and they were delighted. The cousin told me that in all Grenoble there was not a prettier or more discreet girl than Mademoiselle Roman, but that she would have difficulty finding a husband because she had nothing; I replied that she would find a rich man who would value her beauty and discretion at a million. After dressing my hair Manon left with her cousin, and, Rose remaining behind to dress me, I attacked her a little; but when she defended herself only too well I begged her pardon, assuring her that it would not happen again. When I was dressed I shut myself up to cast the horoscope I had promised Madame Morin. I easily filled eight pages with pedantic charlatanry. Since I made a particular point of saying what must have happened to her daughter up to the age she had then reached, and since I hit on the truth, my predictions concerning the future raised no doubt. I risked nothing, for they were all buttressed with ''ifs.'' The ''ifs'' always constituted the whole science of astrologers, who have all been fools or knaves. Reading over the horoscope and finding it brilliant, I was not surprised. Being an accomplished cabalist, I must also be an accomplished astrologer.

At half past twelve the whole company arrived, and at one o'clock we sat down at table. I found that the caretaker was a man who needed rather to be discouraged than encouraged in his endeavors. Madame Morin was very gracious to the three girls, whom she knew very well, and Leduc stood behind her chair, waiting on her very attentively and wearing a coat finer than mine. When, at the end of the dinner, Mademoiselle Roman congratulated me on the three beauties who were at my service in this charming house, I spoke of their talent, and, after going for the gloves I had bought, when I saw them admired I managed to make her accept a dozen pairs, urged on by her aunt and her cousin, who did me the same honor. After that I gave Madame Morin her daughter's horoscope, which her husband read. Though he did not believe in it he could not help praising it, for everything was in accordance with the influence of the planets which together made up the astrological condition of the sky at the minute of his daughter's birth. After spending two hours discussing astrology and two more playing quadrille we went for a walk in the garden, where the company were polite enough to let me talk alone with the beautiful Mademoiselle Roman. Everything I said to her turned only on the passion she had inspired in me, her beauty, her discretion, the purity of my intentions, and my need to be loved if I was not to remain unhappy all the rest of my life. She replied that if it was God's will that she should marry, she would consider herself happy if her husband should be like me; I pressed my lips to her hand and, all on fire, I said that I hoped she would not make me wait in vain. She then turned, looking for her aunt. The day darkening, she feared what might very well happen to her.

We returned to the apartment, where I made a little bank at faro to amuse them. Madame Morin gave some money to the two young ladies, who did not have a copper, and Valenglart played for them so well that when I stopped dealing to go to supper I had the pleasure of seeing that everyone had won.

We remained at table until midnight. The wind, which was coming from the Alps, being too strong, I did not dare to insist on a walk in the garden. Madame Morin left, showering me with compliments, and I kissed, but with all due restraint.

Hearing someone singing in the kitchen, I go in, and I see that it is Leduc, so drunk that he could not stand. When he sees me he starts forward to beg my pardon; he falls, then vomits. He was carried off to bed. I thought the incident might prepare the way for the amusement which I very much wanted; and it might have done so if all the girls had not come in together. What is useful on one occasion is useless on another. The girls' character was such that I could never have had them except one at a time, without the knowledge of the two others. I must not risk failing in an attack which would later have denied me all hope of having them one by one. I saw Rose, openly jealous of her cousin, watching to see at which of them I looked. When I was in bed I dismissed them, and they left.

The next morning Rose came in alone, asking me for a stick of chocolate and saying that Leduc was ill in good earnest. She brings me my strongbox, and, giving her the stick of chocolate, I take her hand and make her feel that I love her, she pretends to be offended and leaves. Manon comes to my bed, showing me a cuff I had torn and asking if I wanted her to mend it. I take her hand, pretending to consider, and when she sees that I want to kiss it she bends down and lets me take the kiss which I see on her parted lips; I quickly take her hand again, and the thing was already begun when her cousin comes in. Manon draws away her hand and, holding the torn cuff, appears to be waiting for my answer. I say absently, and pretending not to see her cousin, that she will do me a favor if she will mend it when she has time, and she leaves.

Exasperated by these two disappointments, I think that her cousin will not leave me in the lurch, for she had given me an earnest the day before. I ask her for a handkerchief, she gives it to me, she does not resist my kiss, she lets me take her hand, and the thing would have been done if Rose had not come in with my chocolate. Both her cousin and I were easily able to regain our outward composure on the instant; but this third disappointment made me furious. I would gladly have killed Rose; however, I had to hide it, I sulked, but I had a right to do that because of the way she had repulsed me a quarter of an hour earlier. I declared the chocolate badly made; it was not true, but I said it. I got up, I would not let her shave me; but I let Manon dress my hair; the two others left, pretending to share a common indignation; but Rose was even more angry with her cousin than she was with Manon. Just then in comes Valenglart.

A man of punctilious honor and, despite his dabbling in the abstruse sciences, of great common sense, he said as we dined that he thought me a little melancholy and that if it sprang from some idea I might have conceived in regard to Mademoiselle Roman he advised me to think of it no more, unless I made up my mind to ask for her hand. I replied that I would be leaving in a few days. We found her at her aunt's.

She receives me in a friendly fashion which flatters me and encourages me to kiss her, making her sit down on my knee. Her aunt laughs, she blushes slightly, she hands me a slip of paper, and runs off. On it I read the year, day, hour, and minute of her birth; I understand perfectly. Her flight from my arms meant that I could expect no favors from her unless I cast her horoscope. Considering how to make the best use of the circumstance, I say that I will tell her if I can or cannot do her the favor at my apartment the next day if she will come there and stay for a ball I am giving. She looks at her aunt, and my proposal is accepted.

"The Russian" is announced. I see a man of my age, very well built but rather slight, and dressed in traveling clothes. He makes a good appearance, Madame Morin receives him graciously, he speaks well, he is gay with a tinge of melancholy, he scarcely looks at me, and he never says a word to Mademoiselle Roman. Toward nightfall Monsieur Morin arrives, and the Russian gives him a flask full of a white liquid; then he makes to leave, but he is asked to stay for supper.

At table the talk is of his miraculous liquid. Monsieur Morin tells me that in three minutes he had removed every trace of a contusion on the forehead of a young man who had been struck by a misdirected billiard ball which everyone thought had cracked his skull. The Russian gentleman had only rubbed it with his liquid. He said modestly that it was a trifle of his own invention, and he talked chemistry with Valenglart at great length. I had no thought for anything but my beauty, the hope of possessing her the next day having taken away my appetite. I saw Valenglart home to his barracks, he said that no one knew the Russian, yet he was received everywhere.

"Has he a carriage?"

"Nothing—no servants and no money; he has been here for two weeks, but he asks nothing of anyone. The innkeeper allows him credit; he is supposed to be waiting for his servants and carriage to arrive from somewhere."

"It would be simpler to suppose him a vagabond."

"He does not appear to be one, as you saw yourself; and he has buckles set with excellent stones. Anyone can see them."

"Anyone can be deceived. He would sell them."

Back at my apartment, it was Rose who came alone to dress my hair for the night, but she was still sulking. I urged her to be gay; but finding her recalcitrant I told her to let me sleep and to inform her father that I wanted to give a ball the next night, in the room on the ground floor giving on the garden, and a supper for eighteen or twenty. The next morning I confirmed the order to him, saying that I wanted his daughters to dance.

Just as he was going downstairs with Rose, Manon entered and came to my bedside to ask me what laces I wanted; but it was only an excuse: I found her gentle as a lamb and amorous as a pigeon, and we had it over with; but a moment later Rose would have caught us in the act. She came in with Leduc, who asked me for permission to dance, promising that he would behave himself properly and Rose vouching for him. I consented, telling him that he had Mademoiselle Rose to thank for it.

I received a note from Madame Morin asking me if she might invite two ladies of her acquaintance and their daughters to my ball, and I replied that she would be doing me a favor if she would also invite some men, since I had ordered supper for twenty.

She came to dinner with her niece and Valenglart, her daughter having to make a lengthy toilet and her husband being busy until evening; so we were only four at dinner; but she assured me that I would have a numerous company for supper.

Mademoiselle Roman had on the same dress and was wearing her hair as she did every day; but nothing could have made her look more beautiful to me. Standing before me where I sat and pressing her knees against mine, she asked me if I had thought about her horoscope. I replied, taking her by the hand and drawing her down to the seat beside me, that she should have it on the next day but one. In this position I repeatedly kissed the charming mouth of the heavenly being whose destiny I was born to determine. She was more surprised than frightened to see me shaking, but in defending herself against me she never altered the serenity of her countenance, she never turned her face away, she never took her eyes from mine. Yielding to her urgent request, I became calm, and she did not stir. I saw in her eyes the look of satisfaction which betokens a victory won by a generous enemy who returns his arms to his vanquished foe, saying, "Use them against me again if you have the courage." My silence applauded the noble Mademoiselle Roman's virtue.

Madame Morin came and sat down on my other knee to ask me to explain something in her daughter's horoscope. She said that to secure the attendance of four beauties at my ball she had had to write only two notes.

"I will have but one beauty," I exclaimed, looking at her niece.

"God knows," said Valenglart, "what all Grenoble will be finding to say about your ball tomorrow."

"They will say," Madame Morin said to her niece, "that they have been to your wedding ball."

"Yes. They will talk of my splendid dress, my laces and diamonds."

"Of your beauty," I said gravely, "of your intelligence, your discretion, which will make the man who possesses you happy."

There was a silence, for they all thought I meant myself. If I had known how to go about it I would certainly have offered her five hundred louis; but the difficulty would have lain in drawing up the contract, for I should not have wanted to spend them for nothing.

We went into my bedroom, and while Mademoiselle Roman amused herself examining the fine jewels I had on my toilet table, her aunt and Valenglart looked at the books on my bedside stand. I see the lady go to the window, absorbed in examining something she had in her hands. I remember that I had left M. M.'s portrait there. I hurry to her and beg her to give me back the indecent portrait. She replies that the indecency is of no consequence, but that what has surprised her is a resemblance.

I see it all, and I tremble at my involuntary indiscretion.

"Madame," I say, "it is the portrait of a Venetian lady whom I loved seven years ago."

"I believe you, but it is very strange. The two M.'s, these religious robes stripped off and sacrificed to love, it all conspires to increase my surprise."

"She is a nun, and her name is M. M."

"And a distant cousin of mine in Chambéry is also named M. M. and is a nun of the same order as yours. I will tell you more. She was at Aix, whence you have come, to cure an illness."

"I know nothing of all that."

"If you go back to Chambéry, call on her, saying I sent you, and you will be as surprised as I am."

"Madame, I promise I will go there when I return from Italy; but I will not show her this portrait, which I will now lock up."

"Show it to no one, I beg you."

At eight o'clock all the guests arrived, and I saw in my apartment all the prettiest women and the most eligible men to be found in Grenoble. The only thing which annoyed me a little was the fulsome compliments, of which all the French provinces are inclined to be lavish.

I opened the ball with the lady whom Valenglart pointed out to me; then, each in her turn, I danced with them all; but the contradances only with Mademoiselle Roman, who shone more brightly than all the other ladies precisely because she was so simply dressed.

After an energetic contradance I go up to my room to put on a lighter coat, and a minute later I see the cousin, who asks me if I need anything.

"Were you seen coming in here?"

"No, because I came from upstairs. My cousins are in the ballroom."

"My dear, you are beautiful as a star, and the moment has come for me to prove that I adore you."

"What are you doing? No, no! Someone might come in. Put out the candle."

I put it out, and, since I am full of Mademoiselle Roman, she finds me such as I should have been with her; but I needed no illusion, for she was charming. I might not have found Mademoiselle Roman so eager. She begged me to spare her, and just at the moment when it needed to be said; I wanted to begin over again, but she was afraid, and she left. I relit the candle and, after dressing, went downstairs.

We danced until the king of caretakers came to tell me that supper was served.

I saw a cold collation made up of the choicest dishes and covering the entire table; but what especially pleased the ladies was the great number of wax candles. My guests being thirty, I did not sit with them but at a smaller table, where the hardened trenchermen joined me with pleasure. They all urged me most cordially to spend the autumn in their city, and I am sure that they would have entertained me properly, for the nobility of Grenoble has every accomplishment. I said that if I could stay I should be delighted to make the acquaintance of the family of an illustrious man who had been a great friend of my father's.

"What family is that?" they all asked together.

"Bourchenu de Valbonnais."[20]

"He was my uncle. Alas, Monsieur! Come to our house. You danced with my daughter.[21] Be so good as to tell me what your father's name was."

This tale, which I invented on the spur of the moment, seemed to have the effect of a thunderbolt and made me an object of wonder. We all rose together and went to dance again.

After a contradance, seeing Madame Morin, her niece, and Valenglart go outside for a breath of air, I went out too, and, strolling in the moonlight, I took Mademoiselle Roman into a covered walk; but the seductive speeches with which I assailed her were all in vain. I held her in my arms in transports of the most ardent love, she could not escape the violence of my kisses, but her beautiful mouth did not return me one, and her beautiful hands, stronger than mine, always obstructed my attempts. When, a last effort taking her by surprise, I came within two or three inches of what I desired, she turned me to stone by saying in an angelic voice:

"Ah, Monsieur, be my friend and do not ruin me."

I begged her pardon on my knees, we rejoined her aunt; and we returned to the ballroom, but I was in a frenzy.

I go and sit in a corner, I see Rose, I ask her to bring me a lemonade. After bringing it she reproaches me for not having danced either with her or her sister or with their cousin. I reply that I am tired, but that if she will promise to be kind I will dance one more minuet, and with her.

"What must I do?" she replied.

"You must go and wait for me in my bedroom without a light, when your sister and your cousin are busy dancing a contradance."

"And afterwards you won't dance with anyone but me?"

"I give you my word."

"I will wait for you."

I went; I found her amorous, and my need was satisfied. I put off dancing the minuet with her until I was sure that it would be the last, for in common decency I could not have avoided dancing with the two others as well.

At daybreak the ladies began leaving without ceremony. Handing Madame Morin and her niece into my carriage, I said I would not see them that day, but that if they would visit me for the whole of the next I would give them the horoscope which they were so eager to have.

I went to the pantry to thank the excellent caretaker for having cast luster on me, and there I saw his three girls filling their pockets with sweetmeats; he said to them jokingly that in their master's presence they could steal with clear consciences. I told him I would dine at six o'clock, and I went off to bed.

But having slept only until noon, I worked on the horoscope in bed. I decided to predict that fortune awaited her in Paris, where she would become the mistress of her master; but that she must go there without losing any time, for if she let her eighteenth year end without going where the monarch could see her, her destiny would take another course. To give my prediction all the authority it needed, I said astonishing things about what had happened to her until she was seventeen, which was her age at the time. I had learned them in one way or another from herself or her aunt, pretending not to notice what they were saying. With the help of an ephemeris I had and a book on astrology, in six hours I cast and copied out the girl's horoscope, which was of a nature to astonish Morin and Valenglart and awaken fanatical belief in the women. I hoped I should myself be asked to escort the fair jewel to Paris; and I felt more than ready to undertake it; I flattered myself that I should be found indispensable to the maneuver, and that, if not love, at least gratitude would grant me all that I desired; I even thought I saw a prosperous issue for myself, for my enterprise might indirectly make my fortune. The monarch could not but fall in love with her as soon as he saw her; I had no doubt of that. Besides, what man in love does not imagine that the object he loves must delight all mankind? At the moment I was jealous of her; but, knowing myself, I knew that I should cease to be so very soon after I had enjoyed my treasure. I knew that Louis XV's attitude in such matters was not exactly that of a Turk. What gave my prophetic tirade an aura of divinity was the prediction of a son who was destined to be a blessing to France and who could come only from the blood royal and a predestined vessel, which, however, would produce nothing if the chances of human life did not send it to the capital.

The idea of becoming a famous astrologer in my century, in which reason had so thoroughly discredited astrology,[22] filled me with delight. I rejoiced in anticipation, seeing myself sought out by monarchs and wrapped in aloofness in my old age. If Mademoiselle Roman should have borne a daughter, I would simply have laughed. My horoscope would certainly be known only to her and her family, who could not but jealously keep the secret. After finishing, reading, and rereading my little masterpiece, I dined excellently with my three young ladies, though I refused to get out of bed. Being equally gracious to them severally, I could not but please them all, and in any case I needed an interval. I was sure that they must all be equally pleased, and not jealous, for each must have thought herself the favorite.

The next morning at nine o'clock I saw Valenglart, who said that everyone thought I was in love, not with Mademoiselle Roman, but with my caretaker's three girls. He asked me if he might write the whole story to Madame d'Urfé; and I answered that he would be doing me a favor.

The aunt and the niece came at noon with Monsieur Morin, and we spent the hour before dinner reading the horoscope. I find it hard to describe four different kinds of surprise. Mademoiselle Roman listening very seriously and, having no idea that she had a will of her own, not knowing what to say. Monsieur Morin, looking at me from time to time and, seeing me serious, not daring to laugh. Valenglart, with his countenance the mirror of his fanaticism; and Madame Morin, who, the reading finished, at once began drawing conclusions. Not letting the prediction surprise her in the least, she announced that her niece had more right than Madame de Maintenon[23] to become the King's wife or mistress.

"That woman," she said, "would never have been anything if she had not left America[24] and come to France; and if my niece does not go to Paris the horoscope cannot be proved wrong. So she must go. But how? Such a journey is next to impossible. The prediction of the birth of a boy is divine, and I know nothing about it; but she has better cause to become dear to the King than La Maintenon; my niece is young and virtuous, the other had passed her prime and had had lovers.[25] But the journey will never take place."

Valenglart said gravely that the journey would be made, because destiny must be fulfilled, and Monsieur Morin said that Astra influunt non cogunt ("The stars influence, they do not determine").[26] The young lady was lost in amazement, and I let them talk. We sat down to dinner.

At dessert we returned to the subject.

"According to the horoscope," Madame Morin resumed, "the King will fall in love with my niece during her eighteenth year:[27] she is in it now. What is to be done? Where find a hundred louis, the least that is necessary for such a journey? And when she gets to Paris is she to go and tell the King, 'Here I am, Sire'? And with whom shall she go? Not with me."

"With my aunt Roman," said the young lady, blushing to the ears at the indiscreet laughter which no one could restrain.

"Come to think of it," Madame Morin went on, "it could happen quite naturally, for Madame Varnier,[28] who lives in Rue de Richelieu above the Café de Foy,[29] is your aunt.[30] She maintains a good establishment and knows everyone in Paris."

"Do you see," said Valenglart, "the ways of destiny? You talk of a hundred louis. You need only twelve for a visit to Madame Varnier, who will put Mademoiselle up; and when she is there, leave it to chance to bring about the rest."

"If you go to Paris," I said to Mademoiselle Roman, "you must say nothing about the horoscope either to your aunt here in Grenoble or to Madame Varnier."

"I will say nothing about it to anyone; but, believe me, all this is only a rosy dream. I shall never see Paris, still less Louis XV."

"Wait a moment."

I go for a sealed roll in which I had fifty doblones de a ocho,[31] which amounted to more than a hundred and fifty louis, and I take it to Mademoiselle Roman, saying that it was sweetmeats. She finds the roll too heavy, she unseals it, and she sees the fifty coins, which she takes to be medals. Valenglart tells her they are gold, and Monsieur Morin adds that the goldsmith would give her a hundred and fifty louis for them. I ask her to keep them and to give me a note for that amount, payable at Paris when she becomes rich. She handed the roll back to me, expressing her gratitude. I was sure that she would refuse it; but I admired the strength of mind with which she managed to hold back her tears while never ceasing to smile.

We went to the garden, where, the subject of the horoscope being resumed by Madame Morin and Valenglart, I took the young lady by the hand and left them.

"Tell me, I beg you," she said, "if all this is only a joke."

"It is serious; but it all depends on an 'if'; if you do not go to Paris, it will all come to nothing."

"You must believe that, or you would not have tried to give me the fifty medals."

"You have drawn the wrong conclusion. Accept them secretly this moment."

"I thank you; but why should you give me such a large sum?"

"Hoping that you will allow me to love you."

"If you love me, why should I object? You do not need to buy my consent. Indeed, I am grateful to you. Reflection tells me that, to be happy, I do not need a King of France. If you knew to what my desires are limited!"

"Speak. To what?"

"To having a kind husband well enough off for me not to go without anything I need."

"And if you did not love him?"

"If he is honorable and kind, how could I help loving him?"

"I see that you do not know love."

"That is true. I do not know the love which makes people lose their heads, and I thank God that I do not."

"You are right. God preserve you from it."

"You insist that at the mere sight of me the King will lose his head; and, to tell you the truth, that is what seems to me sheer fantasy, for he may well find me not ugly, but I do not believe he will be carried away."

"You do not believe it? Let us sit down. Imagine that the King is as much impressed by your merits as I am. The thing will be done."

"What do you find in me that you would not find in many girls of my age? Yet it is true that I may have made a strong impression on you; but that only proves that I was born to affect you in such a way, and not the King. Why bring in the King, if you love me yourself?"

"I cannot give you what you deserve."

"From all appearances, that is not true."

"You do not love me."

"As your wife, I should love you alone. Then I would return the kiss you have just given me, which my duty forbids my returning now."

"How grateful I am to you for not being offended by the pleasure I feel when I am with you!"

"On the contrary, I am very glad if I please you."

"Permit me to come to see you very early tomorrow and take coffee with you sitting close beside you on your bed."

"Oh, please do not think of it! I sleep with my aunt, and I always get up first. Oh, please withdraw that hand. Please, please! In God's name, end this!"

Alas! I ended only by obeying. But what made me happy in imagination was that my lapse from propriety had not brought any change in her sweetness of manner or in the smile which her face always wore. I looked like a man who begged to be forgiven and deserved it; her expression told me she was sorry she could not grant me what I wanted. I went to my bedroom, where I found Manon unbasting cuffs, and in no more than a minute she quenched my thirst, then ran away. I reflected that Mademoiselle Roman would never grant me more than I had obtained from her, and that it was useless to try to obtain more unless I was willing to enter into negotiations which were contrary to her horoscope.

Having gone back to the garden, I asked Madame Morin to take a stroll with me. What I said to the worthy lady to persuade her to accept a hundred louis from me so that she could send her niece to Paris is unbelievable. I swore that no one should ever know of it; but all my eloquence was wasted. She said that if it depended on nothing but the journey, her niece's destiny could be fulfilled, for she had already thought of a way to send her, if her husband consented. In any case, she thanked me most sincerely, and she said that her niece was fortunate to have pleased me so well. I replied that she pleased me so well that I would leave the next day, for the proposal I was tempted to make her would destroy the high fortune which destiny promised her.

"Otherwise I should believe that my happiness would lie in my asking you for her hand in marriage."

"Her happiness would perhaps have a more solid foundation. Explain yourself."

"I do not dare to oppose destiny."

"But you will not set off tomorrow?"

"Yes, Madame. I shall call on you at two o'clock to take my leave."

The announcement of my departure made our supper somewhat melancholy. Madame Morin, who may still be alive, was a woman of excellent character. At table she announced that, since my departure was certain and I would not be going out except to call on her, the honor I wished to do her would become an irksome ceremony, and so my farewells should be made then and there. I said that I would at least have the honor of conveying her to her door after supper. And so it turned out. Valenglart walked, and Mademoiselle Roman sat on my lap. I was bold; she was kind to such a degree that I regretted having taken my leave; but it was done. An overturned carriage at the door of an inn obliged my coachman to stop for some minutes. I was far from cursing the accident as he did. Wanting to see if I could read some reflection of my happiness in the expression on my angel's face, I escorted them as far as their apartment, and, all conceit on my part aside, I saw the grief of love. I gave Madame Morin the embrace which was her due as a member of the sister order of "Mops,"[32] and she was kind enough immediately to initiate her niece, who at last very voluptuously gave me the kiss which she had always held she must refuse me. I returned to my apartment full of love but in despair, and I was annoyed when I saw the three girls in my bedroom. I needed only one of them.

Putting on my nightcap, Rose heard my whispered request; but she said that since they all slept together in the same room she could not possibly slip away. I then decide to tell them that I shall leave the next day and that I will give them a present of six louis apiece if they will all three sleep in my room. After laughing heartily over my proposal they said very calmly that the thing was impossible. This convinced me that none of them knew anything about the other two, but that they were bitterly jealous of one another. I spent the night alone, holding the adorable Mademoiselle Roman in the embrace of my soul until I woke.

I rang rather late. It was the cousin who entered, saying that Rose was coming with my chocolate and at the same time announcing a Monsieur Charles Ivanov,[33] who wanted to speak to me. I at once guessed that it was "the Russian"; but since no one had introduced him to me I saw that I need not receive him.

"Tell the gentleman that the name is unknown to me."

She goes, and a moment later comes back to say that I knew him from having supped with him at Madame Morin's. Finding myself thus obliged to receive him, I have him shown in.

"I should be glad to have the honor," he said, "of a word in private with you."

"I cannot, Monsieur, order these young ladies to leave my room. So be good enough to wait outside while I get up, and I will come and place myself at your disposition."

"If I am inconveniencing you I will come back tomorrow."

"I leave this evening."

"In that case I will wait for you."

I hastily slip on my dressing gown and go to hear what he wants. He says that he must leave and that, having no money to pay the innkeeper, he has come to beg my help and that he does not dare turn to anyone in the city because his rank does not permit him to risk the insult of a refusal.

"Yet you are risking a refusal at this moment, and certainly I am incapable of insulting you."

"If you knew who I am, I am certain you would not refuse me some small assistance."

"If you are certain of it, tell me who you are, and be confident of my silence."

"I am Charles, second son of Ivan, Duke of Kurland,[34] who is living in exile in Siberia. I escaped."

"In Genoa," I replied, "you will no longer be in want; for the brother of your mother the Duchess cannot abandon you."

"He died in Silesia."

"When?"

"Two years ago, I believe."

"You have been misinformed. I saw him in Stuttgart six months ago. He is Baron Breyden."

I see beyond doubt that the fellow is an impostor, and I feel angry that he has chosen me to trick; I am determined not to become his dupe; otherwise I should have given him six louis, since it was not for me to be the avowed enemy of adventurers, who are all impostors in one degree or another.

I glance at his buckles, which people believed were genuine, and I see beyond doubt that they are of the artificial stones made in Venice which marvelously counterfeited rose-cut diamonds.

"I have been told that your buckles are of diamonds."

"So they are."

"Why do you not sell them?"

"I promised my mother I would never part with them."

"Your buckles, Monsieur, are damaging to you; you should carry them in your pocket. I will tell you that I do not believe they are genuine and that lies offend me."

"Monsieur, I am not lying."

"Very well. Show me that they are genuine, and I will make you a present of six louis. You will also have the pleasure of proving me wrong. Good-by, Monsieur."

He saw Valenglart coming up the stairs and he begged me to say nothing to him about our conversation. I promised that I would not mention it to anyone.

Valenglart had come to wish me a good journey before leaving to see Mademoiselle Roman[35] with Monsieur de Monteynard.[36] He urged me to correspond with him, and I promised that I would do so and indeed thanked him, for Mademoiselle Roman's fate was of the highest interest to me. He embraced me with tears.

CHAPTER III

I leave Grenoble. Avignon. The fountain of Vaucluse. The pretended Astrodi and the hunchback. Gaetano Costa. My arrival in Marseilles.

WHILE THE three girls were helping Leduc pack my valises, the caretaker comes in with the bill. I am satisfied, so is he; wishing to have the pleasure of dining on this last day with his girls, I order dinner for four and post horses at nightfall. Leduc tells him also to order a saddle horse for him to ride, he being above getting up behind the carriage. The cousin laughs at his boasting, and the coxcomb, offended, tells her he is better than she is.

"But you serve her at table," I say.

And he answers:

"As she serves you in bed."

At this piece of insolence I run for my cane; but he scrambles agilely onto the window sill and jumps out.

The girls and their father give a cry of terror, I run to the window, and we see him in the courtyard, jumping about like a monkey. Delighted that he is not injured, I tell him that I pardon him, he comes up again, and I give him a watch. Such was my Spaniard, whom I had to dismiss two years later and whom I have often regretted.

In the company of the three girls, whom I vainly did my best to make tipsy, I found the hours passing so quickly that I decided to put off leaving until the next day. Tired of subterfuge, I wanted to have them all together, and I saw that I might manage it during the course of the night. I told them that if they would spend the whole night in my room I would not leave until morning. While they were conjuring up objections the caretaker came up to tell me that I would be well advised to travel to Avignon by water,[1] in a comfortable boat on which I could also put my carriage and which would cost me much less. I said that I would agree if all three young ladies would spend the night in my room, and he replied with a laugh that it was for them to choose. At this dictum they made up their minds, and the caretaker sent to order the boat and a choice supper for midnight.

It was not until after the supper that, in the truth of the bottle, I made them admit that their scruples were ridiculous after they had all three granted me their favors. At this news they looked at one another with the indignation and surprise which my brazen declaration could not but cause them, but I did not leave them time to summon up the courage to say that it was a calumny. Manon was the first to admit the truth and surrender to my ardor, and the two others sensibly took the same course when their turns came. After four or five extremely lively hours nature was obliged to yield to sleep. In the morning I wanted to give them presents of jewels, but they said they would rather I ordered gloves from them, giving them the money in advance. I ordered thirty louis' worth of gloves, which I never went back to get. I left at seven o'clock, seeing the whole household crying and laughing. I went to sleep on the boat and was not waked until Avignon, where I was taken to the "Saint-

Omer'' inn[2] and where I chose to eat supper in my room, despite Leduc's glowing accounts of a beauty who was eating at the public table.

The next day I feel inclined to go to it. My Spaniard tells me that the charming beauty is lodging with her husband in the room next to ours. At the same time he hands me a playbill announcing an Italian comedy, played by some members of the Paris company, in which Mademoiselle Astrodi[3] is to sing and dance; I cry out in amazement. ''How can the charming Astrodi, famous for her villainies, be in Avignon? When she sees me she will be very much surprised!''

At the public table I find eighteen or twenty people, all genteel, and such an array of dishes that it seems impossible the charge is only forty sous[4] a head. But the beautiful foreign lady, who absorbed all the attention of the table, completely holds mine too. Foreign, very young, a perfect beauty, never speaking, looking only at her plate, how could she leave any of the guests indifferent? When she was addressed she answered only in monosyllables, just letting her large blue eyes glance for an instant at the face of the person who had spoken to her. She had a husband seated at the other end of the table, who talked and laughed immediately; fairly young, with an ignoble countenance, greedy, pock-marked, his manners were not above those of a servant. Sure that such a man had not learned to refuse, I send him a glass of champagne, and he empties it to my health. I ask him if I may make bold to offer one to Madame, and, with a loud laugh, he tells me to apply to her. She says, after a slight bow, that she never drinks champagne. At dessert she went back to her room and her husband followed her.

A foreigner, who, like myself, was there for the first time, asked who she was; a man dressed in black told him that her husband called himself the Chevalier Stuard,[5] that he had come from Lyons and was on his way to Marseilles, and that he had been in Avignon for a week without a servant and with very little luggage.

Having intended to stop in Avignon only long enough to see Vaucluse and the celebrated fountain, which is known as the "Cascade,"[6] I had not furnished myself with letters. An Italian who has read, understood, and enjoyed Petrarch cannot but be curious to see the place where that great man fell in love with Laura de Sade.[7]

I went to the theater,[8] where I saw the Vice-Legate,[9] Salviati,[10] women of fashion who were neither beautiful nor ugly, and a bad comic opera, in which I saw neither L'Astrodi nor any member of the Comédie Italienne in Paris.

"But where is L'Astrodi?" I said at the end of the performance to a man who was there. "I did not see her."

"I beg your pardon. She sang and danced."

"By God, I know her, and if she has become unrecognizable it is no longer she."

I leave, and two minutes later I am overtaken by the same man, who asks me to come back to Mademoiselle Astrodi's dressing room, for she had recognized me. I go, and I see an ugly wench who comes running to embrace me, who calls me by my name, and whom I could swear I have never seen; but she does not let me speak. I recognize a man who is there as the father of the beautiful Astrodi whom all Paris knew.[11] She had been the cause of the death of Count Egmont,[12] one of the most agreeable noblemen at the court of Louis XV. I imagine at first that the ugly wench might be her sister, I accept a chair, and I compliment her on her talents. She asks my permission to take off her costume, and she does so chatting, laughing, and removing her nether garments with a generosity in which she might not have indulged if what she showed me had been worth seeing. I was so fresh from Grenoble that she would have found it hard to tempt me even if she were pretty; she was thin, dark-skinned, and almost repulsive. I laughed to myself at her confidence in her poor little stock; she must have supposed I had the appetite of a devil; but wenches of her kind very often have recourse to lewdness for what they cannot hope from delicacy. She asked me, she implored me, to go to supper with her, but I finally put an end to that with a peremptory refusal. She then begs me to take four tickets from her for the next day's performance, which is for her benefit; and I breathe again. It was only a matter of four petits écus,[13] I quickly take sixteen, and I think I shall see her die with gratitude when I give her the two louis. I return to my inn, where I sup very well in my room.

Putting me to bed, Leduc tells me that before supper the innkeeper had gone to see the beautiful foreigner, her husband being present, and had told him very clearly that he insisted on having his money the next morning, otherwise they would find no places set for them at his table; he had added that their effects would not leave his inn.

"Who told you this?"

"I heard it myself, from in here. The two rooms are separated by a partition one board thick. I am sure that if they were there now they would hear everything we are saying."

"Where are they?"

"At table, where they are eating for tomorrow, but the lady is crying. You are in luck."

"Hold your tongue. I will have nothing to do with it. It's a trap. A decent woman would rather die of hunger than go and cry in public like that."

"Ah! if you knew how much prettier she is when she cries! I'm a poor man, but the devil take me if I won't give her two louis if she's willing to earn them."

"Go and offer them to her."

A moment later the couple enter their room and lock the door, and I begin to hear the lady's sobs and the voice of the man talking to her angrily in some patois I do not know. It was the Walloon dialect, which is spoken in the environs of Liège. I sent Leduc off to bed, ordering him to tell the innkeeper that I insisted on having another room the next day, for the partition could easily be forced and the unfortunate couple could even more easily turn thieves. The tears and the husband's harangues ended at midnight.

The next morning I was shaving when Leduc told me that the Chevalier Stuard wished to speak with me.

"Tell him that I do not know any Stuard."

A moment later he comes back and says that, on being thus refused, he had looked at the ceiling and stamped on the floor. He had gone back to his room, from which, coming out a moment later wearing his sword, he had gone downstairs.

"I'm going to see," he added, "if there is powder in the pans of your pistols."

My valet made me laugh; but a desperate man often does more than that. I again order him to ask the innkeeper for another room; and he comes to tell me he cannot give me one until the next day.

"Then I shall leave your house instantly and find lodging elsewhere, for I cannot bear these sobs. Do you hear them? Are they amusing? The woman will kill herself, and you will be to blame."

"I? I only asked her husband for my money."

"There—listen to him, I'm sure he is saying in his patois that you are a monster."

"He may say what he likes provided he pays me."

"You've condemned them to die of starvation. How much do they owe you?"

"Fifty francs, for I lent him six."

"And you're not ashamed to make such a fuss over so little? Here's your money. Go at once and tell them you have been paid and they can eat downstairs, but don't tell them it was I who paid you."

He hurries out with the money, and I hear him tell them that he has been paid, but that they should never know by whom, and that they were free to go down for dinner and supper; of course in future they must pay him day by day. No sooner had he said all this than he comes back to my room; but I turn him out, calling him a damned fool, for he had led them to guess the truth.

Leduc stood there gaping.

"What's the matter, idiot?"

"Fine doings. I'm learning. I shall turn author. You're a sly one."

"You're a fool. I'm going for a walk; take care you don't leave this room."

"Very well."

But I have scarcely started off before the Chevalier accosts me and overwhelms me with elaborate thanks. I reply that I do not know what he is thanking me for, and he leaves me. Being on the bank of the Rhone, I amuse myself examining the ancient bridge[14] and the river itself, which geographers say is the swiftest in Europe; and at dinnertime I return to my inn, where the innkeeper, informed that I would pay six francs without wine, gives me an excellent repast. While I was there I drank only white Hermitage,[15] a wine of the utmost excellence. I asked him to find me a guide for the next day, as I wanted to see Vaucluse and the fountain. I dress to go to the little Astrodi's benefit performance.

I find her at the theater door, I give her the sixteen tickets and take a place next to the box of the Vice-Legate, Prince Salviati, who arrived with a numerous suite of ladies and men wearing decorations. L'Astrodi's father comes up behind me to whisper that his daughter begged me to say that she was the same famous Astrodi I had known in Paris. I answer, also in a whisper, that I will not risk having my veracity impugned. The ease with which a scoundrel invites a man of honor to join in a piece of knavery is unbelievable, but he thinks he is paying him a compliment.

At the end of the first act a score of servants in Monseigneur's livery distributed ices among the first-tier boxes. I thought it my part to refuse. A young man as beautiful as the God of Love politely approaches me and asks why I have not accepted an ice.

"Because, not having the honor of being known to anyone, I do not wish to give anyone grounds for saying that he has done me a courtesy when he does not know me."

"You are staying at the 'Saint-Omer,' Monsieur?"

"Yes, Monsieur. I have stopped here only to see Vaucluse, and I shall have that pleasure tomorrow if I can obtain a guide."

"I will come to serve you in that capacity myself, if you will grant me the honor. I am Dolci,[16] son of the captain of the Vice-Legate's guard."

"Feeling the honor you are so kind as to do me, I will put off leaving until you arrive."

"You will see me at seven o'clock."

I am surprised by the dignified courtesy of this Adonis, whom one might suspect to be a girl. I laughed at the supposititious Astrodi, who was as bad an actress as she was ugly and who through the whole performance never took her pale eyes from my swarthy face. When she sang she looked at me and smiled, treating me to little signals which indicated an understanding between us and which must have made me a marked man to the entire nobility, who, in turn, must have deplored my bad taste. An actress whose voice and eyes did not displease me was a big hunchbacked girl, but a hunchback such as I had never seen; for, though she had enormous hunches both in front and behind, she was extremely tall, so that but for the rickets which had made her hunchbacked she would certainly have measured six

Music for the Contradance "La Société" feet. In addition I imagined that she must be intelligent, as all hunchbacks are.

At the end of the play the hunchbacked girl was at the door of the theater with my favorite Astrodi. The latter was there to thank people, and the former to sell tickets for her own benefit performance, which was to take place three days later.

After receiving L'Astrodi's thanks, I hear the hunchback saying, with a smile which stretched from ear to ear and showed at least twenty-four fine teeth, that she hoped I would honor her benefit too.

"Provided," I replied, "that I do not leave day after tomorrow."

The other began laughing and, in the presence of the ladies who were waiting for their carriages, said that I would stay, that she would not let me go.

"Give him sixteen tickets," she said to the hunchback.

She gives them to me, and, ashamed to refuse them, I give her two louis.

"Day after tomorrow," says L'Astrodi, "we shall come to supper with you, provided you will be alone, for we want to get drunk."

As I returned to my inn the supper struck me as so comical a prospect that I decided to stay.

I was at table alone in my room when the Chevalier and his wife entered theirs, and I heard neither sobs nor tirades; but I was very much surprised when, with the first rays of dawn, I saw Monsieur Stuard, who said that, having heard that I was going to visit Vaucluse alone in a four-seated carriage, he had come to ask if I would permit him to accompany me with his wife, who was very curious to see the cascade. I replied that he would be honoring me, and he hurried off to get ready.

Leduc, who was dressing my hair, asked my permission to come on horseback, adding that he had been a true prophet. It was obvous that Madame Stuard was to be mine, and I was not averse to the prospect, for the adventure was entirely to my advantage. The innkeeper comes up with a guide, whom I dismiss, giving him six francs. Dolci arrives, beautiful as an angel; the lady is ready with her lord and master; the carriage is there, laden with everything we needed to eat well and drink still better, and we set off, Madame and Dolci on the back seat and Stuard and I on the front.

I had felt certain that during the course of the journey the young woman would relax and her gloom would vanish—but not a bit of it. In response to all my remarks to her I received only such very brief replies as, not being a peasant, she could not avoid giving me. Poor Dolci, who was intelligent, was in despair. Reasoning soundly, he thought himself the cause of all the gloom of the expedition; but I quickly put him at his ease by telling him that when he had offered me his company I did not know that I was to have the honor of escorting this beautiful lady, and that when I had learned it at six o'clock that morning I had been delighted to think that chance was putting such a charming companion beside him. To this account the lady made no response. Maintaining her silence, she did nothing but look into the distance and down at the ground to left and right.

Dolci, feeling less awkward after my explanation, began making various remarks designed to touch the springs of speech in her, but all to no purpose. He entered into a long conversation with her husband on a quantity of subjects, giving them all some oblique reference to the lady; but her beautiful mouth never opened.

The beauty of her face was perfect; her blue eyes were wonderfully large, her complexion a pure white enlivened by a rosy bloom, her arms were extremely beautiful, her hands well-fleshed and delicate, her figure showed that her bosom must be superb, and the light chestnut of her unpowdered hair inclined me to pass a most favorable judgment on all her invisible beauties. Nevertheless I sighed as I sadly reflected that, with her gloom, she might well inspire love, but that it could not last. I arrived at L'Isle[17] determined never again to be in her company anywhere; for she might well be insane, or in a state of desperation, forced as she was to live with a man whom she could not bear, and in that case I felt sorry for her; but I could not forgive her when I thought that, having been genteelly brought up, she should never have consented to join my outing that day when she knew that, with her gloom, she could not but arouse aversion.

As for the self-styled Stuard who was with her, whether as her husband or her lover, I did not need any profound reflection to know just what kind of man he was. He was young, neither handsome nor ugly, his manner promised nothing, and his talk showed him to be ignorant and stupid. A vagabond, as lacking in money as in talent, what was he doing traveling about Europe with this beauty who, since she was not accommodating, could find nothing to live on except in the purses of fools? Perhaps he knew that the world was full of them; yet experience constantly taught him that he could not count on them. The contemptible fellow became even more contemptible if he did not know that he was so.

Arrived at Vaucluse, I put myself entirely in the hands of Dolci, who had been there countless times and who loved Petrarch. We left our carriage in Apt[18] and went to the celebrated fountain, which was in fullest flow that day. Nature was the architect of the immense cave from which it comes. The fountain is at the foot of a cliff as sheer as a wall, a hundred feet high and of the same width. The cave itself, under the arch which forms the entrance to it, is only half as high, and from it the fountain flows with such an abundance of water that even at its birth it deserves the name of river. It is the Sorgue, which mingles with the Rhone near Avignon. There is no purer water in the world than that of this fountain, since in all the centuries it has been flowing the rocks have not received the slightest stain from it.

Those who are repelled by the water because it is black do not reflect that the cave itself, where the darkness is very dense, is what must make it look so.

> Chiare, fresche, e dolci acque
> Ove le belle membra
> Pose colei che sola a me par donna.
> ("Clear, fresh, sweet waters, in which she who to me is alone a woman dipped her beautiful limbs.")[19]

I insist on going to the top of the rock on which Petrarch had his house, the ruins of which I saw, shedding tears, as Leo Allatius[20] shed them when he saw Homer's tomb; and I wept again sixteen years later at Arquà,[21] where Petrarch died and where the house which he occupied still exists. The resemblance between the two places is striking, for from the room in which Petrarch wrote at Arquà one sees the summit of a rock very much like the one which I saw at Vaucluse and which, Dolci told me, was where Madonna Laura lived.

"Let us go there," I said, "it is not far."

What pleasure I felt when I saw the still existing remains of the house of the woman whom the amorous Petrarch immortalized in this one verse, which would melt a heart of stone:

> Morte bella parea nel suo bel viso.
> ("Death looked beautiful in her beautiful face.")[22]

I flung myself on its ruins with outstretched arms, kissing them and anointing them with my tears, asking Madame Stuard to forgive me if I had abandoned her arm to do homage to the departed spirit of a woman whose lover had been the most profound intellect which it was possible for Nature to produce. I said "intellect," for, whatever people may say, the body had nothing to do with it.

"Madame," I said to the astonished woman, who stood staring at me in her amazement, "four hundred and fifty years have passed since the place where you now are was trodden by the feet of Laura de Sade, who was perhaps not as beautiful as you are, but who was gay, polished, gentle, cheerful, and wise. May the same air which you are breathing at this moment, and which she breathed, make you resemble her, and you will inspire the flame of love in all who approach you; you will see the universe at your feet, and there will not be a mortal in the world who will dare to cause you the slightest pain. Gaiety, Madame, is the portion of the blessed, and gloom is the terrible image of souls condemned to eternal torments. Be gay, then, and deserve to be beautiful."

My enthusiasm impelled Dolci to come and embrace me. Stuard laughed, and the lady, who perhaps thought me mad, showed not the slightest sign of life in response. She took my arm again, and we slowly returned to the house of "Messer Francesco d'Arezzo,"[23] where I spent a quarter of an hour carving my name. E sciolsi il voto ("And I fulfilled my vow"). From there we went to dinner.

Dolci showed this extraordinary woman even more attention than I did. Stuard did nothing but eat and drink, refusing the water of the Sorgue, which, according to him, could only spoil the Hermitage wine; and it is possible that Petrarch himself would have been of the same opinion; we emptied eight bottles without our reason suffering from it; but the lady was abstemious. Back in Avignon, we bowed to her at the door of her room, declining the stupid Stuard's pressing invitation to sit down. I went to pass the last hour of the day on the bank of the Rhone with Dolci. Speaking of this strange woman, the young man pronounced judgment, and he hit the mark.

"She is," he said, "a whore[24] utterly infatuated with her own merits, who has left her country because, having lavished her favors too freely too soon, she found no one any longer interested in her. Sure of making her fortune wherever she was still a novelty, she set out with this scoundrel, maintaining her air of melancholy on principle, for she considers it the one sure means of making some man who undertakes her conquest fall madly in love with her. She has not yet found him. He must be a rich man whom she can set about ruining. She may have designs on you."

Men who reason so well at Dolci's age are those who become great masters. I left him, thanking him warmly and very glad to have made his acquaintance.

On my way to my room I saw at the door of his an elderly man of prepossessing appearance, who, bowing and calling me by my name, courteously asked me if I had found Vaucluse worthy of my interest. With great pleasure I recognize the Marchese Grimaldi,[25] of Genoa, a man of intelligence who was both likable and rich and who lived the greater part of the time in Venice because he enjoyed the pleasures of life more freely there than in his native city. My reply demanding a reasoned statement, I go in, thanking him for having done me the honor to remember me. I have no sooner finished my remarks on the fountain than he asks me if I enjoyed the promising company of my guests. I reply that I could not but have enjoyed it. Noticing my reserve, he sets about overcoming it by the following discourse:

"In Genoa we have very beautiful women; but we have not one who can match the beauty whom you took to L'Isle today. Last evening at table she struck me. Having given her my arm going upstairs, I said that if she thought I could dispel her melancholy she had only to speak. Note that I knew she had no money. It was her husband who thanked me for my offer, and I wished them good night.

"When, an hour ago, you saw her back to her room and left her there, I took the liberty of making her a visit. She received me with a graceful curtsy, and, her husband having asked me to keep her company until he returned, she did not hesitate to sit down on a sofa with me. I tried to take her hand, but she withdrew it. I then told her in a few words that her beauty had struck me, and that if she needed a hundred louis they were at her service, provided she would drop her serious manner in my company and assume a gaiety which would encourage the sentiments of friendship she had inspired in me. She replied only by a motion of the head which expressed gratitude but at the same time an absolute refusal of my proposal. I say that I am leaving tomorrow, and she does not answer. I take her hand again, and she haughtily withdraws it. At that I rise, beg her to excuse me, and leave. This is what happened to me half an hour ago. I have not fallen in love with her, for you see that I am amused; but in the light of her poverty her tactics astonish me. It is possible that you today put her in a position to scorn my offer, and in that case I understand to some extent; short of that, it is a phenomenon which I cannot explain. May I make bold to ask you outright if you fared better than I did?"

Delighted by the worthy gentleman's openness, I was as frank as he. I told him the whole story in detail; and we ended by laughing at it. I promised to call on him in Genoa and give him an account of what happened during the two days I planned to spend in Avignon after he left. He begged me to do so. He invited me to go down to supper with him to admire the recalcitrant's countenance; I said that, having dined very well, she would not be there; but he laughed and said he would wager she would go down; and he was right. When I saw her at table I decided that the role she was playing was assumed. The place beside her had been given to a Count Bussy,[26] who had just arrived, a young, handsome, conceited coxcomb, as anyone could see at a glance. Here is the scene with which we were entertained.

The Count, who was a wag by nature, playing the amiable fool with the fair sex yet at the same time bold and insolent, and who intended to leave at midnight, instantly set himself to cajoling and pestering his beautiful neighbor in a hundred ways. Finding her of a taciturnity which he had never before encountered, he did all the talking, he laughed, and, if the thought occurred to him that she was mocking him, he refused to consider it possible. I looked at Signor Grimaldi, who, like myself, could scarcely keep from laughing. Though nettled, the young roué went on; he gave her a choice bit to eat which he had first tasted himself, he even held it to her mouth; red with rage, she refused it, and he changed her plate, storming because she would not grant him a look. Seeing that no one present showed any decided inclination to defend the fortress, he remains unabashed; he laughs and decides to attack. He forcibly takes her hand and kisses it; she tries to pull it away, she rises, whereupon, still laughing, he catches her by the waist. But at that moment her husband rises, comes and takes her arm, and leaves the room with her. Somewhat disconcerted, the attacker follows her with his eyes, then resumes his place at the table, laughing again, though everyone else remains silent. He turns to ask his courier if his sword is upstairs; he answers no. He asks an abbé who is sitting beside him who the man who left with the lady is, and he replies that he is her husband; at that he laughs and says that husbands never fight.

"However," he added, "I shall offer him my apologies."

He rises, he goes upstairs, and the whole table begins commenting on the scene. A minute later he comes down, angry with the husband, who, shutting the door in his face, had told him he could go to the bordello. Declaring himself sorry that he must leave without finishing the affair, he orders champagne, offers it to everyone, no one accepts, he drinks, he gives the rest to his courier, and he leaves.

Seeing me to my room, Signor Grimaldi asks me what impression the scene had made on me. I said that I would not have stirred even if he had turned up her skirts.

"No more would I," he said; "but not if she had accepted my purse. I am curious to know how she will manage to leave here."

I told him again that I would bring him news of her in Genoa. He would not let me see him off, and he left at daybreak.

The next morning I received a note from L'Astrodi, asking me if I expected her for supper with her companion, and I answered in the affirmative. A moment later I see before me the Russian, the Duke of Kurland, whom I had left in Grenoble. I was alone. He tells me humbly that he is the son of a clockmaker in Narva, that his buckles are worthless, and that he has come to ask me for charity. I give him four louis.

"May I beg you," he says, "to keep my secret?"

"If anyone asks me about you I will say that I do not know who you are."

"In that case I will leave for Marseilles at once."

When the time comes I will recount in what condition I found him at Genoa. I sent for the innkeeper and told him privately that I wanted a choice supper for three people in my room and good wines. After replying that I would be satisfied, he said that he had just been raising a row in the Chevalier Stuard's room because he did not have money to pay for his day's board as they had agreed, and hence he was going to turn him out of the house at once, despite the fact that the lady was in bed with convulsions which were choking her.

"But that," he said, "does not pay me, and the scene yesterday evening brought discredit on my house."

"Go at once and tell her that in future she shall eat in her room with her husband morning and evening, and that I will pay for it as long as I remain here.''

''You know that meals in the room are charged double.''

''I know it.''

''Very well. I'm off.''[27]

The idea of this beautiful woman turned out into the street appalled me; but innkeepers do not practice gallantry. A moment later Stuard came to thank me and ask me to stop in at his room to persuade his wife to behave differently.

''She will not answer me, and you know I dislike that.''

''Come, she knows what you have just done, and she will speak, for after all, right feeling—''

''Who are you to talk to me of right feeling after what I saw last evening?''

''That gentleman left at midnight; and well for him that he did, otherwise I would have killed him this morning.''

''You make me laugh. It was last evening that you should have thrown your plate in his face.''

I go with him. I see her in her bed, with her back turned and the covers drawn up to her neck, and I hear her sobbing. I talk sense to her; but, as always, she does not answer me. Her husband makes to leave; but I tell him I will leave too, because no one could do anything for her and he should be convinced of it after the hundred louis she had refused from the Marchese Grimaldi, who had only wanted to kiss her hand and see her smiling.

''A hundred louis! By . . . , what behavior! We would have left at once for Liège, where our house is. A princess lets her hand be kissed for nothing; even an abbess. A hundred louis! By . . . , what behavior!''

He made me want to laugh, he cursed, he swore, and I was about to leave when convulsions, whether real or feigned, seize the poor woman. They begin by putting out an arm and hurling a bottle of water which was on the night table into the middle of the room. Stuard runs to her, holds her arm, she trembles, extends the other, she writhes with her eyes closed, she gradually arches her back, and the convulsions, seizing her thighs and legs, so disarrange the covers that I see things which I have never in my life been able to resist. The ignoble husband goes for water and leaves me there in motionless contemplation of a woman who lay as if dead in a posture than which voluptuousness could invent nothing more seductive. I feel trapped, and I rebel. I feel certain that it is only play-acting, a device by which, in her insane pride, the woman means to let me do whatever I wish and have the pleasure of denying it afterward. If it should kill me, I make up my mind to foil her. I take the cover and put it back over her. It was a hard task. I condemned to darkness dazzling charms which the monster was bent on using only to degrade me.

Stuard comes back with a bottle of water, he bathes her temples, he talks to her in the patois of Liège, he puts his hands under the cover to straighten her arched back; she pretends to feel nothing. A quarter of an hour later I pull myself together, my inertia vanishes, I leave them, and I go to walk beside the Rhone.

I strode along, angry with myself, for the slut had really bewitched me. I felt that, however brutally, enjoying all that I had seen was necessary to bring me back to reason. I saw that I must buy her, not by my attentions but with money, and, beyond that, by pretending to be taken in by all her artifices. I regretted that I had refrained from defiling her, even if her husband should have caught me in the act. I should have been satisfied, and have had every right to despise her afterward and make her aware of it. In my perplexity I see that it is still not too late, and I decide to tell her husband that I will give him twenty-five louis after he has arranged another interview for me under circumstances which will permit me to end the business.

I return to my inn with this idea in mind, and, not going to see how she is, I dine alone in my room. Leduc tells me that she is dining in her room too, and that the innkeeper has said she would not come down to the table again. I already knew it.

After dining I returned Monsieur Dolci's visit; he introduced me to his father, who was extremely good-hearted but not rich enough to satisfy his son's wish to travel. The young man himself was as agile as a monkey; he showed me his great skill in conjuring tricks. He was sweet-tempered, and, finding me curious to know if he was fortunate in love, he told me some tales from which I saw that he was in the propitious time of life which only inexperience renders unpropitious. He would have nothing to do with a certain rich woman because she demanded from him what he thought it ignoble to give when he did not love her, and he was sighing in vain for a young one because she demanded that he show her respect. I said that a gallant young man like himself ought to accommodate the generous rich woman with his person and very politely fail in respect to the younger one, who, after scolding him, would always be ready to forgive him. He was not a libertine, and he rather leaned toward Non-Conformity;[28] he amused himself innocently with friends of his own age in a garden near Avignon, where a sister of the gardener's wife entertained him when his friends were not there.

Toward nightfall I went back to my inn, and L'Astrodi and the hunchbacked Lepi[29] (for such was her name) did not keep me waiting. When I saw their two figures before me I felt a kind of consternation. I thought it impossible that what I knew was bound to happen would happen. L'Astrodi, ugly and knowing it, was sure she could make up for all her deficiencies by extreme licentiousness. La Lepi, indubitably a hunchback, but remarkably talented in her profession, was sure of arousing desire with her beautiful eyes and her teeth, which seemed to project from her mouth only to show their beauty. L'Astrodi at once came and gave me a Florentine kiss,[30] to which I had to submit willy-nilly; La Lepi timidly offered me only her imaginary cheeks, which I pretended to kiss. When I saw L'Astrodi begin cutting loose, I asked her to go slowly, for being a novice at entertainments of this kind I had to be initiated little by little. She promised to behave.

Before supper, not knowing what to say, I asked her if she had a lover in Avignon, and she answered that she had only the Vice-Legate's Auditor,[31] who, though a pervert, was pleasant and generous.

"I adapted myself to his taste very easily," she said, "though last year in Paris I would have thought it impossible, for I imagined it must hurt, but I was wrong."

"What! The Auditor treats you like a boy?"

"Yes. My sister would have adored him, for it is her passion."

"But your sister was abundantly endowed in the way of hips."

"What about me? Here—look, feel."

"You pass muster very well; but wait, it's too early. We'll be gay after supper."

"Do you know," La Lepi said to her, "that you are a wanton?"

"A wanton?"

"Shame on you! Who ever heard of a woman pulling up her skirts like that!"

"My dear, you'll do the same. Being in good company is being in the Golden Age."[32]

"I am amazed," I said to L'Astrodi, "that you tell everyone what sort of dealings you have with the Auditor."

"It's not I who tell everybody, it's everybody who tells me, and I'm congratulated on it, for he has never liked girls. I'd be ridiculous if I tried to deny it. I was surprised at my sister, but in this world one mustn't be surprised at anything. How about you—don't you like that?"

"No, I like this better."

And so saying, I put my hand out toward La Lepi, who was standing in front of me, and touched the place on her dress which ought to correspond to her this, and, my hand having found nothing, L'Astrodi burst out laughing. She rose, took my hand, and, to place it opposite her friend's this, she guided it to no more than six inches below her hump. It was there that, to my vast astonishment, my fingers felt the upper end of the work bench. La Lepi, who was ashamed to play the prude by moving away, began to laugh; but I was left rather nonplussed, for instead of having it in the middle of her person she had it a quarter of the way; the other three quarters were all thighs and legs. I became animated, thinking of the pleasure which this entirely new sight would afford me after supper.

"Haven't you a lover, my dear Lepi?"

"So," said L'Astrodi, "she is a virgin."

"That's not true," said the other, "for I had a lover in Bordeaux and another in Montpellier."

"Nevertheless," L'Astrodi rejoined, "you can say you are a virgin, for you have never been different from what you are now."

"That is true, too."

"What!" I said. "Then you were never a virgin? Tell me about it please, for it's something entirely new."

"Never, for it's a fact that before my first lover touched me I was just as I was after he had me. I was twelve years old."

"What did he say when he found you weren't a virgin?"

"When I swore to him that I was, he believed me, and he attributed the thing to rickets."

"Then he didn't hurt you?"

"No, for I asked him to be gentle."

"You must try it," L'Astrodi said to me; "we'll do it after supper."

"Oh, no, no!" La Lepi answered. "Monsieur is so big."

"What a reason! Are you afraid he'll put his whole self inside you? Look—I'll show it to you."

"There you are," said La Lepi, "it's just what I supposed. It will never go in."

"You're right," said L'Astrodi, "it's a bit unfair; you shall strike a bargain with him. Monsieur will be satisfied if you take in half of it."

"It's not the length, my dear. The door is too narrow."

"In that case you're lucky. You can sell your virginity after having had two lovers. But that would be nothing new."

The dialogue between the girls made me laugh, and the hunchback's ingenuous talk, which had every appearance of truth, had already decided me to try her after supper.

At table I had the pleasure of seeing the two girls eat as if they were starving and drink relentlessly. The wine having produced its effect, it was L'Astrodi who proposed that we put ourselves in the state of nature, and I agreed, getting into bed first and turning my back. I did not turn toward them again until L'Astrodi called to me; and La Lepi drew all my attention. She was bashful, but by dint of praising everything I saw in detail I put her at ease, and I persuaded her to get into bed beside me; but without L'Astrodi she could never have lain on her back, for she had none; she was all hump. But L'Astrodi doubled up a bolster and fitted it to her so well that she made all her parts parallel, and the task was finally accomplished to perfection. It was she who took charge of the insertion and managed it so successfully that La Lepi, to encourage me, said I had nothing more to fear. And so we brought the first act to its conclusion with great pleasure.

During the intermission she gave me the kisses which she could not give me in her ecstasy, for her head was actually buried in her chest.

"It's my turn now," said L'Astrodi; "but since I don't want to cuckold my Auditor, come and look the land over first. I insist, because afterward you'll make the journey with more courage. There!"

"What am I supposed to do with this half a lemon?"

"Squeeze the juice of it into the place. I want to see with my own eyes that you are sure you're taking no risk. Don't you know that if I were ill I couldn't stand the smart of it?"

"I've done it. Are you satisfied?"

"Yes. But, above all, don't cheat me, because if I become pregnant my reputation is made. And you, Lepi, lend our friend a hand." [33]

"What's 'lending a hand'?"

I had to interrupt the proceedings, for I was dying with laughter. She insisted on teaching her how, and I had to consent if I wanted her to let me do the same thing to her. Since I had undertaken not to cheat her, the business took a long time, but that was what she wanted. She upbraided La Lepi, who, tired of lending me a hand, told me to hurry up; and she showed her so effectively that she had no need of her that we ended simultaneously.

Thinking, after laughing so hard and doing so much, that I was incapable of more, I told them to go; but L'Astrodi objected and demanded punch. I was willing to make it; but wanting no more of them, I dressed again.

The punch, which I made for them with champagne, made them so wanton that they made me wanton again with them. L'Astrodi put the other in such a position that, seeing neither of her humps, I was pleased to imagine I was going to violate Jupiter's tall daughter. La

Lepi swore to me afterward that she had been the gainer by it; and I did not doubt her; but L'Astrodi, seeing me dead, would not listen to reason. She was determined to perform a miracle; but I would not let her kill me in order to resuscitate me. I promised them another supper of the same sort, intending not to keep my word. When, as they left, they saw ten louis, I thought they would eat me up. They got into my carriage, which was waiting for them at the door, giving me a thousand blessings. After eight hours' sleep I did not find myself in a state to complain of the more than lively entertainment; I quickly dressed to go for a walk.

But up comes Stuard, saying in what appeared to be great distress that if I did not arrange for him to leave before I did he would throw himself into the Rhone.

"I can afford twenty-five louis, Monsieur; but it is only to a lady gentle as a lamb that I will pay them over, and in private."

"Monsieur, it is exactly the amount we need; she is ready, go and talk to her. I shall not return until noon."

I put twenty-five louis into a pretty little purse and I hasten to my triumph. I enter her room in a respectful manner, and I see her in bed. As I approach she sits up, not troubling to pull up her shift, which left one of her breasts uncovered; and, before I open my mouth, here are the words which hers utters:

"I am here, Monsieur, prepared to pay you with my body for the paltry twenty-five louis my husband needs. Do whatever you will with me; you will meet no resistance; but remember that, in taking advantage of my need to assuage your brutality, you ought to feel far more deeply humiliated than I, who sell myself so cheaply only because necessity compels me. Your baseness is more shameful than mine. Come. Do your will."

With that she pushes the coverlet to the foot of the bed, displaying beauties with which I was already acquainted and which so ferocious a soul was unworthy to possess.

I gather up the coverlet, and I throw it over her in the greatest indignation.

"No, Madame," I reply; "it shall not be true that I leave this room humiliated by what you have said to me; it is you whom I will put to shame by telling you truths of which, if you were a decent woman, you could not be ignorant. I am no brute, and to convince you of it I leave without having enjoyed your charms, which I scorn and for which I had no idea of paying by giving you twenty-five paltry louis. There they are; but be sure that I give them to you only from a feeling of pity which I regret that I cannot overcome. Be sure, too, that, as soon as you give yourself to a man for money, even though it is for a hundred million, you are a prostitute if you do not at least pretend to love him; for then the man, unable to guess that you are feigning, will still think you are a decent woman. Farewell."

After that I returned to my room; and when her husband came to thank me, I at once asked him to say no more to me about his wife. The next morning he left with her for Lyons. The reader will learn at the proper time how I met them both again at Liège.

Dolci came during the afternoon to take me to his garden to see the gardener's sister-in-law. He was better looking than she. Put in a good humor, she only momentarily resisted his request to be kind to him in my presence; it was on this occasion that, having seen that nature had endowed him wonderfully well, I assured him that he did not need money from his father to travel, and he profited by my advice. He was a Ganymede[34] who, during his encounter with the girl in the garden, could easily have turned me into Jupiter.

On my way back to my inn, I saw getting out of a boat a young man some twenty-four or twenty-six years of age whose honest countenance was the picture of melancholy. He comes up to me and asks me for charity, displaying a bill authorizing him to ask it and a passport which showed me that he had left Madrid six weeks before. He was from Parma and his name was Gaetano Costa.[35] When I see "Parma," prepossession enters in; he interests me. I ask him what misfortune has reduced him to begging.

"The misfortune of not having money enough to return to my native country."

"What were you doing in Madrid, and why did you go there?"

"I went there four years ago as valet to Doctor Pistoria,[36] physician to the King of Spain; but not satisfied with my position, I asked him for permission to leave his service. This certificate shows you that he did not dismiss me."

"What can you do?"

"I write a good hand; I can serve as a secretary; in my own country I can follow the trade of scribe. Here are some French verses which I copied yesterday, and here are some Italian ones."

"Your handwriting is excellent; but can you write correctly by yourself?"

"From dictation I can write Latin and Spanish too."

"Correctly?"

"Yes, Monsieur, from dictation; for it is the person who dictates who must answer for the correctness."

I at once saw that the young man was an ignoramus; nevertheless, I take him to my room; I tell Leduc to speak to him in Spanish, and he answers reasonably well; but when I dictate to him in Italian and French I find that he does not know the first rules of orthography. I tell him that he does not know how to write, and, seeing him mortified, I console him by saying that I will take him to Genoa at my expense. He kisses my hand and assures me that I will find him a faithful servant.

I took a liking to him because he had a method of reasoning which was all his own and which he used in the belief that it gave him distinction; it was apparently what had won him the good opinon of the ignoramuses with whom he had associated until then, and he ingenuously used it with everyone. I laughed in his face when, by way of beginning, he modestly told me that the art of writing consisted in having a legible hand, so it followed that the person with a more legible hand than another was also the wiser. Since he said this with his eyes fixed on something in my handwriting, he claimed, without saying so, that I must be inferior to him. He thought that because of this superiority in him I ought to grant him a certain consideration. I laughed, I thought he was not beyond learning, and I kept him. But for these wild notions of his I should have given him charity, and the whim of taking him with me would not have entered my head. He made me laugh. He told me that correct spelling was unnecessary, since those who read and know a language do not need it in order to understand what the writing means, and those who do not know a language cannot see the mistakes in it. Seeing that I did not contradict him, he thought he had driven me to the wall and he took my laughter for applause. Having dictated something to him in French on the subject of the Council of Trent,[37] I exploded when I saw "Trente" written with a three and a zero;[38] and when I told him why I was laughing he said that it all came to the same thing, since the reader could not fail to read "Trente" if he had any knowledge of arithmetic. In short, he had some intelligence, which was why he was stupid; I thought it out of the ordinary, and I kept him. I was more stupid than he. Then, too, he was a good sort; he had no vices; he was addicted neither to women nor to wine nor to gambling nor to bad company, he seldom went out, and always alone. Leduc disliked him because he put on airs as if he were my secretary, and because he told him one day that every Spaniard with bowlegs was descended from a Moor. Leduc was bowlegged and, priding himself on old Christian descent, conceived an implacable hatred for Costa, who, after all, was right. It was for this reason that they had a fist fight two weeks later at Nice in Provence. Costa came whining to me with his nose swollen. I laughed. From that day on he respected Leduc, who because he had been longer in my service thought himself his superior. I have dilated on this Costa so that my reader may have an accurate idea of him, for unfortunately I shall have more to say about him in the course of these memoirs.

I left the next morning and went on to Marseilles without troubling to stop at Aix, where the Parlement[39] sits. I put up at the "Thirteen Cantons,"[40] being of a mind to spend at least a week in that ancient city, with which I had a great wish to become acquainted and at the same time to be completely free there; for that reason I had furnished myself with no letters of introduction; well supplied with cash, I did not need to be known to anyone. I at once informed the innkeeper that I would always eat in my room alone, and always fish; I knew that the fish to be had in that city were more delicate than those of the Atlantic and the Adriatic.

I went out the next morning, followed by a hire servant to show me the way back to my inn when I should tire of walking about. Strolling at random, I found myself on a remarkably wide and very long quay, where I thought I was in Venice. I see shops in which wines from the Levant and Spain were sold at retail, and where a number of people who preferred them to coffee and chocolate were breakfasting. I see the preoccupied haste of those who are coming and going, bumping into each other and wasting no time begging pardon. I see shopkeepers and hucksters offering all kinds of merchandise, and pretty girls, some dressed well, others poorly, side by side with women whose brazen manner seemed to say to those who looked at them, "You have only to follow me.'' I also see others who, though well dressed, walk modestly on, looking at no one in order to arouse more interest.

Everywhere I seem to see the freedom of my native country in the mixture of all nations which I observe and in the different costumes. It was a hodgepodge of Greeks, Turks, Africans, pirates (at least to judge from their looks), Jews, monks, charlatans, and from time to time I see Englishmen, who say nothing or talk to each other in low tones without taking much notice of anyone.

I stop at a street corner only long enough to read the announcement of the play[41] which was being performed that day, then I go to dinner very well pleased, and even better pleased after dinner because of the excellent fish I had been served. The red mullet eaten there, which we call barboni in Venice and the Tuscans triglie, are incomparable. The French call them rougets, presumably because their heads and fins are red.

I dressed to go to the play, and took a place in the amphitheater.[42]

CHAPTER IV

Rosalie. Toulon. Nice. My arrival in Genoa. Signor Grimaldi. Veronica and her sister.

I SEE that the four boxes to my right, like those to my left, are occupied by pretty women, all prepossessing and elegantly attired, and I see no men with them. During the first intermission I see young gentlemen wearing swords, and others without them, approach the boxes and converse familiarly with these ladies, or light women, and I hear a young Knight of Malta[1] say to the one who was alone in the box beside me:

"I will come to breakfast with you tomorrow."

It was all I needed. I examine her more carefully, and, finding her appetizing, I do not hesitate, as soon as I see the Knight make off, to ask her if she would let me come to supper.

"With pleasure, my friend; but I've been caught so many times that if you don't 'earnest' me, I shan't expect you."

"How am I to 'earnest' you, I don't understand."

"Apparently you have just arrived."

She laughs and summons the Knight with her fan.

"Explain to this foreigner, please, who asks me to let him come to supper tonight, what 'to earnest' means."

He says with a smile that Mademoiselle, to make sure I would not fail to do her the honor, wishes me to pay for the supper in advance. I thank him, and I ask the young lady if a louis is enough. She says it will do, and, giving it to her, I ask for her address. She hadn't a card in her pocket; but she asks the Knight to tell me the way to her house. He very politely says that when we leave the theater he will take me there himself; and he adds that she is the greatest wanton in Marseilles. He asks me if I have been in Marseilles before, I say I have not and that I have just arrived; and he congratulates himself on having made my acquaintance. We go to the center of the amphitheater, and, talking on, he names each of the fourteen or sixteen girls whom we see there, all of them ready to furnish the first comer with supper. He says that they all have free entrance to the theater and that the manager finds it to his advantage, for since decent women would not occupy those boxes they would be empty and the house would be dull. I scrutinize them, and I find five or six who are prettier than the one I had honored with my choice; but I count on the following days. I ask the Knight if he has a favorite among these beauties, and he answers no. He says he is in love with a dancer, whom he supports, but that, not being jealous of her, he will take me to her house. I assure him that it will be a pleasure; the ballet comes on; he points her out to me, and I congratulate him. At the end of the play he takes me to the door of my new conquest, and, after saying that we will meet again, he leaves me there.

I go upstairs, I find her in dishabille, and she no longer attracts me; but she makes some wanton sallies at which I laugh, and I sup reasonably well. After supper she goes to bed and invites me to do the same, but I excuse myself, saying that I never sleep out. She then shows me the coverall which sets the mind at rest, and, finding it too thick, I refuse it. She says that thin ones cost three livres and that everyone considers them too expensive.

"Give me a thin one."

"I have a dozen; but the dealer will not sell them singly."

"I will buy the dozen."

"Very well."

She rings, and a girl comes in whom she orders to bring her the package on her toilet table. The girl's face and her modest bearing strike me, and I tell her so.

"She is fifteen," she says; "but she's a silly goose and won't do anything because she claims to be a virgin."

"May I inspect her?"

"She won't let you. Ask her and you'll see."

The girl comes back with the package. I put myself in condition to order her to choose me one which fits well, and she sulkily begins looking and measuring.

"This one doesn't fit properly," I say, "try another"; and another and another, until I suddenly splash her and no mistake, her mistress laughs, and she, indignant at my scurvy trick, throws the whole packet in my face and angrily leaves. Having no further desire to do anything, I pay her for the coveralls and I leave. However, the girl whom I had treated so badly comes to light my way, and I make it up to her generously, giving her a louis. Very much surprised, she begs me not to tell her mistress.

"Is it true, my dear, that you still have your maidenhead?"

"Perfectly true, Monsieur."

"And why won't you let yourself be inspected?"

"Because it revolts me."

"You'll have to make up your mind to it, for otherwise, pretty as you are, one is at a loss what to do with you. Will you let me?"

"Yes, but not in this house."

"Then where?"

"Have someone bring you to my mother's house tomorrow morning, and I'll be there. Your hire valet knows the way."

Returning to my inn, I ask the valet if he knows the girl who lighted me down, and he replies that he does and that he had been astonished to see her there because he thought she was a decent girl.

"You shall take me to her mother's house tomorrow morning."

"Gladly."

The next morning he takes me at ten o'clock to a wretched one-story house on the outskirts of the city, where I see a woman spinning flax and children eating bread. She asks me what I want.

"Your daughter is not here?"

"No. And if she were, do you take me for her bawd?"

Just then the girl arrives, and the infuriated mother throws a bottle at her head which would have killed her if she had not missed her aim. I step between them, raising my cane, the children scream, my valet comes in and shuts the door; but the woman's rage does not abate, she calls her daughter a whore at the top of her voice, she orders her to leave the house, she says she is no longer her mother, and I can hardly hold her. My valet tells her not to shout so loud because of the neighbors, and she answers:

"Hold your tongue, you pimp."

I give her an écu, she throws it in my face, whereupon I open the door and go out with the poor girl, my valet snatching her from the hands of her mother, who had taken her by the hair. I am booed and jostled by the mob which followed me and which would have torn me to pieces if I had not taken refuge in a church, which I left by a different door a quarter of an hour later. I have never in all my life escaped from a greater danger. What saved me was my fear of angering the town mob, for I knew its ferocity.

Two hundred paces before I reach my inn I am joined by the girl, who is clinging to my valet's arm.

"Knowing how savage your mother is," I ask her, "how could you make me run such a risk?"

"I thought she would respect you."

"Try to stop crying. I don't know how I can be of use to you."

"I shall certainly not go back where I was yesterday. There is nothing for me but the streets."

I ask my valet if he knows some decent woman who would give her lodging, for which I would pay; he replies that he knows a place where furnished rooms are let; I tell him to go there and I will follow. He enters a house, where an old man shows me rooms on every floor. The girl says she needs only a lodging for six francs a month, and the man goes up to the attic, opens a garret with his key, and says:

"This one is six francs; but I must have the month's rent in advance and I warn you that my door is locked at ten o'clock and that no one must ever spend the night with you."

I saw a bed with coarse sheets, but clean; two chairs, a table, and a chest of drawers. The window was glazed and had blinds. I ask the man how much he will take per day to board her, and he says twenty sous, with two sous for the maid who will bring up her meals and do her room. The girl answers that she is satisfied, and she pays the month's rent and twenty sous for meals that day. I leave her there, saying that I will see her again.

Going downstairs with the old man, I ask him for a room for myself; and he gives me one at a louis, which I pay him on the spot. He gives me a skeleton key which fits the street door so that I can enter at any hour I please. He says that he cooks in his own part of the house and that he will prepare meals for me at whatever price I stipulate.

After doing this good deed, the source of which appeared to be a virtue, I dined alone, then went to a large coffeehouse, where I saw the agreeable Knight of Malta playing.[2] He left off when he saw me, putting in his purse the ten or twelve louis he had won. After asking me if I had been satisfied with the girl with whom I had supped, and hearing that I had done nothing, he asked me if I should like to have him introduce me to his dancer, and we went there. We found her at her toilet table having her hair arranged by a hairdresser. She received me with the jocularity which is appropriate to old acquaintance. She did not interest me; but for the Knight's sake I showed no sign of it.

After the hairdresser left, she had to dress for the theater, and she did not stand on ceremony. The Knight helped her change her shift, which she did with the greatest freedom, though asking my pardon. I said with a laugh that she had indeed made me uncomfortable; she refuses to believe it, she comes to me to learn the truth and, finding that I have lied, she calls me a milksop.

There is not a city in France in which light women are as profligate as they are in Marseilles. Not only do they pride themselves on refusing nothing; they are the first to offer the man what he perhaps does not dare ask for. She showed me a repeating watch on which she had got up a lottery at twelve francs a ticket, and offered me one, saying that she still had ten. I took them all, I paid her five louis, then I made her a present of the tickets. She ran to kiss me, telling her Knight that I could cuckold him whenever I wished. He replied that nothing would please him better. He invited me to sup with her, and politeness prompted me to accept; but after supper the only pleasure I enjoyed was watching the Knight pay her his respects in bed. I found him much less well endowed than Dolci.

After wishing them good night I left them on the pretext of my poor health, and I went to the furnished room in which I had placed the unfortunate girl. Having the key, I entered the house; the maidservant got up to show me to my room. It was midnight. I asked her if I might go to the garret, and she took me there at once. She knocked, and when the girl heard my voice she opened the door, and I sent the maid to wait for me in my room. I sit down on her bed; I ask her if she is satisfied, and she replies that she is happy.

"Then I hope I shall find you kind, and I shall come to bed with you."

"You may do whatever you please; but I warn you that I have given myself to a lover, though it was only once; but that's enough to keep you from finding me quite intact. Forgive me if I lied to you yesterday. I could not guess that you would love me."

Gentle as a lamb, she lets me lay bare all her beauties, feast on them with my eyes, explore them with my hands, and devour them with my mouth, and the mere thought that I was to become possessed of this treasure sets my soul on fire; but her obedient manner distresses me.

"My dear Rosalie" (such was her name), "your submissiveness shows me that you do not love me. Why do you not kindle to my desires?"

"I do not dare; I am afraid you will suspect me of pretending."

Both artifice and deceit are capable of such an answer; but at that moment it could be given only by candor. Impatient to clasp her in my arms, I quickly strip off everything which could lessen my pleasure, I lie down beside her, and a moment later I am surprised to find that she had lied when she said she had had a lover. I tell her so.

"Never," I say, "did a girl tell that sort of lie."

"I am glad that you think it is not true; but it is only too sure that I had a lover, and this is how.

"Two months ago my mother, though hot-tempered, loved me. I worked as a seamstress, I earned twenty and sometimes even thirty sous a day, and I gave it all to her; I'd never had a lover, and I didn't care; I laughed at people praising me for being virtuous when I had no idea that I was being anything of the kind. I had been brought up from childhood never to look young men I met in the street in the face and never to answer when they said silly things to me.

"Well, two months ago a rather good-looking young man, a native of Genoa and a merchant in a small way, made my mother's acquaintance by bringing her some fine cotton stockings to wash. When he saw me he didn't say much in my praise; but all that he said was perfectly honorable, I liked him, and he began coming to our house every evening; my mother was always present, sitting near me, but he never even took my hand to kiss it. My mother, very pleased to see that the young man loved me, often scolded me for not putting myself out to be polite to him. He was to leave for Genoa in a small ship which he owned, carrying merchandise, and he had assured us he would come back in the spring of the following year and would then declare his intentions, which would depend on his still finding me well behaved and, above all, without a lover. No more was needed. Considering him my future husband, my mother often let me talk with him at the door of our house until midnight. When he left I shut the door and got into bed beside her. I always found her asleep.

"Four or five days before he was to leave he persuaded me to walk fifty paces from our house with him to drink a glass of good muscatel at the shop of a Greek merchant who served customers all night. We spent only half an hour alone there together, and it was on that day that I first let him give me a few kisses. If when I got back to the house I had found my mother awake I would have told her all about it, for the pleasure I had felt seemed to me perfectly innocent.

"On the next day but one, urged to grant him the same favor, I consented, and love began to gain ground. The caresses we exchanged no longer seemed innocent, for we knew that we had gone beyond the bounds of decency; even so, we forgave ourselves because we had managed to abstain from the final act.

"Again on the next day but one, my lover having to weigh anchor that night, he took leave of my mother, and after she had gone to bed I did not hesitate to grant him a pleasure which I desired as much as he did. We went to the usual place, we ate to make us thirsty, we drank to quench our thirst, and our heated senses so emboldened our love that, forgetting our duty, we believed we were achieving a triumph. After our defeat we went to sleep, and, on waking to the light of day, we recognized the sin we had committed. We rose more melancholy than happy, and I went home, where my mother, who was already up, received me in more or less the same way as you saw her do yesterday. I assured her that marriage would wipe out the shame of my crime, and at this confession she took up a stick, with which she would perhaps have killed me if I had not taken to my heels.

"I spent the whole morning in a church, and at dinnertime, not knowing where to go, I was wandering through the streets when I met a woman I knew whose trade was finding situations for maidservants. I asked her if she might have a situation for me, and she replied that she had been asked for a girl that morning; but that the mistress of the house was a courtesan and hence I would run the risk of becoming the same. I replied that I was sure I could defend myself, and the woman placed me in the house of ill fame where you found me. The young lady was pleased to see me and even more pleased when, in answer to her questions, I said that I had never been with a man. But I heartily repented of having told her that lie.

"During the week I spent in the abandoned woman's house I was treated every day to the most outrageous and humiliating affronts that ever a girl endured. All the men who came there had no sooner seen me and been told that I was a virgin than they wanted to have me; they immediately offered me five or six louis, but I had to begin by letting them inspect me. I refused, and they made fun of me. Five or six times a day I had to witness the brutal excesses of the men who came to amuse themselves with my mistress, and when they were ready to leave at night and I lighted them down the stairs, they assailed me with the coarsest insults because I refused to do what they wanted for a twelve-sou piece; then they gave me half a copper,[3] saying that I must be rotten with the pox. When I went up to my garret to bed I barred my door; I thought I would kill myself when you came last evening and treated me in a way more shameful than I thought it possible to imagine; but when you left you were so reasonable and so generous that I not only forgave you, I loved you, believing that you were the man whom Providence had sent me and, above all, the man to calm my mother and persuade her to let me come home, being sure that my lover, returning in the spring and finding me there, would marry me. But since this morning I have lost all faith in my mother, who apparently believes I am a prostitute. Now I am yours, if you want me, and I forever renounce my lover, well knowing that I have become unworthy of him. Take me for your servant, and I will love you and you alone as faithfully as if I were your wife, and you will never find any ambition in me."

Whether they sprang from virtue or from weakness, I know that Rosalie saw my tears before I saw hers. But she shed them in torrents when she saw that I was touched.

"I think," I said, "you have only one shift."

"And another, which I happened to have in my pocket. Everything I owned was left at my mother's."

"Set your heart at rest, my dear Rosalie, tomorrow you shall have everything you may need, and tomorrow evening you shall sup with me in the room I have rented on the third floor. I will take care of you, sleep in peace."

"Then you pity me?"

"I believe, my dear child, that I love you."

"God grant it!"

This heartfelt "God grant it" sent me away laughing, and the maidservant, who had been waiting two hours for me, stopped scowling[4] when she saw a six-franc piece. I ordered her to tell her master I would eat a fast-day supper in my room with Rosalie and that I liked to eat well.

I went to the "Thirteen Cantons," truly in love with the poor girl, whose real story I had finally heard from her own beautiful lips. I felt she had shown so much virtue that she seemed not yet to have committed any sin. I decided never to abandon her. It is the decision to which one always comes when one is in love.

The next morning I went out on foot with my hire valet, instructing him to take me to some ready-made establishment where I could buy my unfortunate Rosalie everything she needed in the way of attire which, though not luxurious, would not suggest poverty.

At fifteen she had the figure of a girl of twenty, with a fully developed bosom and everything in excellent proportion. I did not go wrong in a single measurement. I spent my whole morning making the purchases, and my valet took her a small trunk containing two dresses, shifts, petticoats, stockings, handkerchiefs, bonnets, gloves, slippers, a fan, a work bag, and a mantle. Delighted with having thus prepared a delicious spectacle for my soul, I could scarcely wait to enjoy it at supper.

The Knight of Malta dropped in and invited himself to dine with me, and I was glad of it. Afterward he persuaded me to go to the theater, for, he told me, it being a day on which the subscriptions were suspended, I should see the best people in Marseilles in the boxes and no light women in the amphitheater, for on these days they could get in only by paying. He introduced me to a woman who received people of standing at her house, and she invited me there; but I declined, saying that I had to leave. However, it was an acquaintance which proved useful in connection with what was to befall me not long after I arrived in Marseilles for the second time. Her name was Audibert.[5]

I did not wait for the end of the play before going to see Rosalie, whom I really believed I did not recognize when she appeared before me. She was a tall brunette with black eyes, narrow eyebrows, delicate features in a face without much color and white as a lily. Her cheeks had two dimples which appeared only when she smiled, and there was one on her chin. Her lower lip, of the most brilliant carmine and protruding a little beyond the upper, seemed made to receive a kiss and keep it from falling. All this made up a rare countenance, one of those which impress because they speak and make one long to know what they are saying. To see Rosalie's beauty rightly one had to see her smiling, and until then I had always seen her sad; sadness had vanished and given place to the sweetness of gratitude and satisfaction. Examining her attentively, I was proud of my handiwork; but I had to get over my surprise quickly, for I could not but apprehend that she might be afraid I was passing an unfavorable judgment on her. So I hastened to impart my thoughts to her, ending by assuring her that, she being such as God had made her, I should expose myself to eternal ridicule if I kept her with me as a servant.

"You shall, my dear Rosalie, be my indubitable mistress, and my servants shall show you the same respect they would show my wife."

At that Rosalie, as if restored from death to life, said what my various kindnesses had made her feel, her confused expressions flooding my soul with joy, for I was certain I was hearing no tricks of art.

Having had no mirror in her garret, she had dressed without using one. I saw that she did not dare go to a large mirror which was there, I urged her to look at herself, and I saw her laugh; she said she was inclined to think she was in disguise. She praised the tastefulness and simplicity of her dress, and she vented her anger at the thought that her mother would consider it all sinful.

"You must forget your cruel mother. You look like a lady of quality, and I shall feel proud in Genoa when I am asked if you are my daughter."

"In Genoa?"

"Yes, Genoa. You turn pale?"

"It is from surprise, for I may well see a man there whom I have not yet forgotten."

"Do you want to stay here?"

"No, no! Love me. Be sure that I prefer you, and not from mercenary motives."

"Now you want to cry. Let us embrace each other, my angel."

She came to my arms and showered me with the sweet tears she could not hold back. In this state we sat down at table, waited on by the only maidservant in the house. We had dishes even tastier than those I was given to eat at the "Thirteen Cantons." I ate cuttlefish, which are known as sipions[6] and which I found delicious, eel livers, a crab more delicate than those from the Atlantic; I ate like an Apicius[7] and was put out to find that Rosalie could not eat.

"Have you the failing, dear heart, of not liking to eat well?"

"No one has a better appetite than mine, and I have an excellent digestion, as you will see when my heart and my soul have become a little more accustomed to the joy which overwhelms me."

"But you are not drinking either, and this wine is excellent. If you like the Greek's muscat I will send for some. It will remind you of your lover."

"If you want to be completely kind to me, pray in future spare me the greatest mortification to which you can subject me."

"I will subject you to none, my dear Rosalie—please forgive me. It will not happen again."

"When I see you I am in despair because I did not know you before I knew him."

"That feeling is enough, my dear one; it is sublime just because you have drawn it only from your beautiful soul. You are beautiful and virtuous, for you yielded only to love, and when I think that you are mine I am in despair because I am not sure that you love me, for my Evil Genius wants me to believe that if I had not rescued you I should not see you loving."

"Evil Genius indeed! Certainly, if I had met you in the street without knowing you I should not have fallen madly in love with you; but I am equally certain that I should have found you pleasing. I feel that I love you, and that it is not because of your generosity, for I feel, too, that if I were rich and you poor I would do anything for you; but I do not want that. I prefer being in your debt to seeing you in mine. That is all I know, and all that my intelligence can compass. You must guess the rest."

It was midnight; we were still at table; and I see the old master of the house asking me if I am satisfied.

"Not merely satisfied, but grateful. Who prepared this supper?"

"My daughter; but it is expensive."

"Hang the expense, my friend; you will be satisfied with me as I am with you, and tomorrow night you shall serve me the same sort of supper; and the charming young woman you see there will feel better and will eat."

"She will have a good appetite in bed. The same thing happened to me sixty years ago. You laugh, Mademoiselle?"

"I am laughing at the pleasure you must take in remembering it."

"You are right. And that is why I forgive young people all the sins they commit for love."

"You are a wise man," I said.

"If he is wise," said Rosalie when he had gone, "my mother is a great fool."

"Would you like me to take you to the theater tomorrow?"

"No, no—please not! I would obey you, but it would distress me. No theater and no walks. How people would talk! Nothing in Marseilles; but everything anywhere else, and gladly."

"Just as you please. But you shall have this room. No more garret. We shall leave in three days."

"So soon?"

"Yes. You shall tell me tomorrow anything you need for traveling which I might overlook."

"Another lined mantle, half-length boots, a nightcap, combs, a powder bag, a powder puff, a pot of pomade, and a prayer book so that I can go to mass."

"Then you can read?"

"Read and write."

"Giving me such an order is real proof of your love; one cannot love without reliance. Don't fear that I may forget anything; but you shall see to the boots yourself; there is a bootmaker ten paces from here; you can have your measurements taken at once."

With all this talk I prepared Rosalie for the delicious night we spent together. We slept for seven hours, which were preceded and followed by two of caresses. We got up at noon knowing each other intimately. Rosalie addressed me as "tu," she no longer talked of gratitude, she had become used to happiness, and she laughed scornfully at her past afflictions. She came running to me in season and out of season, and in her enthusiasm she called me her child, who had brought her happiness, she devoured me with kisses, and, in short, she made me happy; and since in this life nothing is real except the present, I enjoyed it, dismissing the images of the past and loathing the darkness of the always dreadful future, for it offers nothing certain except death, ultima linea rerum ("the final boundary line of all things").[8]

My second night with Rosalie was more delightful than the first, for, having eaten a good supper and drunk sufficiently though moderately, in bed she was able to refine upon the pleasures of Venus and to surrender with less reserve to the furies she inspires.

I gave her a gold needle, with which to amuse herself tatting, and a watch. She said that she wanted one and would never have dared to ask me for it; but seeing that such a fear of displeasing me by asking me for something was a sign of little confidence in me, she promised, kissing me again and again, that in future she would not hide the slightest of her fancies from me. Thus did it please me to instruct her, and I was proud to think that the education I should give her would make her perfect.

On the fourth day I instructed her to be ready to get into my carriage as soon as I came to her room to give her my arm down the stairs. I told neither Leduc nor Costa anything; but I had told Rosalie that I had two servants with whom I often talked in order to laugh at the stupid things they said, but that she must be very reserved with them and beware of indulging in the slightest familiarity; she must give them absolute orders, never doubting that they would be obeyed immediately, but without pride, and must not let any soft-heartedness keep her from telling me if my servants failed in any way to show her respect.

So I set out from the "Thirteen Cantons" with four post horses, having relegated Leduc and Costa to the coachman's seat. My hire valet, whom I had paid liberally, had seen to tying Rosalie's trunk behind the carriage. I had the coachman stop at the door of the house in which she was waiting for me; I went to her room for her, and, after thanking the kind old man, who was sorry to see so likable a girl leave, I seated her in my carriage, ordering the postilions to take the road to Toulon, which I wanted to see before going to Italy. We reached it in five hours.

My dear Rosalie supped with me, maintaining a dignified manner, chiefly to impress Leduc, who claimed it was Costa's place to stand behind her chair. Without looking at him I told Rosalie that it was he who would have the honor to wait on her and to dress her hair whenever she wished; at that he gave in, making her a bow.

The next day we went to see the port,[9] and it was the Commandant himself who, happening to be there, did us the honor of showing us everything; I generously accorded him that of giving Rosalie his arm; and I had little difficulty in persuading him to stay to dinner with us.

Though with absolutely no experience of society, the girl spoke little but always well and responded with great charm to all the attentions and compliments which the amiable Commandant paid her.

In the afternoon he took us to see the arsenal, and politeness demanded that I accept his invitation to supper. There was no question of introducing Rosalie. It was the Commandant who introduced his wife, his daughter, and his son to me. I saw with pleasure that my young sweetheart held her own with women of fashion even better than with men. The ladies paid her every warm attention she could wish, and she received them as if to the manner born, with modesty and deference and that sweetness of manner which is the infallible sign of a good upbringing.

I was urgently invited to dinner the next day, but I took my leave. She jumped on my neck for joy when, back at the inn, I told her I had been thoroughly pleased with her.

"But," she said, "I'm always afraid of being asked who I am."

"In good company in France, my dear child, no one will ever ask you such a stupid question."

"But if I had been asked, how should I have answered?"

"By a subterfuge."

"What's that?"

" 'Please, Madam,—or Sir,—ask my traveling companion.' "

"I understand. It's called a subterfuge because it evades the question; but shouldn't I be rude if I answered that way?"

"Yes, but not as rude as the person who questioned you."

"And what would you answer if you were asked the same question?"

"That would depend on who asked it. If I didn't want to tell the truth, I should not be at a loss for things to say. In the meanwhile, I thank you for being interested in my lessons. Keep asking. You are my jewel, and it is my part to set you and make you shine. Let us go to bed, for we must leave early tomorrow so that we shall be at Antibes[10] the day after."

In that city I engaged a felucca[11] for Genoa, and, intending to return to France by the same route, I put my carriage in a stable, under a written agreement to pay six francs a month.

We left Antibes early; but two hours later, a strong wind having come up, and I seeing that my angel was dying with fear, I would not allow the sail to be hoisted. I had the felucca rowed into the harbor of Villefranche,[12] and, to find a good lodging, I hired a carriage and went to Nice,[13] where the bad weather obliged me to remain for three days.

I thought it my duty to make my bow to the Commandant, who was an old officer named Paterson.[14] The first thing he asked me was if I knew a Russian who went by the name of Charles Ivanov. I replied that I had seen him in a house in Grenoble.

"He is said to have escaped from Siberia and to be the youngest son of the Duke of Kurland."

"I have been told so too, but I know nothing about it."

"He has gone to Genoa, where a banker is said to have instructions to give him twenty thousand scudi; nevertheless, he found no one here who would give him a sou. I sent him to Genoa at my own expense to rid the city of him."

I was very glad that he had left before I arrived. An old officer named Ramini,[15] who was staying at my inn, asked me if I would take charge of a packet which Monsieur de Saint-Pierre,[16] the Spanish Consul, had to send to the Marchese Grimaldi in Genoa. I took charge of it with pleasure as soon as I learned that he was the same Marchese Grimaldi I had just seen in Avignon. Ramini also asked me if in Avignon I had met a Madame Stuard, who had spent two weeks in Nice with her so-called husband, penniless, never saying a word, enchanting everyone by her beauty, and not vouchsafing anyone so much as a smile. I told him she was no longer in Avignon and that it was I who had given her the means to leave there.

"But," I added, "how did she manage to get away from here without money?"

"Nobody knows. She left in a carriage, and the innkeeper was paid. I am very curious about her. The Marchese Grimaldi told me she refused a hundred louis he offered her and that she had treated a Venetian in the same fashion. Perhaps you are the man."

"I am he; but I gave her the money nevertheless."

Commandant Paterson came to see me toward nightfall, and I saw that he was enchanted by my beautiful Rosalie. What amused me in this city, where one ought to be bored and in which the midges devour foreigners in preference to the inhabitants, was a small faro bank at the coffeehouse,[17] at which I made Rosalie play too. Lucky on each of the three days, she won twenty Piedmontese pistole.[18] She put them in a little purse; and she told me afterward that her one wish was to have a purse with money in it. I was cross with her because, by not having confided this wish to me, she had broken her promise; but we made up without too much difficulty.

Thus did I bind her to me, hoping that I would keep her all the rest of my life and that, living happily with her, I should not need to run from one beauty to another.

The weather having turned fair, we set sail at nightfall and the next morning landed in Genoa, which I had never seen. I put up at the "Santa Marta" inn,[19] where, for decency's sake, I took two adjoining rooms, having my servants sleep in a closet next door.

The next morning I sent the package to Signor Grimaldi by Costa and later left my visiting card at the door of his palazzo.

I had a valet whom I engaged take me to a linen draper's, where I bought enough linen to keep Rosalie busy making up her deficiencies in that department. My gift gave her the greatest pleasure.

We were still at table when the Marchese Grimaldi was no sooner announced than he embraced me in person and thanked me for having taken charge of his packet. The first thing he asked me was for news of Madame Stuard, and after hearing the whole story he laughed and said he did not know what he would have done in my place.

As he was looking at Rosalie with great attention, I said that she was a young lady whose goodness interested me as much as her beauty. I told him I wanted to find her a decent girl who could serve her as chambermaid, sew with her, go out with her dressed in the costume of the country, and above all speak good Italian to her so that she could learn it, for I wanted to be able to introduce her in Florence, Rome, and Naples.

"Why will you not accord the city of Genoa such a great pleasure? I offer to introduce the young lady everywhere, beginning with my own house, by any name and style you may designate."

"She has very good reasons for seeing no one here."

"That is enough. Do you expect to spend some time here?"

"A month at most. Our pleasures will consist in seeing the city and its surroundings and going to the theater.[20] We shall spend agreeable hours at table, where we shall daily eat such excellent mushrooms[21] as we have eaten today."

"A delightful program, I could not offer you a happier life than the one you propose to lead here. I will try, Mademoiselle, to find you a girl who will serve you well in all capacities."

"You, Monsieur? You are very kind to take such an interest in me."

"My interest is infinite, and even greater now that I have the illusion that I am in Marseilles."

Rosalie blushed, for she did not know that she rolled her r's and hence a man who had traveled could instantly tell her native country; but I immediately enlightened her and so set her mind at rest.

I having asked Signor Grimaldi how I could obtain the Journal des Savants[22] and the Mercure de France[23] and all such publications, he promised to send me a vendor who would see to it. He said as he left that he would come to breakfast with me the next day if I would allow him to make me a present of his chocolate, which he promised himself I would find excellent. I replied that he could not give me a more welcome present.

After he left she asked me to take her to a milliner's, where she wanted to buy ribbons and other things she needed, paying for them with her own money and striking her own bargain without my interfering.

"With all my heart. And afterwards we will go to the play."

At the milliner's, who was French, I found my little mistress charming; she assumed a lofty air, pretended to know everything, ordered bonnets of the latest fashion, bargained, and spent five or six louis with great aplomb. I said when we left that I had been taken for her lackey and that I would have my revenge. So saying, I take her to a jeweler's shop, and I buy handsome paste buckles, earrings, and a necklace without letting her say a word, I pay the price asked, and we go out.

"My dear friend, what you bought is charming, but you don't know how to spend your money. If you had bargained you would have saved at least four louis."

We went to the play; but since she did not understand a word of it she was so bored that at the end of the first act she asked me to take her back to the inn. I found a small chest which Signor Grimaldi had sent me, containing twenty-four pounds of chocolate. I told Costa, who had boasted of his skill in preparing it, that when Signor Grimaldi arrived the next morning he was to serve us three cups of it.

He came at nine o'clock with a merchant who sold me two large pieces of the finest cotton, with a pattern of flowers in various colors on a white ground, made in Peking, from which Rosalie was to have two mezzaro[24] made so that she could go about Genoa with her head covered according to the custom of the city, as the zendale[25] is used in Venice and the mantilla[26] in Madrid.

I thanked him heartily for the generous present of chocolate he had sent me, which we found exquisite. Costa strutted when he heard Signor Grimaldi praise him for the foam he had ordered him to whip up; and a moment later Leduc announced a woman by a name unknown to me. Signor Grimaldi said she was the mother of the chambermaid I had asked him to procure for me.

I see a very well-dressed woman followed by a girl of twenty-three or twenty-four, whom, merely glancing at her, I find very pretty. The mother, after thanking the Marchese Grimaldi, introduces her daughter to Rosalie, describes all her accomplishments, says that she is a good girl, assures her that she will serve her faithfully and that she can go out with her honorably. She could speak French, she would find her cheerful and willing. That done, she told her how much a lady she had served had given her per month besides her board, and she ended by asking her not to make her eat with the servants, for her daughter's only weakness was insisting on being respected. Her name was Veronica.[27] Rosalie, after agreeing to everything, said that insisting on being respected was not a weakness, for one could only demand respect by being respectable.

"So I will keep her, and I hope she will love me."

Veronica takes her hand, and Rosalie, with modest and affable dignity, lets her kiss it. The mother leaves, telling her daughter that she will at once send her all her clothes, and Rosalie takes her to her room to begin giving her her orders.

I felt it incumbent on me to thank the nobleman most particularly, for I thought it obvious that his choice of such a chambermaid had been made more for my sake than for Rosalie's. I said that I would not fail to wait upon him and that I would ascertain at what hours he received. He said that I could easily find him at his casino in Sampierdarena,[28] where he often spent the night.

CHAPTER V

The play. The Russian. P-i. Rosalie at the convent.

AFTER HE left, seeing that Rosalie was very busy with Veronica, I went and amused myself translating L'Écossaise,[1] to have it played by the troupe then at Genoa, whom I thought quite good actors.

At dinner, finding Rosalie sad, I asked her the reason.

"That Veronica," she said, "is prettier than I am."

"She is nothing compared with you; and you are my only beauty; but to reassure you I will ask Signor Grimaldi tomorrow to tell her mother she must take her home and to find you another chambermaid who is very ugly instead."

"No, because he would think I am jealous, and that would distress me."

"Then cheer up, for it pains me to see you sad."

"Well then, my dear, you will see me gay again as soon as I am sure you do not love her."

"I can assure you that I did not even see her eyes."

"What an idea of the Signore's to give me such a pretty maid! Did he want to play a trick on me?"

"On the contrary, he wanted to convince you that you need fear comparison with nobody. Are you satisfied with her?"

"She works very well, and she is most respectful. She doesn't speak four words to me without calling me Signora, and whatever she says to me in Italian she immediately explains in French. In a month I shall be speaking it so well that we won't need to take her to Florence with us. I've ordered Leduc to move out of the closet and sleep somewhere else; and I will send her dinner from our table. I will treat her well; but remember to reassure me."

"That will be easy enough, for I cannot see that there will be anything in common between her and me."

"Then you forgive me for having felt afraid?"

"You would not have felt so if you loved me less."

"I thank you, but keep my secret."

I made up my mind never to look at Veronica, for I loved my Rosalie too much to cause her the slightest distress.

I spent the day without going out, translating L'Écossaise, and the next morning I stayed at Signor Grimaldi's[2] until noon.

I got a man to show me the way to the banker Belloni's[3] office, where I changed all the gold coins I had into Florentine zecchini;[4] and when I made myself known the head of the house did me every honor. I had some twelve or fourteen thousand Roman scudi on Belloni and twenty thousand on Lepri.[5]

I bought a piece of calencar[6] to keep Rosalie occupied, for she did not want to go to the theater again. I went by myself, and, returning to the inn, I found Signor Grimaldi with her and Veronica, giving them advice about the dress they were working on. I embraced the Senator,[7] then thanked Rosalie for having received him, saying gently that she ought to have left off sewing.

"Ask him, my dear, if he didn't force me to go on. He offered to leave."

With that, leaving Veronica to work on alone, she rose and, playing the role of mistress admirably, she managed to persuade the Marchese to sup with us, thus divining my wish. He ate almost nothing, for he did not usually sup; but I saw with pleasure that my jewel enchanted him. I thought I had nothing to fear from a man of sixty, besides which I was very glad to seize the opportunity to give Rosalie the education proper to a woman of standing, who cannot hope for the approval and applause of the best society unless she flirts.

Rosalie, though a novice in the art, and indeed unaware that such an art existed, nevertheless made me admire nature; she spoke to Signor Grimaldi in a manner from which a thinker could read that she wanted to foster his inclination by giving him hope. When he left she told him that she would be grateful if on another occasion he would dine less well, for she was curious to see him eat.

I took her in my arms a moment later to devour her with kisses, asking her where she had learned to converse with people of the great world.

"It is you, my dear, who speak to my soul; you tell me with your eyes whatever I should say and do."

After having Costa copy out my translation of L'Écossaise, I put it in my pocket and went with it to Rossi,[8] the head of the troupe of actors, who, as soon as he learned that I would make him a present of it, offered to have it performed at once. I gave him the names of the actors I had chosen, and invited him to come to dine at the "Santa Marta" with them to hear it read and to give out the parts, which I wished to assign myself.

Rosalie was delighted to dine with the three actresses and the actors who were to perform the play and to hear herself constantly being called Signora Casanova,[9] and even more so to see that it pleased me; Veronica interpreted all the words she did not understand.

As soon as they were seated in a circle they asked me to tell them the names of the characters I had decided they were to play; but they could not shake me: I told them that they must listen to the play, each not knowing what part I intended for him, but that he would be told immediately afterward. They all submitted to my decree, and just when I was ready to begin reading the Marchese Grimaldi arrived and, at the same time, the banker Belloni, come to return my visit. I was very glad to have them present at the reading, which lasted only an hour and a quarter.

After receiving the approval of the players, who by their praise of the situations convinced me that they had all listened to the whole play, I told Costa to give out the parts to the names I had indicated. I then saw both the leading lady and the leading man dissatisfied—she because I had given her the part of Lady Alton, he because I had not given him the part of Murray;[10] but they had to put up with it. I invited them to dinner on the next day but one, for a reading rehearsal of the play.

The banker Belloni invited me to dinner the next day with my lady, who very politely declined, and Signor Grimaldi willingly let her persuade him to keep her company in my stead.

At dinner at the banker's I was surprised to see the impostor Charles Ivanov, who, instead of pretending not to know me, came forward to embrace me; I drew back and made him a bow. Some of the people present may have attributed it to respect. He was richly accoutered; he talked constantly, affecting a certain haughty melancholy, and on the subject of politics he spoke rather intelligently. The conversation having turned to the Court of Russia, where Elisabeth Petrovna[11] was then reigning, he said nothing but sighed and turned away, pretending to dry his tears. At dessert he asked me if I had news of Madame Morin,[12] saying, as if to recall her to my mind, that it was at her house we had supped together; I replied that I knew she was in good health. His servant who waited on him at table wore a yellow livery with red braid. After dinner he found an opportunity to say that he urgently needed to talk with me.

"And I never to let it appear that we are in private communication anywhere."

"You can, by saying no more than a word, put me in a position to obtain a hundred thousand scudi, and I will give you fifty thousand."

I turned my back on him, and in Genoa I did not see him again.

Back at the inn, I found Signor Grimaldi teaching Rosalie Italian. He said that she had given him an exquisite repast, and that she must make me happy. Though observing all the proprieties, Signor Grimaldi was in love with her; but I remained unafraid. As he left she prevailed on him to attend the reading rehearsal of L'Écossaise the next day.

When the actors arrived, seeing a young man with them whom I had never seen before, I asked Rossi who he was.

"He is the prompter."

"No prompter. Send him away."

"We cannot do without a prompter."

"I will do the prompting. Send him away."

He sent him away, but the women especially refused to listen to reason. They said that even supposing they knew their parts as well as they knew their Paternoster they were sure to forget them if they did not see him in his box.

"He won't need to prompt us, but we have to see him."

"Very well," I said to the actress who was playing Lindane,[13] "I will get into the box myself, and I will see your underdrawers."

"She doesn't wear any," said the first lover.

"You don't know anything about it," she rejoined.

This exchange put us in a gay mood, and the votaries of Thalia[14] promised me that they would not need a prompter. I was well pleased with them at the reading rehearsal. They asked only three days to be ready to speak their parts from memory, and I was satisfied.

They came, but without the actress who played Lindane and the actor who played Murray. They were both ill, but Rossi vouched for them. I took the part of Murray, inviting Rosalie to read Lindane. She whispered to me that she could not read Italian well enough and did not want to set the actors laughing. She said that Veronica might read the part.

"Very well."

She asks Veronica if she will read it, and she says she does not need to read it since she knows it by heart.

"So much the better."

I laughed to myself, remembering Soleure. Chance was forcing me to talk love to Veronica, to whom, during the two weeks she had been with us, I had never addressed a word. I had not even really looked at her face, such was my dread of Rosalie's love taking alarm.

What I feared happened. At the scene in which I had to take Veronica's hand and say to her: Sí, bella Lindane, debbo adorarvi ("Yes, beautiful Lindane, I cannot but adore you"),[15] all present applauded, for I spoke the words as they should be spoken. I glance at Rosalie, and I am in despair to see her uneasy, though she was trying to hide it. But Veronica's acting amazed me; she blushed furiously when, taking her hand and pressing it, I said I adored her; it was impossible to act a girl in love better. We set the date for the final dress rehearsal at the theater, and the players, to excite curiosity, began announcing the date of the first performance a week beforehand, putting up bills in these terms: "We shall give L'Écossaise by Monsieur de Voltaire, translated by an unknown hand, and we shall perform it without a prompter.''

But how hard I found it after that rehearsal to soothe Rosalie! She would not be consoled, she wept and, thinking she was reproaching me, said the most touching things. She said that I was in love with Veronica and that I had translated the play on purpose to tell her so.

After I convinced her that she was wrong by good arguments and by tokens of the most loyal affection, she at last became calm, and the next day she asked my forgiveness, saying that she wanted me to cure her of her jealousy by talking to Veronica in her presence at every opportunity. She did more. Having got up first, she sent me a cup of chocolate by Veronica herself, who I saw was as astonished as I.

From that day on she showed no more signs of jealousy, and she was more courteous than ever to the girl, who was decidedly intelligent and with whom I saw that I could easily have fallen in love if my heart had been free.

On the day of the first performance she sat with her in a box I had taken, where Signor Grimaldi never left her side. The play was an unqualified success. The very large theater in Genoa was filled not with the populace but with the noblest and wealthiest in that great city. The actors, playing without a prompter, were pronounced excellent, and what they thought extraordinary was that the public demanded five more performances. Rossi, perhaps hoping that I would give him another play, asked my permission to present my supposed wife with a lynx-fur pelisse, which she greatly cherished.

But now for an unfortunate remark which, by my own fault, troubled the fair soul of that angel incarnate, whose happiness God nevertheless allowed me to assure.

''I have reason,'' she said to me one day, ''to suspect that I am pregnant. How my soul will rejoice if I can give you a pretty little boy!''

"If he is born at such and such a time, he will surely be mine, and he will be dear to me."

"And if he should be born two or three weeks earlier you would not be sure of it?"

"No, but I shall love him: he will be yours. I will provide for him even so."

"He could only be yours, I am sure of it. This time I really am unhappy. It is impossible, my dear, that I conceived by P-i,[16] for he was with me only once, and very imperfectly, whereas you know how lovingly we have been together so many times."

"Ah, my dear, do not weep, I implore you. You are right. What I told you is possible, but it is not likely. The child shall be mine, I will never doubt it, calm yourself."

"How can I calm myself now that I know you believed there might be any doubt about it?"

We said no more on the subject, but I often saw her sad and thoughtful. Tenderly amorous, I held her in my arms for hours on end, and she gave herself to love, but her pleasures seemed often to be interrupted by sighs which were not in harmony with the security an amorous soul should feel. I sorely repented of having troubled her with my stupid calculations.

A week or ten days later she came to me and gave me a sealed letter, saying that the hire valet had given it to her, taking advantage of a moment when I would not see him. She said that she felt insulted. I send for him and I ask him from whom he had received the letter.

"A young man whom I do not know gave me a scudo to do him the favor of delivering the letter to the Signora without your seeing it, and promised me two if I would bring him the answer tomorrow at the Banchi.[17] I did not think I was doing anything wrong, for the Signora was at liberty to tell you."

"That is true, but I shall dismiss you because the Signora, who, as you see, has not unsealed the letter, considers that by acting as you did you showed her disrespect.''

I told Leduc to pay him off, and so he was dismissed. I open the letter and I see that it is signed ''P-i.'' Rosalie leaves me and goes to her room to sew with Veronica. Here is the letter:

''I saw you, my dear Rosalie, enter a sedan chair when you came out of the theater escorted by His Excellency the Marchese Grimaldi, my godfather. I did not deceive you. I still intended to go to Marseilles in the spring and marry you, as I promised. I love you faithfully, and if you are willing to become my wife I am ready to give you my hand at once in my parents' presence. If you have done anything wrong, I will never reproach you with it, for I recognize that I am the cause of it. Tell me if you are willing for me to go to Signor Grimaldi and explain my intentions to him; I hope that he will have the goodness to vouch to you for me. I am also ready to receive you, without making any difficulties, from the hands of the gentleman with whom you are living, if you have not become his wife. Consider, if you are free, that your honor becomes spotless as soon as he who seduced you marries you.—P-i.''

''There,'' I said to myself, ''is an honorable man who deserves Rosalie, and here, in my own person, is a very dishonorable one if I do not let him have her, unless I instantly marry her. Rosalie shall decide.'' I call her, I give her the letter to read, she hands it back to me, and she asks me if I advise her to accept P-i's proposal. I reply that if she accepts it I shall die of grief, but that my honor demands that, if I will not give her up, I must marry her, and that I am ready. She flings herself on my neck, she says she loves no one but me, and that it is not true that my honor demands that I marry her.

''My dear Rosalie, I adore you, but I beg you to believe that you cannot know better than I do what my honor demands. If this P-i is a man of means who can make you happy, I must, even if it kills me, either advise you to accept his hand or offer you mine."

"Neither. We need be in no hurry. If you love me I am happy. I love you alone. I will not answer his letter. I want to hear no more of P-i."

"I will never mention him to you again, you may be sure; but you will see that the Marchese Grimaldi will do something about it."

"So he will; but you can be no less sure that he will speak of it to me only once."

"And to me too."

After this treaty of alliance, I decided to leave upon receiving the letters for Florence and Rome for which I had asked Signor Bragadin.[18] I lived with my dear Rosalie in the sweet peace of love; she was no longer jealous; the Marchese Grimaldi alone was the honorable witness of our happiness.

It was five or six days after P-i's letter was written that Signor Grimaldi, at his casino in Sampierdarena, said that he was very glad to see me for he wished to speak to me about a matter which should be of interest. Instantly guessing what it must be, and knowing what my answer must be, I asked him to speak. Here is what he said:

"A worthy merchant of our city came to me the other day to present his nephew, whose name is P-i. He told me that he was my godson, and I was convinced of it; he asked for my protection, and I replied that I would consider it my duty to be of use to him whenever the occasion arose; as his godfather, I owed him that.

"Thereupon my godson, left alone with me, told me that he had known your mistress in Marseilles before you did, that he had promised to return there and marry her in the spring of next year, that he had seen her come out of the theater here with me, that he had followed her, that he had learned she was living with you, that he had been told she was your wife, that he had not believed it, that he had written her a letter, which had come into your hands, in which he told her that he was ready to marry her, and that he had not received an answer. He had decided to appeal to me to learn if Rosalie accepted his proposal, and in that case he made bold to hope for my countenance, acquainting me with his entire financial condition so that I could vouch for him and be convinced that he was in a position to make her happy. I replied that I would speak about the matter to you and would let him know the outcome.

"Before speaking to you I inquired into the young man's financial situation and I learned that he already disposes of a considerable capital, that he has good morals and an excellent reputation on the Exchange. In addition, he is heir to all the property of the uncle who brought him to me. Tell me what answer I shall give him."

"You shall answer him that Rosalie thanks him and begs him to forget her. You know that we shall leave in three or four days. Rosalie loves me as much as I love her, and she will find me ready to marry her whenever she wishes it."

"That is clearly spoken. But I believe that to a man of your nature freedom must be far more precious than marriage. Will you permit me to discuss the matter with Rosalie myself?"

"You do not need my permission. Speak to her; but, of course, not as if you were speaking on my behalf, for, adoring her as I do, I cannot give her any reason to suppose that I could want her to leave me."

"If you object to my acting in the matter, speak out."

"On the contrary, I shall be delighted that you can swear I am not my dear Rosalie's tyrant."

"I will speak to her this evening."

To give the Marchese leisure to talk with her I did not come home until suppertime; he supped with us, and, after he left, she told me all that he had said. He had told her what he had told me; she had answered him as I had answered him, with only the addition that she had begged him not to mention P-i to her again; and he had promised not to say another word about him.

It was over and done with; we prepared to leave Genoa.

Three or four days after Signor Grimaldi had last talked to Rosalie on the subject of P-i, when we believed he had put the matter out of his mind, he asked me to bring her to dine with him at Sampierdarena. She had never been there, and he wanted her to see his garden before we left. We accepted.

So at noon the next day we are at his charming casino. We find him with an elderly couple whom he introduces to us, and he introduces me by my name and the young lady as my companion.

We all go to walk in the garden, and the couple take Rosalie between them, treating her with the most courteous amiability; she replies in kind, she is gay, she speaks Italian with them; the compliments she receives flatter her; after half an hour's stroll dinner is announced, we go to the dining room, I see six places. I guessed what was to come, but it was too late. We sit down at table, and just then in comes a young man. The Marchese tells him he is late and very quickly introduces him to me as Signor P-i, his godson and the nephew of the lady and gentleman who were present. He makes him sit down at his left, Rosalie was at his right, and I was seated beside her. I see her turn deathly pale; I was shaking from head to foot with rage. I find the Genoese aristocrat's procedure hard to swallow; it was a surprise, an unforgivable affront put upon Rosalie and me, which demanded that I avenge it in blood; and in the tumult of my soul I yet understand that I must champ the bit. What could I do? Take Rosalie's arm and leave with her? I thought of it; and, foreseeing the consequences, I did not have the courage to do it. I never spent a more torturing hour at table. Neither she nor I ate anything, and the Marchese, who served the guests, was wise enough to pretend not to notice that we sent back our plates untouched. During the whole dinner he talked to no one but P-i or his uncle on the subject of his business. When dinner was over he told the former that he could go about his occupations, and, after kissing his hand, he left.

He was a young man about twenty-four years of age, of middling stature, of undistinguished but good-natured and honest countenance, extremely respectful in manner, who spoke without brilliance but with good sense. I decided that he was not unworthy of Rosalie, but I trembled to think that I could not see her become his wife except by losing her. After he left, the Marchese chided his uncle for never having introduced the young man to him, as he could certainly have been useful to him in his business.

"But I am sure," he added, "that I shall be of use to him in future, and that I will help him to fortune."

Thereupon the uncle and aunt, who must have known everything, bestowed all kinds of praise on him, saying, as if in passing, that, having no children, they were delighted to see that he who would inherit all they possessed enjoyed His Excellency's countenance. They could not wait to see the young lady from Marseilles to whom he was engaged and to welcome her to their arms as their own daughter.

It was then that Rosalie, unable to bear more, said to me that she felt she would be ill if I did not escort her back to the inn at once, and I took leave of the Marchese, forcing myself to remain controlled. I saw that he was taken aback. Not knowing what to say, he beat about the bush; he told her that he hoped her indisposition would come to nothing, that he should not have the honor to see her that evening, but that he would not fail to do so the next day; and he gave her his arm to her sedan chair.

As soon as we were back at the "Santa Marta" and alone together we began to breathe again and to relieve our troubled souls with talk. She rightly felt that the Marchese had played a detestable trick on us; she decided that I must write him a note asking him not to trouble to visit us again. I assured her that I would find a way to avenge her; I said that I did not think it advisable to write him a note, but that we should hasten our departure and receive him the next day in a manner which would make him realize all our indignation. Serious bearing, purely formal greetings, politeness, complete concealment, and above all no reply to anything he might say concerning what he had done. Speaking of P-i, she said that if he loved her he was to be pitied, that she thought him honest, and that she could not hold his being at the dinner against him, since he might not have known that his presence at it was an affront to her.

"I thought I should die," she said, "when our eyes met; afterward he was not in a position to see me, and I do not know if he looked at me when he left."

"No, he looked at me, and I pity him too. He is a decent fellow."

"The worst is over, and I hope I shall have a good appetite at supper. Did you hear his aunt? She was apparently in the plot; she said she was ready to treat me like her own daughter. I think she is a very good woman."

After a good supper Love and Morpheus helped us to forget the affront the Marchese had put upon us, and to such effect that when we woke we were able to laugh at it. He came toward nightfall and, approaching me with a look of mortification, said that he had been unpardonably at fault in surprising us as he had done, and that he was ready, if the fault could be repaired, to accord me whatever satisfaction I might ask of him. Rosalie, not giving me time to reply, said that if he felt that he had treated us improperly, we considered ourselves adequately avenged and hence satisfied, and also under the necessity of being on our guard against him on every occasion, though it was difficult to foresee another, since we were on the verge of leaving.

After this proud answer she curtsied to him and went to her room. Thus left alone with me, he spoke as follows:

"Being immeasurably interested in your mistress's welfare, and knowing from experience that it is very improbable she can long be happy in any other situation than that which a girl of her character attains by marrying a young man of the character of my godson P-i, I resolved to make you both acquainted with him, for Rosalie herself knew him only very slightly. To accomplish this, I used a stratagem which I admit was dishonorable but which I trust you will forget for the sake of my good intention. I wish you a good journey, I hope that you will long live happily with this charming girl, I ask you to let me have news of you and to count on my friendship, my influence, and my best endeavors under all circumstances. So much for that. It remains for me only to confide one thing to you, in order that you may have a just idea of the young man's excellent character, whom, by his own avowal, Rosalie alone can make happy. He did not confide to me what you are about to hear until he saw that I would not undertake to deliver a letter which he had written to Rosalie, despairing of conveying it to her in any other way.

"After assuring me that Rosalie had loved him, and that hence she could feel no aversion to him, he added that if perhaps she could not resolve to become his wife because she believed she was pregnant he was content to defer the marriage until after she had borne her child, provided she would be willing to remain in Genoa in some place where her presence would be known to him alone. He offers to defray all her expenses, accompanying his proposal by a very wise consideration. Her being brought to bed too soon after her marriage, he said, would reflect on his honor and stand in the way of the affection which his parents should feel for his children."

He had scarcely finished speaking before Rosalie enters and surprises us with these words:

"If Signor P-i has not told you it is possible that I am pregnant by him, he is a very honorable young man; but it is I who tell you so. It seems to me very unlikely, but it is still a possibility. Tell him that I will remain in Genoa until after my delivery if I am pregnant, or until I am sure that I am not, and in that case I will go to join my friend here wherever he may be. The time at which I am delivered will show me the truth. If I am convinced that my child is Signor P-i's, tell him that he will find me ready to become his wife, and if he is himself convinced that it cannot be his, he must resign himself to forgetting me. As for my expenses, and the place where I shall stay, tell him he is not to take any steps in the matter or to concern himself with it in any way."

My astonishment left me half dazed. The Marchese asked me if I authorized him to convey her message, and I replied that I could have no will but Rosalie's. He left well satisfied.

"So you want to leave me?" I asked Rosalie.

"Yes, my dear; but not for long, if I can count on your constancy. My heart, and your honor and mine, command me, if I am pregnant, to make P-i certain that it is not by him, and you at the same time that it can only be by you."

"I shall have no doubt of it, my dear Rosalie."

"You have already doubted it, and that is enough. Our separation will cause me tears, but it is necessary for the peace of my soul. I hope that you will write to me; and after my delivery it will be for you to tell me how I am to join you, and if I am not pregnant we shall be able to meet again at the latest toward the end of this winter."

"I must consent to whatever is your wish. I think you should go to stay in a convent, and I see no one but the Marchese to find one for you and to look after you like a father. Shall I speak to him about it? I will leave you money enough for your expenses."

"It will be no great amount; there is no need for you to speak to Signor Grimaldi, for he will offer me his services himself. Honor demands it of him."

She was right; and I admired her intelligence in her knowledge of the human heart, of the conduct befitting a nobleman, and of the laws of honor. The next morning I saw that the Russian adventurer had fled an hour before the police arrived to take him to prison on the complaint of the banker, who had found a letter of credit he had presented him to be a forgery. He had fled on foot, abandoning everything; so the banker lost very little.

The next morning the Marchese came to tell Rosalie that P-i had found nothing to object to in her plan and that he hoped she would be willing to become his wife after her delivery even if her calculations showed that the child was not his.

"He is free to entertain the hope," she said with a smile.

"He hopes, too, that you will occasionally grant him the honor of visiting you. I have spoken to the Superior of the XXX convent, who is distantly related to me; you will have two rooms, a decent woman who will keep you company, wait on you, and even deliver you if that proves to be necessary. I have settled the price of your board by the month, and every morning I will send you a confidential man of mine who will confer with your waiting woman and convey all your orders to me. I will myself visit you from time to time at the grating when you give me permission."

It was now my duty to thank the Marchese. I said that it was to him that I entrusted my dear Rosalie, and that I intended to leave on the day after she had gone alone to the convent he had found for her, giving the Superior a letter which he would have the goodness to write for her. He wrote it at once, and Rosalie having told him that she wanted to pay all her expenses herself, he put in writing the terms to which he had agreed. When he left she told him that she would retire to the convent the next day and that she would be delighted to see him at the grating the day after that. He promised he would be there.

We spent the sad night which two souls in love could not but spend when reason had commanded them to part. Complaints, consolations, endless alternatives, and promises which we were sure we would keep but which had yet to be confirmed by Destiny, into whose councils no mortal has ever been admitted.

She spent the whole morning packing with Veronica, who wept and at whom I did not look because I was angry with myself for finding her attractive. Rosalie would accept no more than two hundred zecchini from me, saying that, if she needed it, I could easily find a way to send her money. After asking Veronica to take good care of me during the two or three days I had decided to stay on in Genoa, she dropped me a silent curtsy, and she left, escorted to her sedan chair by Costa. Two hours later a servant of Signor Grimaldi's came for all her things, and I remained alone and very sad until the nobleman himself arrived to ask me to give him supper, at the same time advising me to have Veronica sup with us.

"She is an excellent girl," he said, "whom you really do not know and whom you will not be sorry to know better."

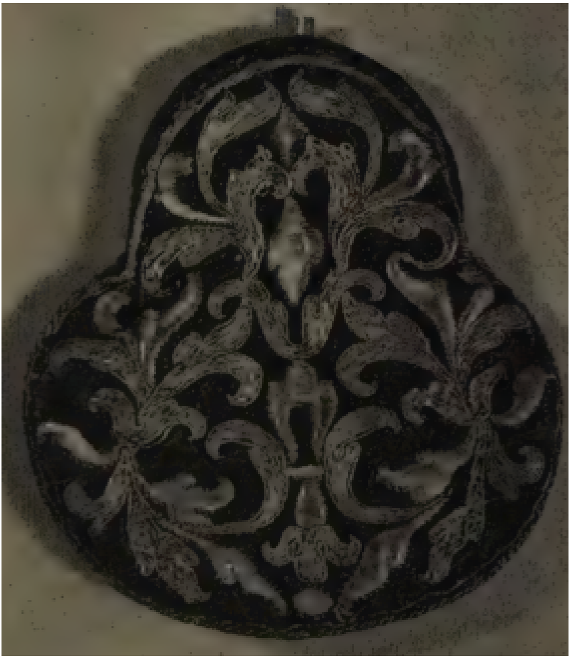
Though somewhat surprised, I at once went and asked her to do me the favor. She accepted the invitation, assuring me that she was sensible of all the honor I did her.

Nothing short of being the greatest fool on earth could have prevented me from seeing clearly that the wily Genoese had perfectly accomplished his purpose, tricking me as if I had been the rawest novice. Despite my having good reasons to hope that Rosalie would return to me, I foresaw that he would set about persuading her otherwise so artfully that he would succeed. I could only pretend to be aware of nothing and let things take what course they would.

His Excellency was nearly sixty years of age, a great epicure, a heavy gambler, rich, eloquent, an accomplished politician, highly regarded in his native country, who had long lived in Venice in order the better to enjoy his freedom and the pleasures of life, and who contrived to return there after being Doge despite the law[19] which forbids patricians who have been granted that high office to leave their country again. In spite of the friendliness which he always showed me he was able to maintain a tone of superiority which awed me. If he had not known that he possessed this ascendancy he would not have dared to trick me into dining with P-i. He made a dupe of me, and it became my part to win his esteem by resolving to act as I acted. It was from gratitude that he undertook to smooth my way to the conquest of Veronica after he made me fall in love with her.

At table, where I said almost nothing, he engaged her in arguments, and she shone. I clearly saw that she was delighted to convince me that she was more intelligent than Rosalie. Nothing could have been more calculated to displease me. Grimaldi, who was put out to see me gloomy, forced me to join in the conversation by leading Veronica to say that I was right to remain silent after the declaration of love which I had made to her and which she had received with disdain. Very much astonished, I said that I did not remember having loved her, still less having told her so. But I had to laugh when she replied that on that day her name was Lindane.

"Such a thing," I said, "can happen to me only in a play. The man who declares his love by words is a fool, he should speak only by his attentions."



Lady's Coin Purse of Green Damask

"Even so, the Signora took fright."

"Not a bit of it. She was fond of you."

"I know it; nevertheless she was jealous."

"If she was, she had no reason to be."

Our dialogue greatly amused the Senator, who said to me as he left that he would pay his first visit to Rosalie the next day and would bring me news of her at supper. I said that I would expect him. Veronica, after accompanying me to my room, asked me to let my servants wait on me, for, "The Signora being no longer there, people might suspect the worst."

I said she was right, and I rang for Leduc.

The next morning I received a letter from Geneva. It was from my friend the Syndic,[20] who said that he had presented Monsieur de Voltaire, on my behalf, with my translation of L'Écossaise, together with the very polite letter in which I asked him to excuse me for having made bold to turn his beautiful French prose into Italian. He said in so many words that he had pronounced my translation bad.

This news, and his impoliteness in not answering my letter, so irritated and offended me that I became that great man's enemy. From then on I criticized him in all the works I published, thinking to avenge myself by wronging him. It is I whom my critics will wrong if my works reach posterity. I will be reckoned among the Zoïluses[21] who dared to attack the great genius. The only wrong he did was seen in his invectives against religion. If he had been a good philosopher he would never have said anything on the subject, for even supposing that all he said of it was true, he should have known that the populace needs to live in ignorance for the sake of the general peace of the nation. Vetabo qui Cereris[22] sacrum vulgarit arcanae sub iisdem sit trabibus, etc. ("I will deny my roof to him who has revealed the rites of mystic Ceres").[23]

CHAPTER VI

I am in love with Veronica. Her sister. Ruse against ruse. My victory. Mutual disappointment.

NOT LIKING to eat alone, I ordered two places set. Veronica, after supping with us, deserved the distinction. Seeing only Costa behind my chair, I asked him where Leduc was; he said that he was ill; I told him to stand behind the Signorina's chair; he obeyed me with a smile. How absurd is the pride of servants! I thought Veronica prettier than usual. Her bearing, free and reserved as occasion demanded, convinced me that she could easily have played the role of princess in select company. Feeling distressed to see that she attracted me, I sadly consoled myself with the knowledge that her mother was to come for her that day. Such was the state of my soul.

We were at dessert when her mother came. She immediately made a pretense of thanking me for the honor I did her daughter. I reply that it was she who did me honor, for she was beautiful, intelligent, and good.

"Thank the Signore," she said, "for his three presents, for you are ugly, stupid, and ill-behaved. Oh, the slut!

You are dining with the Signore and I see that your shift is dirty."

"Excuse me, Mother, I put it on clean this morning."

"Permit me to say, Signora," I said to her mother, "that a shift can hardly look white against her skin."

My compliment made the mother laugh and greatly flattered the girl. When her mother told her she had come to take her home she replied that she was not sure she would be doing me a favor by leaving me twenty-four hours before my departure; and I added that on the contrary she would be doing me an ill turn.

"In that case," said her mother, "decency demands that I send you her younger sister, who will sleep with her."

I told her it was the thing to do, and I left them together.

Veronica was proving to be a difficulty, for I had found her too attractive at table, and, knowing myself, I must fear an attempt at resistance worse than death.

Her mother came in to wish me a good journey and the girl began busying herself with my linen. I sat down to write.

Toward nightfall a maid comes in with her sister Annetta,[1] who, after lowering her mezzaro,[2] kissed my hand, then joyfully embraced her sister. The maid, after putting down a package, left. Very curious to see Annetta's face, I at once called for lights. I saw a very young girl of a blondeness whose equal I had never seen. Her hair, her eyebrows were even whiter than her skin, which their excessive fairness darkened a little. She was so short-sighted that she was nearly blind; but her blue eyes were beautiful and very large. If the enamel of her teeth had not been tinged with yellow the girl could have passed for a rare beauty. The poor girl shuddered away from the strong light. She stood there, apparently content that I should examine her, showing the upper halves of two little breasts which seemed to be of marble and which informed my speculative mind that her entire body was of the same whiteness. Veronica was not generous in this respect; one saw that her bosom must be extremely beautiful, but it was always covered by a kerchief even when she was most negligently dressed; she made her sister sit down beside her and at once gave her some sewing to do. Finding it distressing to watch her, for in order to sew she had to hold the cloth an inch from her eyes, I told her that, at least at night, she need not do needlework, and she stopped as if out of obedience.

The Marchese Grimaldi arrived, and Annetta, whom he had never seen, was as much of a surprise to him as she was to me. He passed his beneficent hand over her pretty little bosom, the humble Annetta not daring to protest, and congratulated her on it.

A girl who, by the little she allows a man to see, makes him curious to see the rest has already gone two thirds of the way toward making him fall in love; for what is love if it is not a kind of curosity? I defy anyone to produce a more powerful curiosity in nature. Annetta had already made me curious.

Signor Grimaldi told Veronica that Rosalie asked her to stay with me until I left. I saw that Veronica was as astonished as I was by her insistence. I then told the Marchese to inform Rosalie that she had anticipated her wish and for that reason had sent for her sister Annetta.

"Two," he replied, "are better than one."

We then went to the other room, where he told me that Rosalie was content, and I should congratulate myself on having made her a happy woman, that he was sure she would become one, and that he was only sorry there was every reason why I should not go to see her.

"You are in love with her," I said.

"Certainly, and I regret being an old man."

"That makes no difference. She will love you dearly, and if P-i becomes her husband she can never feel anything toward him but cold friendliness. You shall write me at Florence how she will have received him."

"Remain here three more days and you will know. I believe you have no urgent business, stay here; these two girls will keep you entertained."

"It is precisely because I foresee they may do so that I want to leave tomorrow. Veronica terrifies me."

"I did not think you were a man to be terrified."

"I am afraid she has set out to torment me, for I think she is one to make a parade of virtue. I can love only Rosalie."

"Speaking of Rosalie, here is a letter she wrote you."

I unseal it and I go to a window to read it. Here is what it contained:

"My dear one. You leave me in the hands of a fond father, who will not let me want for anything until the time when I shall be in no further doubt concerning my condition. I will write you at whatever address you give me. If Veronica pleases you I should be wrong to feel jealous at this time. I believe she cannot resist you, and that she will drive away your sorrow, which really distresses me. Write me a line before you leave."[3]

I gave it to the Marchese to read, and I saw that he was touched.

"Yes," he said, "she will find me a fond father; and, if it becomes her duty to marry my godson, if he does not treat her well he shall not have her long. She will be happy even after my death. But did you see what she says to you about Veronica? I don't believe she is a Vestal,[4] though I have heard no gossip about her."

I had ordered four places set; so Annetta joined us at the table without waiting to be asked. Seeing Leduc, I told him that if he was ill he could go to bed.

"I am in good health."

"So much the better. Be off with you. You shall wait on me at table in Leghorn."

I saw that Veronica was delighted with his dismissal.

I determined to make love to her openly, treating her to meaning remarks at table while the Marchese addressed amusing ones to Annetta. Having turned the conversation to my journey, I asked him if I could have a felucca for Lerici[5] the next day.

"At whatever hour you wish, and with as many rowers; but I hope you will stay on for three or four days."

"No, for the delay might cost me dear."

Glancing at Veronica, I saw her smile. When supper was over, I having set myself to question Annetta, the Marchese talked with Veronica for a quarter of an hour, then came to me and said that he had been urged to ask me to stay for another three days or at least for supper the next day.

"Very well. We will talk about the three days at supper tomorrow."

The Marchese was exultant, and Veronica showed that she was pleased by my yielding. After he left I asked her if I might send Costa off to bed. She answered that, since her sister was with her, no one could suspect anything wrong. So she began dressing my hair for the night, while Annetta went to her room to unpack her things. To all my soft speeches she made no answer. When I was ready to go to bed she wished me good night, I make to embrace her, and her refusal surprises me. I tell her that I need to speak to her and to have her answer, and I invite her to sit down beside me.

"Why did you refuse me a pleasure which, after all, is only a token of friendship?"

"Because it is impossible that, being what we are, we should be merely friends; and we cannot be lovers."

"Why cannot we be lovers, since we are free?"

"I am not free from the prejudices for which you care nothing."

"I thought your mind was superior to—"

"A pitiful superiority which is always its own dupe!

What would become of me if I gave in to the feeling you inspire in me?"

"I expected that, my dear Veronica. No. The feeling I inspire in you is not love. It would be like mine. Love tramples on the prejudices which fetter it."

"I admit that you have not yet turned my head, but I know that when you go away I shall be sad for a time."

"If that is so it will not be my fault; but tell me what I can do to make you happy during the short time I shall be here."

"Nothing, because neither of us can be sure of anything about the other."

"And for that reason I am sure I shall never marry until I shall have become my mistress's friend."

"In other words, when you have ceased to be her lover."

"Precisely."

"You want to end where I want to begin."

"I wish you happiness; but it is staking too much. It seems to me, beautiful Veronica, that we could play at love unscathed, spending some happy hours together which prejudice would not have time to trouble."

"It is possible; but the mere thought of it frightens me, for it might undo me. Oh, no! Let me alone. Look, there is my sister taking fright because she sees me defending myself."

"Very well, I see that I am wrong. Rosalie was mistaken."

"What! What can she have thought?"

"She writes me that she thinks you kind."

"She is very fortunate if she has not had reason to repent of having been too kind."

She went off to bed, and so did I, regretting that I had approached her. I promised myself that I would leave her to her morality, whether genuine or feigned. But when I woke I saw her coming to my bedside so sweetly that I at once changed my plan. I thought she had repented and I hoped to find her made of better stuff upon my second attack. I assumed a demeanor to match hers, and I breakfasted joking with her and her sister, and I did the same at dinner and until the evening, when Signor Grimaldi, arriving and finding us so gay, felt obliged to offer us his congratulations. Seeing that Veronica received them as if she deserved them, I thought I was sure to have her after supper, and in my exultation I promised them I would stay on for four days instead of three.

"Good for you, Veronica!" he said. "Always exercise your rights as you have done on this occasion. Nature created you to have absolute dominion over those who love you."

It seemed to me that she should say at least a word or two to lessen the Marchese's certainty; but not a bit of it, she became more beautiful, she triumphed; I looked at her with the abashed humility of a captive proud of his chains. I was magnanimous enough to take her performance for a sure augury of my imminent victory. I avoided any private conversation with Marchese, so that I should not be obliged to enlighten him if he questioned me. When he left, he said that he would not have the pleasure of supping with us again until the next evening but one.

"Did you observe," she asked me as soon as we were alone, "how willing I am to let people believe what they please? I would rather be taken for kind, since that's the word for it, than be suspected of being ridiculous, for that is the charming epithet with which people honor a girl who has principles. Isn't that so?"

"No, my beautiful Veronica, I will never call you ridiculous; but I will say that you hate me if you make me spend an infernal night by refusing yourself to my love as you did yesterday. Let me tell you that at table you set me on fire."

"Oh, calm yourself, please! Tomorrow evening I won't set you on fire. Please, please, let me alone! Oh, this time—"

What roused her to anger was that, pulling her down with me onto the sofa, I pushed my hand too hard to the point where it could go no farther. She quickly fled, and three or four minutes later I saw her sister come to undress me. I gently told her to go to bed too, since I had to spend several hours writing; and, in order not to see the innocent child leave in humiliation, I opened my strongbox and gave her a watch.

"It's for my sister?"

"No, it is for you."

I allowed her to kiss my hand, and in my troubled state I wrote Rosalie a letter four pages long, which I burned without rereading it. After that I wrote her a reasonable one, in which, not even mentioning Veronica, I said that I would leave the next day.

I went to bed very late, extremely ill pleased with myself, for I considered that, whether she loved me or not, I had failed her both as a lover and as a man of honor. I rang at noon, and I was still more certain of my mistake when I saw only Annetta. As soon as Costa withdrew I asked her how her sister was, and she told me she was sewing. I wrote her a note in which, asking her pardon, I assured her I would not offend her again. I begged her to reappear as if nothing had happened. I was drinking my coffee when I saw her come in with mortification too plainly displayed in her face for me not to feel the whole weight of it. I told her that she need only put up my curls, for I intended to take a walk outside the city and not return to the inn until evening.

"I shall," I said, "have a good appetite for supper, and afterward you will have nothing to fear and no need to send Annetta to me."

I went out of the city and after walking for two hours stopped at a village tavern where I ordered an omelet.

Not having the strength to return to Genoa on foot, I asked for a carriage; but there was none. The tavern-keeper gave me a horse, with a man on foot to guide me and bring back the horse. Night was falling, and we had six miles to go. Rain was my companion all the way to Genoa, where I arrived at eight o'clock soaking wet, dying of cold and fatigue, and with the whole upper part of my thighs chafed raw by the rough saddle, which had torn my satin breeches. After having Costa change all my clothes, I told him to have supper served. I see Annetta and do not see Veronica; she tells me that she is in bed with a bad headache and hands me a letter she had written me. Here it is:

"I went to bed at three o'clock with one of the bad headaches to which I am subject. I already feel better and am sure I can wait on you tomorrow. I tell you this because I do not want you to imagine that I am angry or feigning. I believe you are truly sorry for having humiliated me, and for my part, I ask you to forgive me, or to feel sorry for me, if my way of thinking does not accord with yours."

"Go and ask her," I said, "if she would like us to have supper at her bedside."

She came back at once to say that her sister thanked me and requested that I let her sleep.

So I supped with Annetta, observing with pleasure that she drank only water; but she ate more than I did. My passion for her sister kept me from thinking of her; but I saw that if my heart were not otherwise engaged she would have attracted me. At dessert I decided to get her tipsy and make her talk about her sister. I gave her a glass of muscat from Lunel.[6]

"I drink nothing but water."

"Do you dislike wine?"

"No; but as I'm not used to it, it would go to my head."

"Then you shall go to bed and sleep the better."

She found it excellent, and she laughed when I gave her a second glass, and after that I turned the conversation to her sister, about whom she said every possible good thing with perfect sincerity.

"I love her, and she cannot bear me; she refuses my slightest caresses."

"She can only resist your caresses from fear that you will cease to love her."

"Do you think she is right to make me suffer?"

"No. But if you love her you ought to forgive her."

Annetta's reasoning was only too sound; but at the third glass she said she could no longer see anything and we left the table. The girl already attracted me a little too much; but I promised myself not to make any approach to her, for I feared I should find her too compliant. Nolo nimis facilem dificilem que nimis ("I want a woman neither to give in too easily nor to resist too much").[7] She was a good, gentle girl, who, at the age of fourteen and without experience, could not know her own rights. She might have thought that opposing what I might do to her would be rudeness. Only a rich, voluptuous Mussulman can relish that sort of thing.

So I ask her to tuck my hair under my nightcap, intending to send her off to bed at once; but before she leaves I tell her to bring me a jar of unscented pomade.

"What do you want it for?"

"To put on the raw spots from the accursed saddle on which I rode six miles. It will relieve the smarting, and I shall be well tomorrow. I must send for Costa, for I dare not ask this little service of you."

"Do you think I'd know how?"

"It's easy; but I fear to impose on your willingness."

"I understand the reason. But being so short-sighted, how am I to see the raw places?"

"On the bed. Put the candles on the night table."

"There they are; but don't have Costa do you the same service tomorrow morning, for he'd think it must have been me or my sister who took care of you this evening."

"Will you be as willing again tomorrow?"

"I or my sister, for she will get up very early."

"Not your sister, for she'd be afraid of giving me too much pleasure by touching me there with her beautiful hands."

"And I'm afraid of hurting you! Am I doing it right? What a state your poor skin is in!"

"My dear Annetta, that's not all."

"I'm so short-sighted. Turn around."

"Here I am."

But then I see her laugh at what chance shows her and what the service she was rendering me obliged her to touch. I think I can wager that, short-sighted as she is, she had never seen it so well before and that she must be enjoying it; I become sure of it when I see her straying hand rub where there are no raw spots. At that, unable to bear more, I take her hand to make her stop.

I had to laugh when I saw her motionless and serious, still holding the jar of pomade, and asking me if she had done it right.

"You are, my dear child, an angel incarnate, and I am sure you know what kind of pleasure it was which you have given me. Can you come and spend an hour with me?"

"Wait."

She goes, and she shuts my door, but without turning the key; I feel sure she will come back when she sees that her sister is asleep. She does not come, I get up and go to the door; I see her undress, get into bed, and put out the candle. I go back to bed, still with some hope, and I am not deceived. Five or six minutes later I see her come to my bedside in her shift.

"Come quickly to my arms, my angel, for it is very cold."

"Gladly; my sister is asleep, and I am sure she suspects nothing. Even if she wakes the bed is wide and she won't notice that I am not in it. I give myself to you; do as you will with me; but on condition that you will think no more of my sister."

"I find no difficulty, dear heart, in promising you that and swearing to it."

I found Annetta intact, and it did not occur to me to doubt it in the morning when I saw that the victim had not stained the altar with blood. It has often happened to me. I have learned from experience that no legitimate conclusions can be drawn from either a flow of blood or the lack of it. A girl can be convicted of having had a lover only if he has made her pregnant.

Annetta left me after two hours of encounters, and on waking I saw her at my bedside with Veronica and was delighted to observe not the least sign of a misunderstanding between them. Veronica told me that diet and sleep had, as always, cured her completely. I was in the same situation. Her sister Annetta had completely cured me of the curiosity about her with which she had inspired me. I felt it, and I congratulated myself on it.

At supper Signor Grimaldi, seeing me gay and calm, supposed it was because matters had been brought to a conclusion. I promised to dine with him the next day at Sampierdarena. I went there, and I gave him a long letter for Rosalie, whom I did not expect to see again except as the wife of P-i. But I did not tell her so in my letter.

The same day, supping with the two girls, I devoted equal attention to them both, and Veronica, doing up my hair in curl papers, said, when she was left alone with me, that now that she saw I had become reasonable she loved me far more. I replied that my supposed reasonableness was due to my having given up hope of conquering her.

"My beautiful Veronica, I have made my decision."

"Then your love was a little thing."

"It was a scarce born infant. You had only to foster it till it was mature, and then it could easily have remained alive."

Not knowing what to answer, she wished me a sound sleep and went to her room. Annetta did not come to pay me the visit for which I hoped; I did not know what to conclude.

I saw her in the morning when I rang. She said that her sister was ill in bed and had spent the night writing; and she gave me the letter. At that I saw why Annetta had not come.

The letter, which was very long, and which I returned to her, very nearly made me laugh. After some stuff as boring as it was beside the point, she said that she had refused to yield to my desire because she loved me with all her heart and dared not risk losing me as soon as she had satisfied my momentary fancy. She offered to surrender to my desires if I would grant her the same position which Rosalie had occupied in respect to me. I must leave Genoa with her, giving her a written undertaking, which Signor Grimaldi was to sign, by which I would promise to marry her at the end of a year, settling a dowry of fifty thousand Genoese lire on her, or, if I did not want to marry her, I was to give her the same amount, leaving her perfectly free. If she bore a child during the time we lived together I must agree to leave it with her when we separated, whether it was a girl or a boy which she had brought into the world. On these conditions she consented to become my mistress at once and to grant me all the favors I might ask.

This silly scheme showed me clearly that poor Veronica lacked the intelligence she needed if she was to make me her dupe. I was sure that Signor Grimaldi was not its author and that when I informed him of it he would laugh.

Annetta, bringing me my chocolate, said that her sister made bold to expect an answer to her letter. I said she should have one. I rose and went at once to take it to her in person, carrying her letter, which I immediately returned to her. I found her sitting up in bed, where her scanty attire might have seduced me if her idiotic scheme had not destroyed whatever good opinion of her I still entertained.

I sat down on her bed, and Annetta left the room, even shutting the door; but she told me afterward that she listened.

"Why write to each other," I asked her, "when we can talk?"

"One is oftener more at ease," she replied, "in writing than in speaking."

"That is true in politics and in business matters, where the parties try to trick each other; but in matters of the heart I am not of your opinion. Love, my dear, clears the board: no written undertakings, no guarantees; give yourself to me as Rosalie did, and begin by coming to my arms this very night, without my making you any promises. Trust in love. That is a plan which does honor to us both and which, if you wish, I will submit to Signor Grimaldi's approval. Your scheme, if it is not dishonorable to you, at least bears very poor witness to your intelligence, for it could be accepted only by a fool completely devoid of common sense. It is not possible that you love the man to whom you make such a proposal, and I am sure that Signor Grimaldi would be indignant at it and refuse to have anything to do with it."

My proud reply did not abash her. She said that she did not love me enough to give herself to me without knowing under what conditions. I replied that, on my side, I no longer loved her enough to obtain possession of her under those she had prescribed. After that I left her, and I ordered Costa to inform the master of the felucca that I wanted to sail at dawn the next day. Determined to do so, I went and took leave of the Marchese, who told me he had that morning brought P-i to see Rosalie, who had received him tolerably well. I was delighted to hear it. I commended her to his care again, but there was no need of it.

In that one year two women whom I loved to distraction, both of them abounding in good qualities, and with whom I would never have parted if it had depended on me alone, were both taken from me by the clever scheming of two old men whom I unintentionally helped to fall in love with them. They made both women's fortunes; but by indirection it was to me that they did the greatest good, for they rid me of them. They must both have known that my own fortune, though apparently ample, had no solid foundation. In the course of my history my reader will become convinced of it.

I spent the day watching Veronica's and Annetta's conscientious efforts to pack my things properly. I would not let Leduc and Costa join in. Veronica, neither gay nor sad, appeared to have resigned herself and talked to me as if there had never been the least difference between us. It made me very glad. After supper they went to bed, and Annetta pressed my hand in a way which told me that she would pay me a visit. I was very glad of it; I felt it my duty to make her a present of fifty zecchini without Veronica's knowledge, for I had no wish to do as much for her. I put the roll on my night table, and I gave it to her as soon as she arrived.

After telling me that Veronica was asleep, she asked me what I would have done if Veronica had accepted the offer I had made her to receive her in my bed.

"I heard everything," she said, "and I knew that you love her."

"I was certain, my dear, that she would never bring herself to do it. I love no one but you."

But a half hour later we are surprised by the presence of Veronica, who, candlestick in hand, encourages her generous sister by a great burst of laughter. I laugh too, not letting her leave my arms. Veronica had on nothing but her shift, she was beautiful, and I had no reason to be angry with her.

"You have come," I said, "to interrupt our pleasures and to cause pain to a sister whom you will henceforth scorn."

"I shall always love her."

"A slave to love, she has given herself to me without conditions."

"She had better sense than I did."

"You mean that?"

"I mean it."

"Very good. Then kiss her."

At this invitation she puts the light down on the night table, takes Annetta from me, and covers her with kisses. The scene goes to my soul. I invited her to lie down beside her, making room for her, and she comes in between the sheets. I feel that she is deathly cold, and the beauty of the spectacle, which I could never have anticipated, allures and transports me. I cannot resist making a pause. A full commentary alone can raise my enjoyment to its pinnacle. So talk there shall be.

"Is this charming trick you are playing on me premeditated?" I asked the two sisters. "And you, Veronica, were you playing a part this morning, or are you doing so now?"

"There was no premeditation. I was sincere this morning, and I am being sincere as you see me now. I hatched an absurd plot, which I beg you to forget, and I am being rightly punished for it; but it is in your power to end my punishment this instant."

"How?"

"By saying you forgive me, and proving it to me."

"I forgive you; but how can I prove it?"

"By continuing to make love to my dear sister without being troubled by my presence."

It was the acme of comedy, and my enthusiasm went to my head. I must not let myself descend to a passive role.

"What do you say, my soul?" I ask my little blonde. "Your sister, heroic beyond praise, wants only to be the spectator of our amorous exploits. Do you not feel generous enough to let her play a part?"

"No, my dear; but you shall be the generous one tomorrow night, putting on the same play with only the difference that Veronica shall act my role, while I, following the example she will set us tonight, shall be the spectator with the greatest pleasure."

"That would be perfect," said Veronica in a tone which belied her words, "if the Signore had not decided to leave at dawn."

"I shall stay, charming Veronica, if only to convince myself that you are adorable."

"And that I love you."

I could not ask her to make herself clearer, and I would gladly have given her proof of my gratitude then and there; but that would have been at Annetta's expense, and I should most unforgivably have spoiled the pure and charming play of which she was the author; but every time I recall this agreeable incident in my life I see that the play was composed by beauteous Nature and that Annetta was only the leading actress in it. Veronica, determined that, as spectator, she would not enter in, settled herself on her side, plumping up a pillow to lean her elbow on and resting her face on her hand. I began the farce as my part demanded, sure that I should play it to perfection as long as the spectator continued to watch the action. My eyes were fixed on her; she must have attributed it to politeness; but in the end she realized that I had put all my confidence in the interest she would show in the proceedings. Annetta saw nothing, her short-sighted eyes could not make out the direction of mine. Each time our pantomime displaced the coverlet, Veronica would put it back, each time offering me, as if by chance, a new picture and enjoying the instantaneous effect it made on my soul, which eagerly strove to demonstrate how lively an impression her charms made on it. Warmed to generosity, in the end she displayed all her treasures to me, smiling to show me she was glad I should read her thought. She must have surmised that the play I was putting on was really only the rehearsal for the one I was to act with her on the following night, and her imagination could not but add to its charms. I had the same thought.

What obliged me to break off the pretty game was Costa, who came knocking at my door to tell me the felucca was ready. Furious at the interruption, I went to the door and told him to pay the captain for the day and order him to be ready the next morning. Going back to bed, I saw that my two companions were delighted with my probity.

We must certainly have been in need of sleep, but, equally certainly, the play must not be allowed to end by the always untimely accident of an interruption; it must be only an intermission, and I must take advantage of a respite which nature made necessary. I proposed an ablution, which made Annetta laugh and which Veronica declared was courteous, appropriate, and justified. The refreshment not being part of the main action, I easily persuaded her to imitate us; the two sisters rendered each other mutual services in different postures, all of them such that I found the role of spectator preferable to any other.

After the drying, whose gentle tickling is properly accompanied by soft laughter, we returned to the stage where I was to perform the last act. I could scarcely wait to acquit myself, and I was sure I should bring it off with honor, counting, of course, on Annetta. Without her the dialogue could not be sustained. But the girl was too young; as I had foreseen, she forgot her part. The cruel god who played the trick on her was Morpheus. Veronica laughed when she saw her asleep, and I had to laugh too when I found that she was as if dead. It was a case of bringing her back to life, and Love has only the power to awaken. This dénouement had all the appearance of a catastrophe. "What a pity," Veronica's eyes said; but she said it only with her eyes. She was wrong, as I was—she for not taking Annetta's part without asking my permission, I for waiting for her to invite me. I thought I ought to refrain from infringing on the play which was not to be acted until the next night. Veronica went to her own bed to sleep, and I slept with Annetta until noon.

We spent the day most interestingly in discussions of what had befallen us, and, having decided to eat only one meal, we did not sit down at table until nightfall. We spent two hours there, satisfying our appetites with exquisite dishes and defying Bacchus to make us fear his power. We rose when we saw Annetta overcome by irresistible sleep. However, we did not consider this slight mishap enough to spoil our little play. Annetta as spectator had no possibility of enjoyment, and Veronica's dazzling charms would occupy me in a way which made it quite unnecessary to look at any others. We went to bed, and, she in my arms and I in hers, we spent more than an hour without moving but without accomplishing anything. Though she became aware of the reason, politeness prevented Veronica from telling me what it was, as modesty kept her from complaining of it. She concealed whatever she may have felt and continued to caress me, but I was furious. I could not understand it at all. Such a disaster had never befallen me except immediately after a long labor whose consummation had been sealed with my blood, or as the result of a surprise violent enough to obliterate all my natural faculties, as had been the case with Genoveffa when, coming out of the Great Circle, I had expected to be struck by lightning.[8] But in the situation in which I found myself, in the prime of life, with a girl who had everything to delight, who charmed me, whom I had wanted to find willing and tender, and whom I saw ready to refuse me nothing of all that I might, or could, ask of her—this was something I could not conceive and which made me positively desperate.

Reduced at last to dropping our masks and talking sense, I was the first to lament my misfortune.

"You did too much yesterday," she replied, "you drank too many liqueurs at supper. Do not be upset, my dear, for I am sure you love me. Stop trying to force nature, for your efforts will only weaken it. It seems to me that a calm sleep is the only remedy you need employ in order to become a man again. I have no need of it, but do not be concerned for me. Go to sleep. We will make love afterward."

After this brief discourse, which I found equally wise and tactful, Veronica turned her back to me and I did likewise. I saw that I could hope everything from sleep, and I determined to sleep, but in vain. The same nature which refused me the ability to work denied me the power to enjoy rest. My eager senses would not relax; they had no need of the relaxation I wanted, and they had no idea that their furtherance could have anything to do with what I needed to put me in a condition to satisfy my amorous desires. On the contrary, my burning senses wanted to remain awake in order to witness my enjoyment; and, far from doing me the kindness to relax, they could not but be angry with me, and they had every right to complain that, by my lack of judgment, I had dulled the vigor I needed to satisfy Love, whose activity and divine joy is that which most interests them and that in which they take part, amid charms which never fail to be present.

It is thus that, in my frenzy and my inability to sleep, I tried to console myself, indulging in physico-metaphysical analyses and arguing on the side of my senses to give me abundant reason for blaming only myself. When I ended I felt satisfied. Satisfied to find myself guilty! Strange satisfaction; but the only one capable of making happy a philosopher overwhelmed by a misfortune. The man who is in the wrong gains a great victory, if, after pleading his cause to himself, he succeeds in convincing himself of it. This is the only happiness I enjoy today when I converse with myself. In all my life no misfortune has befallen me except by my own fault, and I attribute almost all the good fortune I have enjoyed to the chances of life—which, to tell the truth, is a little unjust and humiliating; but such is man. I should go mad, I believe, if in my soliloquies I found that I was unhappy without its being my own fault, for I should not know where the fault lay unless I would admit that I was stupid. I know I am not stupid. Stupidity resides in an idiotic neighbor of mine[9] who is pleased to maintain that the brutes reason better than we do. "I will grant you," I answered him, "that they reason better than you do, but not better than I do." This answer made him my enemy, even though it admitted half of his thesis.

Veronica spent three hours in the arms of sleep and was surprised when I told her I had been unable to enjoy a moment's rest. She found me the nullity she had left me, and she finally lost patience when I tried a little too hard to convince her that the misfortune did not come from any ill will on my part. Tempted to attribute it to herself, and at the same time mortified by the thought that such a thing was possible, she undertook to break the spell which made me unfit. To achieve her end she used remedies which I thought were infallible; and I should have been in the wrong not to leave her to her own devices; but it was all effort thrown away. My despair became as great as hers when I saw her give up, discouraged, humiliated, and angry to the point of tears. She departed without a word, leaving me under the painful necessity of spending two or three hours before Aurora's return in solitude. My baggage was all ready. My insomnia did not leave me.

At daybreak Costa came to tell me that the wind was strong and contrary and that the felucca could not confront it.

"We will leave," I replied, "when the weather permits."

At that I got up, lit a fire, and fell to writing. Two or three hours later, feeling sleepy, I got into bed, and I enjoyed a sleep of eight hours. On waking I felt calm, but with no desire for amusement. The two sisters were delighted, and I thought I detected a certain scorn in Veronica; but she might be justified, and I should have made a mistake to remark on it. Before we sat down at table I presented her with a hundred zecchini, and I did the same to the kind Annetta, who did not expect it, for she thought she had already received enough.

Toward midnight the captain of the felucca came to tell me that the weather was fair, and I took leave of them. I saw Veronica weep, but I knew why. I set sail for Derici with my two valets, and I went ashore there the next morning, immediately taking post horses for Leghorn. But here is a small yet instructive event worthy of the gravity of this history and not unworthy of being imparted to a reader who reads it with pleasure.

CHAPTER VII

A clever swindle. Passano at Leghorn. Pisa and Corilla. My opinion of squint eyes. Florence. I meet Teresa again. My son. La Corticelli.

AS I am watching the four horses being harnessed for me, a man whose face I do not trouble to notice comes up and asks if I wish to pay for the stage in advance or at the post station.

"I will pay now. Here is a portoghese,[1] bring me the change."

"At once."

Ten minutes later, just when I was going to ask for the change from my portoghese, up comes the post master and asks me for the money for my stage.

"I have already paid it, and I am waiting for the change from a portoghese. Wasn't it to you that I gave it?"

"To me? I beg your pardon."

"Then to whom did I give it?"

"You should know that."

"Damnation, it can only have been to one of your men."

I raise my voice. I am surrounded; the post master asks who had had a portoghese from me; no one knows anything about it. I swear, I curse, then I see I am in the wrong, I pay over again, and I laugh at the clever scoundrel who had tricked me so cleverly. So it is that one learns to live. From that day on I have never paid post except on good grounds. There is no country in which the rascals are more cunning than they are in Italy, if we except ancient and modern Greece.

At Leghorn I had scarcely put up at the best inn[2] before I am told that the theater[3] is open. Unfortunately I take a notion to go to it; one of the actors recognizes me, he comes up, he is delighted to see me, I invite him to supper, he introduces me to a man who calls himself an excellent poet and a great enemy of the Abate Chiari,[4] whom I disliked because he had composed a virulent satire[5] on me and I had not had my revenge. I tell him to come to supper too. The self-styled poet was Genoese, his name was Giacomo Passano,[6] and he had written three hundred sonnets against the Abate Chiari. He said that if he could get them printed the Abate would die of rage. I laughed. Having his manuscript in his pocket, he read me a dozen of them; I found them mediocre. When a sonnet is mediocre it is bad, for it should be sublime.

If I had taken time to study the man's face further than to suppose him some fifty years of age I should have known him for a scoundrel; but his sonnets against Chiari preoccupied me. On the title page of his manuscript I read: La Chiareide di Ascanio Pogomas.[7]

"It is," he said, "a perfect[8] anagram of my family and baptismal names; I beg you to admire its felicity."

This stupid remark still makes me laugh. Every one of his sonnets was a piece of flat rigmarole ending by saying that the Abate Chiari was a coglione.[9] He did not prove it, but he said it, and that might be enough to pain the Brescian priest, who was no coglione but a wit and a poet, and who, if he had known the theater, would have surpassed Goldoni,[10] for he had a better command of the language. This word coglione, which properly means "testicle," is used in Italy to mean "fool," as couillon in French means "dolt" and in German "cad." One cannot say a more insulting word to a German than Kujon or to a Frenchman than faquin.

For civility's sake I told Passano that he should get his Chiareide printed.

"I should like to sell it to a printer, for I am not rich enough to have it printed at my own expense, and the printers here are all ignorant starvelings; then, too, the press is restricted; the word coglione would be declared obscene. If I could go to Switzerland I am sure I could manage it there; but I haven't six zecchini. I would really go on foot."

"And how," I said, "would you live in Switzerland, where there are no actors?"

"I can paint miniatures. Look."

He then puts in my hands some oval ivory tablets measuring three or four inches, on which I see lubricious nudes, poorly drawn and even more poorly painted. I promise to give him a recommendation for Bern, and after supper I write the letter for him and I give him six zecchini to take him there. He insisted on giving me six of his pictures; but I refused them. I was stupid enough to recommend him to Monsieur M. F.,[11] father of the charming Sara. I told him to write to me at Rome in care of the banker Belloni.

The next day I went to dine in Pisa at the "Hussar" inn,[12] where I stayed for two days. From an Englishman I bought a very pretty carriage which seated two and had a folding seat for two more. It was this Englishman who took me to call on the celebrated poetess Corilla,[13] whom I wanted to meet. She did me the favor to improvise, and she enchanted me, not by her singing or her beauty but by the delightful things she said in good verse and in perfect Italian. She was squint-eyed, as the ancients depicted Venus[14]—the reason for which I have never been able to guess, for the Goddess of Beauty squinting always seemed to me a great incongruity. It was said that when Corilla, as she sang, fixed her squint eyes on any man in the company she was sure to make him fall in love with her. Thank God, she did not fix them on me very much; apparently she did not like me.

In Florence I found lodgings near the Ponte alla Carraia[15] at Doctor Vannini's,[16] who told me at once that he was "unworthily" a member of the Accademia della Crusca.[17] I took an apartment the windows of which looked out on the embankment of the Arno, next to a beautiful terrace. I also took a town carriage and a hire lackey, immediately dressing the coachman and the lackey in the blue and red livery of Signor Bragadin. I did not want to impose on anyone, but I wanted to make an impression. The next day I went out alone on foot, wearing a redingote, to see Florence and be seen by no one, and in the afternoon I went to the theater[18] to hear the Arlecchino Roffi,[19] whose reputation was greater than his talent, and to judge the Florentine style of delivery, which was highly praised and which I did not like. Only Pertici[20] pleased me. Unable to sing any longer because he had grown old, he had turned actor.

The next day I presented myself to the banker Sasso Sassi, on whom I had a large letter of credit, and after dining alone I dressed for the occasion and went to the opera in the Via della Pergola,[21] taking a seat in a box near the orchestra more to see the actresses than to hear the music, which has never transported me.

But what a surprise when I see the prima donna! I instantly recognized Teresa,[22] whom, after she dropped the mask of Bellino, I had left in Rimini at the beginning of the year 1744—the very Teresa whom I would certainly have married if Signor de Gages had not had me put under arrest. Seventeen years later I see her on the stage, beautiful, fresh, and she seems to me just as young as when I had left her. I thought her a miracle; I was decided that it must be someone else, when, singing an aria, she happens to turn her eyes on me, and from then on they never leave my face. That convinced me that I was not mistaken. At the end of her aria she goes off, and she is scarcely in the wings before she turns and signals me with her fan to come and speak to her.

I leave the box with my heart beating in a way for which I did not understand the reason; for, preserving the happiest memory of Teresa, I felt no guilt toward her except for not having answered her last letter, which she had written me from Naples thirteen years before. I made my way to the pit, more curious to see what the consequences of the interview would be than to learn all that must have happened to her in the course of seventeen years, which, in those days, seemed to me a century.

I come to a door through which one went up to the stage, and I see her at the top of a short stairway giving orders to the doorkeeper to let me enter. I approach her and we both remain mute. I take her hand and I put it against my chest so that she can feel my heart, which seemed to be trying to leap out.

"I cannot do as much here," she said, "but I thought my surprise would send me falling into the orchestra, and I do not know, my dear friend, how I managed to finish my aria. Alas! I have to sup out, I shall not sleep tonight; I expect you tomorrow at eight o'clock. Where are you staying?"

"At Vannini's."

"What name are you using?"

"The same." [23]

"When did you arrive here?"

"Yesterday."

"Shall you remain long in Florence?"

"As long as you wish."

"Are you married?"

"No."

"Accursed supper! What a day! Leave me, I have to go on. Good-by until tomorrow at seven."

A moment earlier she had said "at eight." I go to the parterre, and I remember that I have asked her neither her name nor her address; but I could easily find out all that. She was playing the part of Mandane.[24] At this distance I seem to see her even better, and I find her without an equal in the action with which she animated her recitative. I ask a very well-dressed young man who is sitting beside me the name of so great an actress.

"Then you have arrived in Florence only today?"

"Yes, Signore."

"Well then, her name is the same as mine because she is my wife; and my name is Cirillo Palesi,[25] at your service."

I bow to him, and I remain mute and as if I had fallen from a great height. He might have considered it impertinent if I had asked him where he lived. Teresa married to this handsome young man! And it is precisely her husband I bump into when I want to inquire about her!

I have not the strength to stay through the opera. I cannot wait to be alone so that I can reflect on this fantastic adventure, on the visit I was to make to the married Teresa the next morning at seven, for I must go by what she had said last, and on what her husband will say to me when he sees me. I feel my old fire rekindled, and I think I am not sorry to have found her married.

I go out, and I tell my lackey to call my carriage; he replies that I cannot have it until nine o'clock. The weather was so cold that the coachman had gone to the stable.

"Then we will walk. Tell me," I said, "what is the name of the prima virtuosa?"

"Her name was Lanti; but for the last two months it has been Palesi. I can tell you there is nothing to be done there. She is rich, and she married a young man who has nothing and no profession."

"Where does she live?"

"At the end of this street. We shall pass her door. She lives on the second floor."

After that I said no more to him, so that I could devote my attention to the route I was to take alone the next morning.

I ate scarcely a bite and went to bed at once, ordering Leduc to call me at six o'clock.

"It is not light until seven."

"I know that."

"Very well."

So at seven o'clock I am at the door of my first great passion. I go up to the second floor, I ring, and a woman who opens the door for me asks me if my name is Casanova.

"Yes."

"The Signora told me that you would come at eight o'clock; but it does not matter, go into this room, I will wake her."

Five or six minutes later I see her husband approach me politely in his nightcap, saying that his wife was getting up and would come; but I nearly laughed when, after staring at me for a time, he said:

"Was it not you, Signore, who asked me my wife's name yesterday evening?"

"I am the man, I thought I knew her, and my good luck saw to it that I should ask her husband. The friendship, Signore, which I shall always feel for you will be the same as that which I have always felt for her."

But there she is, beautiful as a star. She enters with open arms, I open mine, and we embrace like two fond friends, or like lovers enjoying the happiness of a moment for which they have longed. After a brief pause for thought, we embrace again, then she tells her husband to sit down. She draws me to a sofa, letting her tears flow freely, I cannot hold back mine; but a moment later, wiping our eyes, we happen to turn them on Signor Palesi's face, and we cannot help bursting out laughing. His amazement was too comic.

"You see my father," she said to him, "and more than my father, for I owe him everything. Happy moment, which I have awaited for ten years!"

Hearing me called "father," her husband stared at me again; but the emotion of the situation did not permit me to laugh. I was not quite two years older than Teresa; but fondness takes the name of father to mean whatever it chooses.

"Yes, Signore," I said, "she is my daughter, she is my sister, an angel without sex, she is a living treasure, and she is your wife.

"I did not," I said to her, "answer your last letter—"

"I know everything. You were in love with a nun, you were imprisoned under the Leads, and when I was in Vienna I heard of your prodigious escape. A false presentiment made me certain that I should see you there. Afterward I learned of your vicissitudes in Paris and Holland; but after you left Paris I could get news of you from no one. But here we are, and I shall die content. When I tell you all that has happened to me during these ten years you will hear some fine tales. Now I am happy. There is Signor Palesi, of Rome, who married me two months ago; we love each other, and I hope you will be his friend as you are mine."

I then rose to embrace him, and he came to meet me, though with extreme embarrassment, for he could not imagine what attitude he should assume toward me, who was now father, now brother, now friend. He did not know if he must be prepared to put up with me as the lover of his dear wife. It was she who, to reassure him, went and embraced him most heartily, making me the spectator of a second scene which I pretended to find very agreeable, but which annoyed me, for in that half hour Teresa had rekindled in me all the fire with which I had begun to burn for her at Ancona when Don Sancho Pico[26] introduced me to her.

Signor Palesi asked me if I would be pleased to breakfast, joining them for a cup of excellent chocolate which he whipped himself, and I replied that I was passionately fond of chocolate. He went off at once to make it.

Thereupon Teresa fell into my arms, saying:

"Let us embrace a hundred times this first day, my dear friend, and afterward leave it at that, since such is the decree of destiny. Tomorrow we shall meet again only as two fond friends; our transports at this happy moment are too well justified for us to restrain them."

After satisfying some of our fire, finding that we were as we had been when we parted in Rimini, we breathed again, and we resumed our places.

After reflecting a little:

"You must know," she said, "that I am still in love with my husband and determined never to deceive him. What I did just now did not depend upon me, and we must both forget it. It is over. Let it suffice us to know that we still love each other, and to have no possible doubt of it. In future, my dear friend, let us avoid any opportunity to be alone together. Does that make you sad?"

"I find you bound, and I am free. We would not have parted again; you have just rekindled all my old fire; I am the same, and happy that I have been able to prove it to myself and unhappy that I can no longer hope to possess you; I find you not only married but in love. Alas! I have delayed too long; but if I had not stopped in Genoa I should be equally unhappy. You shall know all when occasion serves. Meanwhile, I will obey no other laws than those you will prescribe for me. Your husband, I believe, does not know our story; so I must let nothing out, must I not?"

"Nothing; for he has no knowledge of my affairs, and I am very glad he shows no curiosity about them. He knows, like everyone else, that I made my fortune in Naples, where I say I went at the age of ten. Such things are falsehoods which harm no one, and which in my profession I must prefer to a number of truths which would injure me. I claim I am twenty-four—what do you say to that?"

"I would say you are telling the truth, though I know you are thirty-two."

"You mean thirty-one. When I met you I could not have been more than fourteen."

"I thought it was fifteen."

"Possibly; but tell me, please, do I look more than twenty-four?"

"I swear that you do not even look that. But in Naples—"

"In Naples a gazetteer might know everything; but nobody listens to such people. But I am waiting to see you at what will be one of the most interesting moments in your life."

"One of the most interesting moments in my life? When?"

"Permit me to say no more. I want to enjoy your surprise. But let us speak of something essential. How are you off? If you need money I am in a position to return yours to you with all the interest you can demand. My husband controls nothing; all that I have is my own. I have fifty thousand ducati del regno[27] at Naples, and the same amount in diamonds. Tell me how much you need. Quick, for the chocolate is coming."

Such was Teresa. Deeply moved, I was about to throw myself on her neck before answering her, when the chocolate arrived. Her husband entered, followed by a chambermaid who was a beauty and who carried three cups of chocolate on a silver-gilt tray. Palesi kept us entertained while we were drinking it, wittily describing the nature of his surprise when he saw that the man who had got him out of bed at seven o'clock was the same one who had asked him his wife's name the previous evening at the theater. Teresa's laughter, accompanied by mine, was not displeasing to the Roman, who I thought appeared jealous only for propriety's sake.

Teresa said that at ten o'clock a rehearsal of all the arias from the new opera was to be held at her house, that I was welcome to remain for it and dine with her afterward, and to spend the whole day there if I had nothing better to do. I replied that I would not leave her until after supper to let her go to bed with her fortunate husband. At these words Signor Palesi cordially embraced me, as if to say that he was grateful to me for not having raised obstacles to his exercising his rights.

He was no more than twenty or twenty-two years old, he was blond, and too good-looking for a man, for, such as he was, all mankind of either sex owed him approbation. I could not but forgive Teresa for having fallen in love with his pretty face, for I knew the power of a beautiful countenance only too well; but I disapproved of her having made him her husband, for a husband acquires sovereign rights.

Teresa's young chambermaid came in and said that my carriage was at the door.

"Will you permit my hire lackey to come in?" I asked Teresa. "Who," I said to the scoundrel, "ordered you to come here with my carriage?"

"No one; but I know my duty."

"Who told you I was here?"

"I guessed it."

"Go call Leduc and come here with him."

I told Leduc to pay him for three days, to take away his livery, and ask Doctor Vannini for another valet of the same stature who did not "guess." When the impertinent fellow begged Teresa to intervene for him, she told me I had done well.

At ten o'clock I saw all the actors and actresses arrive, together with a number of devotees of music, who all kissed her hand and whom she received most graciously. The rehearsal, which went on for three hours, bored me to extinction. I spent my time talking with Palesi, whom I liked for his never asking me where or when or how I had known his wife.

At the end of the rehearsal one of the actresses, a girl from Parma named Redegonda,[28] who had a male role and sang well, stayed for dinner with Teresa, and a moment later a young ballerina from Bologna named Corticelli,[29] whom she had also invited, arrived and at once kissed her hand. The girl's budding charms struck me; but, being full of Teresa at the moment, I paid her no special attention. After another moment I see a very stout old abate, of a bland and smiling countenance, who enters with stately steps and, looking at no one but Teresa, approaches and kisses her hand, going down on one knee in the Portuguese fashion. Gracious and smiling, Teresa makes him sit at her right; I was at her left. I at once recognize the Abate Gama,[30] whom I had left in the household of Cardinal Acquaviva[31] in Rome seventeen years earlier; but I give no sign of it. He had aged greatly, but it was he. The philandering old man, who had eyes only for Teresa, treated her to stale compliments and had not yet looked at anyone. Hoping that he will not recognize me, I avoid looking at him and I flirt with La Corticelli. Teresa calls me to order, saying that the Signor Abate wishes to know if I recognize him. At that I look at him, I pretend surprise, I rise, and I ask if I have the pleasure of seeing the Abate Gama.

"Himself," he replies, rising and taking me by the head to give me a number of kisses, in perfect accord with the combination of subtle policy and great curiosity which I knew to make up his character and which I have portrayed for my reader in the first volume of these memoirs.

After this beginning it can be imagined that we talked endlessly. He gave me news of Barbaruccia, of the Marchesa G., of Cardinal S. C.,[32] and he told me how he had passed from the service of Spain to that of Portugal, in which he still continued; but suddenly a figure appears which absorbs and bewilders all the faculties of my soul. A youth of perhaps fifteen or sixteen, but with the sort of maturity which an Italian can attain at that age, enters and bows to the whole company. I being the only person present who did not know him, Teresa presents him to me unabashed, saying:

"He is my brother."

I receive him as I should, but flabbergasted, not having had time to recover myself. This supposed brother of Teresa's was the image of me, except that he was not as dark; I instantly see that he is my son; nature had never been more indiscreet; it was the surprise which Teresa had promised me, and which she had cunningly arranged so that she should have the pleasure of seeing it in my face. In her first letters from Naples she had never written me that she was pregnant, and it had never occurred to me that she might be.

It seemed to me that Teresa should have avoided this meeting, for everyone present had eyes, and no more was needed to discern that the youth must be either my son or my brother. I give her a glance, but she turns away; the youth was looking at me in such confusion that he paid no attention to what his sister was saying to him. The others simply looked back and forth from his face to mine, and, convinced that he was my son, could only conclude that I had been the intimate friend of Teresa's mother, if it was true that she was his sister, for at the age she appeared to be it was impossible to suppose that she was his mother. Nor was it possible to conclude that I was Teresa's father, for I looked almost as young as she did.

What began to please me greatly was the youth's fine bearing and the intelligence he showed as he discoursed in the Neapolitan dialect, which he spoke very markedly. Teresa had me dine between herself and him. I found him well informed and with manners such as a Neapolitan upbringing rarely bestows. Teresa told him he should begin speaking Tuscan.

"It is only six months," she said to me, "since he left the custody of the man who brought him up and who taught him everything he knows, and especially music, which is his passion. You shall hear him at the harpsichord. I am eight years his elder."

Whether it was nature, prepossession, self-esteem, or whatever the reader may please, I rose from the table so enchanted with this son of Teresa's that I embraced him with such affection that the whole company applauded. I invited Teresa to dine with me the next day, together with everyone present.

"I too?" La Corticelli asked.

"You too."

After dinner the Abate Gama told me to choose between having him to breakfast or coming to breakfast with him the next morning, because he was dying to spend two hours alone with me. I invited him to my inn.

As soon as everyone had left, Don Cesarino (for such was the handsome youth's name) asked me if I would take him to the promenade with me. I embraced him and replied that he could go in my carriage with his brother-in-law, for I must not leave his sister alone. Palesi agreed.

As soon as we were alone I congratulated her on Cesarino.

"He is," she replied, "the happy fruit of our love. Happy, because he has everything to make him so. It is the same Duke[33] with whom I left Rimini who provided for his upbringing; I confided my secret to him as soon as I found that I was pregnant. I was delivered without anyone's knowing it, and it was he who sent him to nurse at Sorrento and had him baptized by the name of Cesare Filippo Lanti. He left him there until he was nine, then put him to board with a competent man, who saw that he received an excellent education and taught him music. From his earliest childhood he has always known me as his sister, and you cannot imagine my joy when I found that the older he grew the more he looked like you. I always considered him a sure pledge of our union, certain that it would take place as soon as we met again, for every time I looked at him I thought it impossible that he would not produce the same effect on your soul as he did on mine. I was sure that you could not refuse to make such a charming creature your legitimate son by marrying his fond mother.

"When the Duke died,[34] I left Naples, leaving him to board in the same place under the protection of Prince della Riccia,[35] who never thought him anything but my brother. Your son commands a capital of twenty thousand ducati del regno, the interest on which is paid to me and of which he does not know; but I let him want for nothing. My heart bleeds because I cannot tell him I am his mother; for I think he would love me all the more. You cannot imagine the pleasure I felt today when I saw your surprise and afterward observed how quickly you fell in love with him."

"And the resemblance?"

"It pleases me. Can it lead people to believe anything except that you were my mother's lover? Let it be so. My husband believes that is the source of the friendship between us, at which he might well have taken offense this morning when he saw our transports. He told me last night that Cesarino might be my brother on his mother's side but not on his father's, for he had seen his father at the theater and he could certainly not be mine. If I have children by Palesi all my property will go to them on my death; and if not it will go to Cesarino. My property is in trustworthy hands, even if Prince della Riccia should die."

She then took me to her bedroom, where she opened a strongbox which contained all her jewels and over fifty thousand ducati in good securities. In addition she had a large quantity of plate, and her talent, which assured her of leading roles in any theater in Italy.

I asked her if our son had yet had a love affair.

"I do not think so," she answered; "but I think my chambermaid is in love with him. I will keep my eyes open."

"Give him to me. I will teach him the way of the world."

"Ask anything of me, but leave me your son. Know that I never kiss him for fear of going mad. If you knew how good he is and how much he loves me, for I satisfy all his wishes. What will people say in Venice four months from now when they see the Casanova who escaped from the Leads become twenty years younger?"

"So you are going to Venice for La Sensa?"[36]

"Yes; and you are going to Rome?"

"And to Naples, to see my friend the Duke of Matalona."[37]

"I know him. He already has a son[38] by the daughter of the Duke of Bovino,[39] whom he married, a charming woman who was able to make a man of him. Everyone in Naples knows he was impotent."

In such talk we passed the day until Cesarino arrived with his brother-in-law. At supper my son won all that he had not earlier conquered of my paternal affection. He was sprightly and had all the Neapolitan vivacity. He wanted me to hear him at the harpsichord, at which he accompanied himself in some Neapolitan songs which made us laugh heartily. Teresa did nothing but look from him to me and from me to him, then she embraced her husband and exclaimed that to be happy in this world one must be in love.

So I spent that day, which was one of the happiest of my whole life.

CHAPTER VIII

La Corticelli. The Jewish impresario cudgeled. The pretended Charles Ivanov and the trick he plays on me. Arbitrary order to leave Tuscany. I arrive in Rome. My brother Giovanni.

AT NINE o'clock the next morning the Abate Gama was announced; he began by weeping for joy to see me, after so many years, in such good health and in the prime of life. The reader sees that he must have praised me to my face. However intelligent one may be, however well one may know those who practice it, having one's ears tickled is gratifying. The mild-mannered Abate, extremely amiable and without an iota of malice, but curious both by nature and by his occupation—such, in short, as I have portrayed him in my first volume—did not wait for any urging on my part to tell me his whole story for the past seventeen years, making it a lengthy business by recounting its various episodes in all possible detail. He had passed from the service of Spain to that of Portugal, and as Secretary of Embassy to Commander Almada,[1] he had been obliged to leave Rome because Pope Rezzonico[2] would not allow His Most Faithful Majesty[3] to punish the Jesuits who, though they had only broken his arm, had intended to kill him.[4] Gama traveled about Italy, corresponding with Almada and the famous Carvalho[5] and waiting for the end of the quarrel so that he could return to Rome; that was his whole story. But the eloquent Abate made it last for an hour, expecting that I would pay him in the same coin with a detailed account of my adventures; we both displayed our talent—the Abate by lengthening out his story, I by shortening mine, not without the minor pleasure of balking his curiosity. He asked me perfunctorily what I was going to do in Rome, and I replied that I was going to see the Pope to ask him to persuade the State Inquisitors[6] to pardon me. It was not true; but if I had told him truthfully that I was going there simply to amuse myself he would not have believed me. He who tells the truth to unbelieving ears prostitutes truth; it is murder. The Abate asked me to do him the favor of corresponding with him, and I promised to do so; then he told me that he was in position to show me his friendship by introducing me to the Marchese Botta-Adorno,[7] then Governor of Tuscany,[8] who was said to be a friend of the Emperor Francis I,[9] then reigning, and I replied that he would be doing me a great honor. He brought up the subject of Teresa, whereupon he found me constipated; I told him that she was a child when I had known her family in Bologna, and that her brother's resemblance to me could only be chance. On my table he saw something very well written, and he asked me if it was my secretary who had such a good hand. Costa, who was present, answered him in Spanish that it was he. The Abate then exhausted himself in compliments, ending by asking me to send Costa to him to copy some letters. I did not hesitate to answer that I urgently needed the young man all day. He wanted him only in order to make him talk. Such are the curious.

Curiosity, which moralists refuse to number among the passions, is a noble quality of mind whose laudable object is to know all of nature: nihil dulcius quam omnia scire ("nothing is sweeter than to know all things"); however, it is a thing of the senses, for it can arise only from perception and sensation. But curiosity is a vice when it seeks only to pry into the affairs of others, whether the man possessed by it tries to obtain knowledge of them directly or indirectly, whether he tries to discover them in order to be of service to the person he sounds or to use what he discovers for his own advantage; it is always a vice, or a disease, for the mind of a man curious by nature is never at rest. Discovering a secret is perpetrating a theft. I am not speaking of the kind of curiosity which, relying on the abstruse sciences, tries to know the future or things which are not in nature; it is the daughter of ignorance and superstition, and they who dally with it are fools; but the Abate Gama was no fool; he was curious by nature, and he was paid to be curious. Having some visits to make, he left me, promising that he would return at dinnertime.

Doctor Vannini brought me a new hire valet, vouching for him. He was from Parma and of the same height as the first; I told Leduc to give him the livery. I warned the innkeeper-academician that I wanted a creditable dinner, and I was served accordingly.

The first to arrive was La Corticelli, together with her mother, who went by the name of "Signora Laura,"[10] and her brother, a violinist who looked like a girl. Her mother told me that she never let her daughter dine alone with strangers. I replied that in that case she had only to go home or to leave her there and accept two scudi to dine with her son wherever she pleased. She took the two scudi and departed, saying she felt sure she was leaving her in good hands.

Her daughter made such amusing comments on this little dialogue between her mother and myself, laughing so heartily, that it was on that very day I began to love her. She was thirteen years of age, and looked only ten; she was well built, extremely fair, gay, with a sense of humor; but I do not know how or with what in her I could have fallen in love. She begged me to protect her against the Jewish opera impresario.[11] In the contract he had given her he had undertaken to have her dance a pas de deux in the second opera, and he had not done so. She asked me to force the Jew to abide by his undertaking. I promised to send the Jew word to come and talk with me.

The next to arrive was the Parmesan actress Redegonda, tall and beautiful. Costa, who was Parmesan too, told me she was the sister of my hire valet. In two or three minutes of questioning I found Redegonda worthy of attention. The Abate Gama arrives, and he congratulates me on finding me between the two pretty girls. I make him take my place, and he begins flirting with them; they laugh at him, but he persists. I saw that he thought he was pleasing them; and I well understood that vanity could prevent him from knowing he was making himself ridiculous; but I did not foresee that when I reached his age I might be like him. Indeed, I did not give it a thought. Unhappiness is the lot of the old man who does not know what he is or understand that the same sex which he attracted in his youth cannot but scorn him as soon as he shows that he still has pretensions though age has deprived him of all the qualities required to please.

My beautiful Teresa arrived last, with her husband and Cesarino, who had on a very fine coat; I embraced him after fulfilling the same obligation to his mother; and I sat down at table between them. The Abate Gama took the place between Redegonda and La Corticelli, and it was he who enlivened the meal with his witty remarks. I laughed to myself, seeing how attentively my hire valet changed his sister Redegonda's plate, while she plumed herself on being entitled to honors to which he could not aspire; she seized an opportunity to say to me:

"He's a good lad who, unfortunately, has no talent."

I had purposely put in my pocket an enameled gold box on the cover of which was my portrait, painted on the enamel in the form of a medallion and a very good likeness. I had had it made in Paris as a present for Madame d'Urfé; and I had not given it to her because the painter had made me too young. I had filled the box with the excellent Havana snuff which Monsieur de Chavigny[12] had given me and which Teresa liked very much, and I was waiting for her to ask me for some so that I could take it from my pocket.

It was the Abate Gama, who had some very good snuff in a box from Orihuela,[13] who passed it to Teresa, and she passed him some of hers in a snuffbox of light-colored tortoise shell, encrusted all over with gold, than which nothing could be handsomer. Gama finds fault with Teresa's snuff; I pronounce it good, but I venture to say that mine is better. With that I take out my snuffbox and offer her a pinch, holding it open. She could not see the portrait. She agrees that the snuff is excellent.

"In that case, Signora, shall we exchange?"

"Gladly. Give me a piece of paper."

"There's no need for that. Snuff is exchanged in whatever boxes it happens to be in."

So saying, I put Teresa's box in my pocket, and I hand her mine closed. When she sees the portrait she gives a cry which startles the company, and she cannot refrain from printing a kiss on the medallion.

"Look," she immediately says to Cesarino. "It is your portrait."

Cesarino looks at it in astonishment, and the box makes the round of the table. Everyone says it is my own portrait made ten years earlier but that it could pass for Cesarino's. Teresa is mad about it and swears the box shall never leave her hands, she gets up from the table and embraces her dear brother several times. I saw that the Abate Gama's politic mind was busily drawing conclusions from the little incident. He left toward nightfall, saying that he expected me for breakfast the next morning.

I spent the day flirting with Redegonda and Teresa, who, seeing that the girl attracted me, advised me to speak out and promised to invite her to visit her whenever I liked. But Teresa did not know her well.

The next morning the Abate Gama gave me a cup of exquisite chocolate; he said that he had sent word to Marshal Botta and that he would come for me at four o'clock to present me to him. Then, as ever the slave of his curiosity, he politely reproached me for having said nothing about my great wealth in my brief account of my adventures.

"My wealth, Signor Abate, is not great; but I have friends whose purses are open to me."

"If you have true friends you are rich. But they are very scarce."

Leaving him, I went to visit Redegonda, to whom I would gladly have given the preference over La Corticelli. She received me in a room in which I saw her mother, her uncle, and three or four children, her brothers and sisters.

"Have you not another room in which to receive your friends?"

"I do not need another room, for I have no friends to receive."

"Have the room and you will have friends. This one is all very well for receiving relatives, but not people who, like myself, come to pay homage to your charms and your talent."

"My daughter, Signore," said her mother, "has very little talent and no charms."

"Yet I find her most pleasing."

"That is an honor for her, and she will receive you whenever you come to see her, but in no other room than this."

"Here I am afraid I inconvenience you. Good-by, Signora."

I went to Teresa's and told her about my visit, and we laughed over it. She said she would be glad to see me at the opera in her camerino,[14] which I could enter by giving a testone[15] to the man who stood guard at the little stairway leading to the stage.

The Abate Gama came to fetch me to introduce me to Marshal Botta. I saw a man in every way worthy of respect. He was famous because of the Genoese affair.[16] He was commanding the Austrian army in person when the people of Genoa, angry at the presence of foreigners who were there only to subjugate their country, revolted and drove them out of the city. But for that the ancient Republic would have perished. He was with some Florentine ladies and gentlemen, whom he left in my honor. He talked to me of Venice like a man who knew my country well, and, after making me talk at length about France, he seemed satisfied. In his turn he talked of the Russian Court, where he had been when Elisabeth Petrovna, who still reigned, so easily ascended the throne of her father,[17] Peter the Great. He said that only in Russia did politics know the art of using poisons.

At the hour when the opera began, the Marshal withdrew, and everyone left. After taking home the Abate, who naturally assured me that I had made a very good impression on the Marshal, I went to the opera too, where, at the price of a testone, I went up to Teresa's camerino, to find her pretty chambermaid dressing her. She advised me to go to Redegonda's camerino, where, as she had to dress as a man, she might let me see charming things.

I had myself shown to it, and her mother did not want me to stay, for her daughter was just then dressing in male attire; but when I assured her I would turn my back she gave me permission, saying that I could sit at her toilet table. Now there was a large mirror on the toilet table, which admirably enabled me to see for nothing all of Redegonda's most private treasures, especially when she awkwardly put her legs into her breeches. She lost nothing by it, for I would have signed any conditions in order to obtain her favors. I thought it impossible she did not know that, seated where I was, I must see everything, and the idea increased my flame. I turned when her mother gave me permission, and, in her disguise as a man, admired this girl of twenty-one who was perfectly proportioned and five feet tall.

As soon as Redegonda was dressed she went out; whereupon I was able to talk with her privately in the wings.

"I am on fire," I said, "charming Redegonda, and I feel that I shall die if you do not make me happy. Do not pretend: as you know that in your mirror I saw the whole of you, and I cannot imagine you capable of having set me aflame only to drive me to despair."

"What can you have seen? I don't know what you're talking about."

"Come now. It's possible; but answer me. That's what matters. What am I to do to have you?"

"To have me? I do not understand such language. I am a decent girl."

"I believe it; and you must believe that after you have loved me you will not be anything else. Speak out, for I must know my fate this instant."

"I cannot say anything but that you are at liberty to come to see me."

"At what hour will you be alone?"

"Alone? Never."

"Very well, then, let your mother be present; it will not matter. If she is wise she will pretend not to see, and I will give you a hundred ducati each time."

"Really, either you are mad or you do not know me."

When, a quarter of an hour later, I recounted the whole incident to Teresa she advised me, after laughing heartily, to go at once and offer the mother the hundred ducati, and, if she refused them, to consider it good riddance and try my luck elsewhere.

I go back to the camerino, where she is alone.

"Signora, I am a foreigner, and I shall leave in a week or ten days; I am rich and in love with your daughter. Will you bring her to sup with me this evening, and be obliging? I will give you a hundred zecchini, and after that you shall ruin me."

"To whom do you think you are speaking? Your effrontery amazes me. Inquire who I am, and inquire into my daughter's behavior. You are the first person in the world who has dared to address me in such a manner."

"Then good-by, Signora."

"Good-by, Signore."

I find Redegonda in the wings, and I repeat the dialogue to her word for word. She bursts out laughing.

"Did I do right, or wrong?"

"More right than wrong; but if you love me come to see us."

"Come to see you now!"

"Why not? Who knows?"

"Who knows? You do not know me. Hope poisons me, my beautiful Redegonda; that is why I spoke to you clearly."

Determined to put the girl out of my mind, I went to sup with Teresa, where I spent three delicious hours which made my soul rejoice. The next day, having a great deal of writing to do, I did not go out, and toward evening I saw La Corticelli before me with her mother and her brother. She had come to hold me to my promise that I would protect her against the Jewish impresario who would not let her dance the pas de deux as he had undertaken to do in the contract. I said she should come to breakfast with me the next morning and I would talk to the Jew in her presence, provided he would come; I promised to send for him. Needing to finish my letters and to refrain from eating, I told Costa to serve them supper.

After finishing my correspondence, feeling in the mood for amusement, I have the little madcap sit beside me and I flirt with her in a fashion to which Signora Laura could make no objection; but I am a little surprised when the youth comes to join in.

"You are not a girl," I say.

Thus apostrophized, the rascal shows me that he is a boy, but in such a scandalous way that his sister, who was sitting on my lap, gives a great burst of laughter and throws herself into her mother's arms at the other end of the room, where, after eating a good supper, she had respectfully retired. When he sees his sister gone, the little scoundrel treats me to a gesture which annoys me, and I give him a light box on the ear. I rise and I ask Signora Laura for what purpose she has brought me this catamite. The only answer she gives me is:

"Isn't he a very pretty boy?"

I told her to leave, giving the Giton[18] a scudo to make up to him for the box on the ear. He took it, kissing my hand.

I went to bed laughing over the incident, for, such as nature made me, the wristband game[19] could never have been anything but the consequence of an intoxication produced by a great friendship.

The next morning I sent Costa to the Jew with a message asking him to come and hear something I had to tell him. A little later La Corticelli arrived with her mother, and the Jew came as we were breakfasting.

After setting forth La Corticelli's grievance to him, I read him his contract and I told him quietly that I could easily find means to make him abide by his undertaking.

After offering various excuses, whose insubstantiality La Corticelli herself proved to him, he ended by promising me he would see the ballet master that day and instruct him to have her dance with a partner whom he named to me and who, by her account, would be very glad to compose a pas de deux for her. After thus settling the matter, I let them leave.

I went to the Abate Gama's, to go on to dinner at Marshal Botta's, who had sent us an invitation. It was at this dinner that I made the acquaintance of the Chevalier Mann,[20] the English Resident, who was the idol of Florence, a man of wealth, amiable, a great lover of the arts, and with excellent taste. The next day I paid him a visit, and in his small garden, the furnishings of his house, his pictures, and his choice books, I saw the man of genius. After returning my visit he invited me to dinner, and he was kind enough also to invite Signora Palesi, her brother, and her husband. After dinner Cesarino delighted the company at the harpsichord. The conversation turning to resemblances, the Chevalier Mann showed us some miniature portraits of amazing beauty. Shortly before she left, Teresa told me gravely that she had kept me in mind.

"I told Redegonda," she said, "that I would come for her and keep her for supper with me and send her home afterward. Come to supper too, have your carriage wait at my door, and you shall be the one to take her home. You will have her alone with you only a few minutes, but that is something. I would wager that you will find her submissive."

"You shall hear the whole story tomorrow. I will not fail to be at your supper."

I got there at nine o'clock. Teresa receives me as one receives an unexpected friend, I tell Redegonda that I congratulate myself on finding her there, and she replies gaily that she had not expected to have the pleasure of seeing me. At supper no one had any appetite; only

Redegonda ate very heartily and laughed a great deal at all the stories I told her. After supper Teresa asks Redegonda if she wishes to have a sedan chair sent for or if she will let me take her home; she replies that, if I will be so kind, there is no need for a sedan chair. This answer makes me sure of everything. Good nights are said, embraces exchanged, I give her my arm, which she presses, we go down, her brother opens the carriage door; Redegonda gets in, I get in after her, and when I go to sit down, I find the place taken, I hear a great shriek of laughter and Redegonda saying to me:

"It's my mother."

I should have made a joke of it, but I did not have the strength. Redegonda sat down on her mother's lap. I coldly asked her why she had not come upstairs to supper with us. When we reached her door the virtuosa's mother said I might come up, but I excused myself, and for good reason. If she had done the slightest thing to annoy me I would have boxed her ears, and the man they had in the house looked too much like a cutthroat.

In my fury, I think of going to La Corticelli's; the hour was unwonted, and I had never been there; but no matter. I needed to calm myself, and I was almost certain I should find the Bolognese girl accommodating and Signora Laura unable to resist money.

My lackey shows me the way to her room.

"That will do. Go and wait for me in the carriage."

I knock, I knock again, the family wakes:

"Who is there?"

I give my name, the door is opened, I enter in darkness, and I hear Signora Laura say she is going to light a candle, and that if I had let her know she would have waited up for me despite its being so cold; and in fact I felt as if I were in an icehouse. I hear La Corticelli laughing, I grope for her bed, I find it, I put in my hand, and I touch the too obvious tokens of the male sex. I guess it is her brother, and I see him by the light of the candle her mother has lighted. I see his sister lying in the same bed laughing, with the covers drawn up to her chin because, like her brother, she was stark naked. Despite my freedom from prejudice on the subject, such infamous behavior disgusts me.

"Why," I ask Signora Laura, "do you not keep your son in bed with you?"

"What harm can I fear? They are brother and sister."

"It is not good."

The catamite makes off and gets into his mother's bed, and La Corticelli says in her Bolognese dialect, which immediately sets me laughing, that it was neither good nor bad, since she loved her brother only as a brother and he loved her only as a sister. She ended by saying that if I wanted her to sleep alone I had only to buy her a bed, which she would take with her when she went back to Bologna.

Talking and gesticulating, she unwittingly let me see a third of her nudity, and I saw nothing worth seeing, nevertheless it was ordained that I should fall in love with her skin, for it was all she had. If she had been alone I would have gone further with her; but, her mother and her brother being there, I feared scenes which might anger me. I gave her ten zecchini to buy herself a bed, and I left her.

I took refuge in my inn, cursing all the execrable mothers of virtuose.

I spent the whole of the next morning with Monsieur Mann in the gallery,[21] where in the course of five or six visits I saw marvels in the way of paintings, statues, and engraved gems. Before going to dine with the Abate Gama, whom I had invited, I went to tell Teresa the story of my two adventures of the night before, and we laughed over them. She said that if I absolutely needed a girl I had only to take La Corticelli, who certainly would not keep me languishing.

At table the Abate Gama, talking politics in good earnest, asks me if I would be willing to represent the Court of Portugal in a certain matter at the congress which, all Europe believed, was to be held in the city of Augsburg.[22] He assured me that if I did well in the post, which he would be glad to solicit for me, I could be sure that if I went to Lisbon afterward I could get whatever I might want from the Court. I replied that he would find me ready to undertake anything of which he thought me capable, that he had only to write to me, and that I would see to it that he always had my address. It was at that moment that I first felt the strongest possible desire to become a diplomat.

That evening at the opera I talked to the ballet master, to the dancer who was to be my protégée's partner, and to the Jew, who confirmed his promise that she should dance the pas de deux three or four days later and every day for the rest of the Carnival. La Corticelli told me she already had a bed and invited me to supper with her. I promised I would go.

Being sure that I would pay for everything, her mother had sent out to a cookshop for a supper for four, which was good enough, and several flagons of the best Florentine wine; in addition there was a clarified wine called "ogliatico" or "aleatico,"[23] which I found excellent, but the mother, the son, and the daughter, who were not accustomed to drinking so well, became tipsy. The mother and son went off to bed without ceremony, and the little madcap did likewise, urging me to follow her example. I did not dare, the cold was intense, there was no fire in the room, and her bed had only one cover; if I had undressed I should have caught a cold. She gave herself to me and tried to assure me that I was her first lover, and I pretended to believe her. I left after spending two hours with her, promising to spend the following night with her on condition that she would heat the room with a brazier and would buy another cover, and I left her fifty zecchini.

The next day a letter which I received from Grenoble interested me greatly. Valenglart wrote me that La Roman had left for Paris with her aunt, having become convinced that if they did not go what the horoscope declared could never come true.

So they would never have gone there if I had not taken it into my head to cast them a fantastic horoscope, for even if astrology had been a science I knew nothing about it. We find countless events in real history which would never have occurred if they had not been predicted. This is because we are the authors of our so-called destiny, and all the "antecedent necessities" of the Stoics are chimerical; the argument which proves the power of destiny seems strong only because it is sophistical. Cicero laughed at it. Someone whom he had invited to dinner, who had promised to go, and who had not appeared, wrote him that since he had not gone it was evident that he had not been iturus ("going to go"). Cicero answers him: Veni ergo cras, et veni etiamsi venturus non sis ("Then come tomorrow, and come even if you are not going to come").[24] At this date, when I am conscious that I rely entirely on my common sense, I owe this explanation to my reader, despite the axiom, Fata viam inveniunt ("Destiny finds the way").[25] If the fatalists are obliged by their own philosophy to consider the concatenation of all events necessary, a parte ante ("a priori"), what remains of man's moral freedom is nothing; and in that case he can neither earn merit nor incur guilt.[26] I cannot in conscience admit that I am a machine.

Having gone to the theater to see La Corticelli rehearse her pas de deux, I saw her in possession of a fine pelisse. When the other ballerinas caught sight of me they treated me to scornful looks; but my favorite, proud of being preferred, came to speak to me and give me playful pinches.[27]

At supper I found that Signora Laura had provided a large brazier and another cover on the bed. She showed me all the things her daughter had bought for herself and complained that she had not provided clothes for her brother. I pacified her by giving her six zecchini.

In bed I found the girl neither in love nor passionate but amusing. She made me laugh, and I found her accommodating. She needed no more to keep me constant. I gave her a watch and promised to sup with her on the next day but one. By then she should have danced her pas de deux.

But I was surprised when I saw her appear only in ensembles.

I go to sup with her as I had promised, and I find her wretched; she tells me, with tears, that I must avenge her for the insult, that the Jew put the blame on the tailor but he was lying. I try to calm her by promising her everything, I spend several hours with her, and I go back to my inn resolved to avenge her after making inquiries.

The next morning early I send Costa to tell the Jew to call on me. He answers that he knows what I want, and that if La Corticelli was not dancing in this opera she would dance in the next.

I then saw what had to be done, but I also saw that I must pretend to take the thing lightly. I summoned Leduc, I told him the whole story, saying that I would be dishonored if I did not avenge myself. I told him that he alone could give me the satisfaction of arranging a good cudgeling for the scoundrel, who by breaking his word to me had given me such an obvious proof of his disregard. I promised him twenty zecchini. I impressed the importance of secrecy on him. He asked me for twenty-four hours before he gave me a positive answer.

The next morning he came to my bedside to tell me that during the preceding day he had devoted himself entirely to acquiring a knowledge of the Jew's person and of the house in which he lived, asking information from no one.

"Today," he said, "I will not let him out of my sight; I shall know at what hour he goes to bed, and tomorrow you shall hear the rest."

"Be prudent, and before you entrust the business to anyone consider carefully."

The next day he tells me that if he goes home at the same hour and takes the same road, he will have the cudgeling before he gets to bed.

"What men have you chosen?"

"No one but myself, on whom I can rely, and you shall not give me the twenty zecchini until the whole town is telling the story. After cudgeling him I will go back for my redingote where I will have left it and I will re-enter the inn by the back door, going off to bed without anyone seeing me. Even Costa will be able to swear that I cannot possibly be the man who cudgeled him if anyone should say so. However, I will have pistols in my pocket in case I have to defend myself."

The next morning he comes to dress my hair and I see he is calm. But as soon as he sees that I am alone he gives me the news that the thing is done.

"The Jew," he said, "instead of running threw himself on the ground, his shouts brought a few people, and I slipped away. I don't know if I killed him, for two blows landed on his head."

"I should be sorry if you did."

I was invited to dinner at Teresa's, where the guests were Signor Sassi, the first castrato, and the Abate Gama. I hear the pretty story told. I say I am sorry, though he is a scoundrel. The castrato says he is not sorry, and that he is sure people will say it was he who made him the present.

"They are saying," the Abate said to me, "that it is you who had it done, and for good reason."

"It will not be easy to discover who is behind it," I replied, "for the rascal has gone too far with many decent people."

The subject was dropped at last, and we dined in high spirits.

The Jew got up from bed a few days later with a plaster on his nose, and the thing was generally attributed to me; but when nothing was discovered the affair was finally forgotten. Only La Corticelli, as wild with joy as she was scatterbrained, talked as if she were sure it was I who had avenged her and was furious with me for refusing to admit it.

With all this to entertain me, I was not thinking of leaving Florence in any hurry, when Doctor Vannini handed me a letter which someone had left with him. I open it in his presence and I find a bill of exchange for two hundred Florentine scudi drawn on Sasso Sassi,[28] at which Vannini looks and says it is good. I retire to my room to read the letter and I see that it is signed "Charles Ivanov."

He wrote me from the posthouse inn at Pistoia[29] that, still without luck or money, he had told his story to an Englishman who was leaving Florence for Lucca and who had generously made him a present of two hundred scudi, giving him the enclosed bill of exchange, which he had written in his presence. It was payable to bearer.

"I do not," he wrote, "dare to come to Florence myself for fear I shall be recognized and arrested because of the unfortunate business at Genoa. So I beg you to take pity on me, to send someone to collect the amount, and forward it to me here at once so that I can leave after paying my host."

The favor the poor wretch asked of me was very small; but I might compromise myself, for not only might the bill be false but even if it were good it would proclaim me a friend of his and in correspondence with him, a man whose name and description had been published in the gazettes. I decide to return his note to him in person. I go to the post station alone, I have two horses harnessed, and I go to the posthouse inn at Pistoia; the innkeeper himself takes me to the scoundrel's room and leaves me. I remained there only three or four minutes to tell him, handing him back his bill, that Signor Sassi knew me and that I did not want to give anyone grounds for supposing that I had any sort of connection with him. I advise him to give the bill of exchange to the innkeeper, who will simply go with it to Signor Sassi and bring him the money. He says he will take my advice, I leave him and return to Florence.

No later than the next day but one, I see Signor Sassi and the innkeeper from Pistoia in my room. Signor Sassi shows me the note for two hundred scudi, saying that the person who had given it to me had swindled me because, firstly, it was not in the lord's handwriting, and, secondly, the said lord, having no money in his bank, could not draw on him.

"This man here," he said, "discounted the bill, the Russian left, he comes to me for his money, I tell him the bill is forged, and he replies that it was you who brought it to the Russian in person and that, knowing you, he did not hesitate to discount it; he claims that you should reimburse him."

"I? He is mad."

I then tell Signor Sassi the whole story, I show him the letter in which the Russian had sent me the bill, I summon Vannini, who had brought me the letter and who was ready to swear that he had seen the bill of exchange. Signor Sassi tells the innkeeper from Pistoia that he is mistaken in claiming that I should reimburse him, but the innkeeper sticks to his guns; he insists on my reimbursing him, going so far as to say that I must be in league with the Russian to swindle him.

At that I run for my cane, the banker holds me, and the innkeeper decamps. Signor Sassi tells me that I am in the right, that I should pay no attention to what the innkeeper had said to me in his anger, and he leaves.

The next day I received a note from the head of the police, who is called the Auditor,[30] in which he asked me to call on him. I had no choice but to do so. As a foreigner, I must go and learn what he had to say to me. After receiving me politely enough, he tells me in so many words that I must reimburse the Pistoian innkeeper for the two hundred scudi he had given the Russian, since he would never have given them to him if he had not seen me bring him the note; I reply that, as a judge, he cannot sentence me to pay unless he believes I am an accomplice in the swindle. Instead of answering me ad unguem ("precisely") he repeats that I must pay.

"Signor Auditore, I will not pay."

He then rings, bowing to me, and I leave. I go to the banker Sassi and give him an account of the conversation I had just had with the Auditor, he is amazed, I beg him to go to him and make him listen to reason, he is willing, and he goes. I told him that I was to dine at the Abate Gama's.

When I told Gama the whole story he was indignant. He said he foresaw that the Auditor would stick to his guns, and that if Signor Sassi did not succeed I should inform Marshal Botta of the entire affair.

"That is unnecessary, for, after all, the Auditor cannot force me to pay."

"He can do worse."

"What?"

"Send you an order to leave."

"If he has that power I shall be surprised if he dares to abuse it to such an extent; but rather than pay I will leave. Let us go to the Marshal."

We go there at four o'clock, and we find that the banker Sassi is with him and has already informed him of the situation. Sassi, obviously mortified, tells me that the Auditor refused to listen to reason and that if I want to remain in Florence I must pay; I reply that I will leave when I receive the order, and that I will publish an account of this crying injustice. The Marshal tells me that the Auditor's decision is beyond belief and that he regrets he cannot interfere in the matter, but that I will do well to leave rather than pay.

Early the next morning a man brought me a letter from the Auditor, which I have mislaid, in which he told me that, my case being such that the usual legal steps could not be taken to make me pay, he had no choice but to order me to leave Florence within three days and Tuscany within five. His responsibility for the security of the city empowered him to give me this order. He said that I would be free to return as soon as His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke, to whom I was free to appeal, had disapproved of his decision.

I answered this Cassian[31] judge by only two lines, saying that his order would be executed to the letter.

After thus accepting my sentence, I put everything in order for my departure, and I spent the three days, during which I kept the Auditor's letter in my pocket, amusing myself at Teresa's, at the Chevalier Mann's, and at La Corticelli's, promising her that I would come to fetch her in person during Lent and spend a few days in Bologna with her. During the three days the Abate Gama was with me constantly. My great pleasure was the general distress which I saw in my friends and the execration bestowed on the Auditor. The day before I left, the Marchese Botta invited me to a dinner for thirty, and I spent that last day with my dear Teresa, both of us promising to maintain a regular correspondence in future. I left the next morning, and reached Rome in thirty-six hours.

It was an hour after midnight. The great city can be entered at any time; a foreigner is at once sent to the Customs Office,[32] which is always open, where his baggage is examined. The customs officials are strict only in regard to books. I had thirty or more, all hostile to religion or to the virtues it prescribes. I knew this, and I had resigned myself to giving them up without an argument, for I needed to get to bed at once. The clerk who examined my baggage politely told me to count them and leave them with him, assuring me that he would bring them all to me the next day at the inn to which I was going. I assented, and he kept his word. I gave him two zecchini.

No sooner is the examination over than I am in the Piazza di Spagna and in front of the "City of Paris";[33] such was the name of the inn which had been recommended to me. The whole household was asleep, my arrival rouses someone, I am asked to wait in a small room on the ground floor while a fire is made in the apartment I am to occupy. All the chairs were littered with dresses, petticoats, or shifts, I hear a girl in bed, covered up so that I see only her head, telling me to sit on her bed, in which another girl was asleep. I see a smiling mouth and two eyes which look like carbuncles. I praise them and ask her to let me kiss them. She answers only by putting her head under the coverlet; but I slip my hand beneath it and halfway down her figure and, finding her stark naked, I withdraw it, asking her to forgive me if I have been too inquisitive. I think I see that she is grateful for my kindness in restraining my curiosity.

"Who are you, my beautiful angel?"

"I am Teresa Roland,[34] daughter of the innkeeper, and this is my sister."

"You are seventeen?"

"Not quite."

"I can hardly wait to see you up and in my room tomorrow."

"Are there ladies in your party?"

"No."

"Too bad. We never go up to gentlemen's rooms."

"Won't you hold the coverlet a little lower? It keeps you from talking."

"It's too cold."

"Charming Teresa, your eyes scorch my soul."

She puts her head under the coverlet again, I seize the opportunity once more to advance my hand, she curls up, I take her by surprise, and I am sure that the angel is female.

It is enough. I withdraw my hand, again asking her pardon, and I see her little face reassured, smiling, red as fire, showing just a trace of anger but at the same time of consent. I was about to treat her to a discourse full of love, sentiment, and passion when a pretty maid entered and told me to go up.

"Good-by until tomorrow," I said to the charming Teresa, who answered only by turning over to resume her sleep.

After ordering dinner for one o'clock I go to bed and I sleep until noon, all my dreams being of this new Teresa. Costa tells me he has found the house in which my brother is living[35] and has left a note there. This was my brother Giovanni, who must then have been thirty years of age and who was in Rome studying under the famous Mengs,[36] who was at that time deprived of his pension because of the war, which obliged the King of Poland to live in Warsaw, the Prussians having occupied his Electorate of Saxony. It had been ten years since I had seen this brother.

I was still at table when I saw him appear before me. After embracing each other and spending an hour talking, he giving me a brief account of the little happenings of his life and I of the great ones of mine, he ended by saying that I should at once leave this inn, where it was expensive to live, and lodge where it would cost me nothing, in the house of the painter Mengs, who had an apartment which was unoccupied. As for meals, he said there was a cookshop in the same street. I reply that I have not the strength of mind to change lodgings because I have fallen in love with one of the innkeeper's daughters; and I tell him the story of the previous night. He laughs and replies that it is not love but a passing fancy, which I can still pursue, and he persuades me. I promised I would go to lodge with him the next day, and we went out together to walk about Rome a little.

I at once go to La Minerva[37] to call on Donna Cecilia,[38] and I am told that she had died two years earlier. I inquire where her daughter Donna Angelica[39] lives, I go there, I find her in, she gives me a poor reception, even to the point of saying that she scarcely remembers having met me. I leave her, and I feel no regret; she seems to me to have become ugly. I obtain the address of the doctor, the printer's son, who was to have married Baruccia,[40] and I put off visiting him until some other day, according the same treatment to my kind Father Giorgi,[41] who enjoyed the highest reputation in Rome. I also inquire for Don Gaspare Vivaldi[42] and am told that he is living in the country. My brother then took me to call on Signora Cherufini,[43] and this time I enter a house of the highest fashion. He introduces me, the lady receives me in the Roman manner, I find her charming and her daughters[44] even more so; but their swains of every description are too numerous, there is a glitter which annoys me, and the young ladies, one of whom was as pretty as a Cupid, seem too polite to everyone. I am asked an interesting question, I reply in a manner which should inspire a second, and I am not asked it. I do not care. I see that in this house I should lose something of my intrinsic value, and that the reason for it was the rank of the person who had brought me there. I hear an abate saying to another who is looking at me:

"He is Casanova's brother."

I tell him he should have said it was Casanova who was my brother, and he replies that it makes no difference. An abate says that it does make a difference, we talk, and we become good friends. It was the celebrated Abate Winckelmann,[45] who twelve years later[46] was murdered in Trieste.

Cardinal Alessandro Albani[47] arrives, Winckelmann introduces me; and His Eminence, who was nearly blind, says a great many things to me; none of them worth hearing. As soon as he learns that I am the man who had escaped from the Leads he rudely says that he is amazed that I have the effrontery to come to Rome, where at the least request from the Venetian State Inquisitors an ordine santissimo[48] would oblige me to leave. Nettled by such a warning, I bitterly reply that he had chosen the wrong ground on which to condemn me for effrontery, since I ran no risk in Rome.

"It would be the State Inquisitors," I said, "who could be taxed with effrontery if they dared to ask for me, since they would be unable to state for what crime they had deprived me of my freedom."

My short and tart reply silenced the Cardinal, who, ashamed to have taken me for a fool, said not another word. I never again set foot in the Casa Cherufini. We returned to the "City of Paris" with the Abate Winckelmann, whom my brother persuaded to stay to supper with us. The Abate bore a strong resemblance to the Abbé de Voisenon.[49] The next day the three of us went to the Villa Albani[50] to see the Cavaliere Mengs,[51] who was living there, being engaged in painting a ceiling.[52]

My host Roland, knowing my brother, came to pay me a visit while we were supping. I told the man, who was from Avignon and fond of good living, that I was sorry to leave his establishment to lodge with my brother because I had fallen in love with his daughter Teresa, though I had talked with her only a quarter of an hour and seen nothing of her but her head.

"You saw her in bed, I wager."

"Exactly. I want to see her out of it. With all due respect, may I ask you to have her come up?"

"Gladly."

She came up, delighted to have her father summon her. She had an elegant figure, her manner was cheerful and frank, and she could pass for pretty, though her only striking feature was her eyes. My enthusiasm diminished; but my brother, without saying a word to me, took such a fancy to her that, a year later,[53] he let himself be trapped. The young Teresa had the art to make him marry her, and two years later he took her with him to Dresden, where I saw her five years afterward with an infant. She died of consumption ten years later.

The next morning at the Villa Albani I saw for the first time the indefatigable painter Mengs, who was truly great in his art, but no less great an eccentric in society. However, I found him pleasant and glad that he could lodge me in Rome, to which he expected to return in a few days with his whole family. But what astonished me was the Villa Albani. Cardinal Alessandro had had it built, and, to satisfy his taste for antiquities, he had allowed nothing to be used in its construction except antique materials. Not only the statues and vases but all the columns and even the pedestals were Greek, and, being a great connoisseur and a shrewd Greek himself,[54] he had done it all at very little expense. Then, too, he often bought on credit, like Damasippus;[55] so no one could say that he was ruining himself. If a sovereign had wanted to erect the same building Attalicis conditionibus ("regardless of expense"),[56] it might have cost him fifty millions.

Not being able to have antique ceilings, he had them painted by Mengs, who was admittedly the greatest and most painstaking painter of this century and who most unfortunately died in the middle of his career,[57] without ever having trained a single good successor, for my brother never did anything to deserve the name of his pupil.

1761.

I shall have much more to say about Mengs when I am in Spain, that is, in the year 1767.

I had scarcely settled in with my brother, rented a fine carriage, and dressed my coachman and hire valet in livery before I waited on Monsignor Cornaro,[58] an Auditor of the Rota,[59] with the intention of making my way into the best society after arranging to be presented to His Holiness; but Monsignor Cornaro, fearing that, as a Venetian, he might compromise himself, introduced me to Cardinal Passionei,[60] who mentioned me to the sovereign pontiff; but before being granted this honor, here is what happened to me on my second visit to this most unusual Cardinal, an enemy of the Jesuits, a man of intelligence, and graced with a rare knowledge of literature.

CHAPTER IX

Cardinal Passionei. The Pope. Mariuccia. I arrive in Naples.

HE RECEIVED me in a great room in which he was busily writing; a minute later he put down his pen. He could not give me permission to sit, for there were no chairs. After saying that he would inform the Holy Father that he had seen me, he added that Monsignor Cornaro might have thought of someone better, since the Pope did not like him.[1]

"He chose to set esteem above liking."

"I do not know if he esteems me; but I know that he knows I do not esteem him. I liked and esteemed him as a cardinal, but since he has become Pope he has shown himself too much the coglione."[2]

"The Sacred College should have elected Your Eminence."

"Certainly not, for, intolerant as I am toward all that I consider wrong, I should perhaps have made too clean a sweep, and God knows what would have happened. The only member of the conclave with the qualities to be elected Pope was Cardinal Tamburini.[3] But come tomorrow, for I hear people arriving."

How my soul rejoiced when I heard none other than His Eminence call the Pope a coglione (fool) and commend Tamburini! I immediately noted it down in my records. But who may this Tamburini be? After dinner I put the question to Winckelmann, for when one would learn one should seek out a philosopher.

"Tamburini," he said, "is deserving of respect for his virtues, his character, his far-seeing intelligence, and his firmness. He has never concealed what he thinks of the Jesuits. He despises them, and that is why Passionei commends him. I, too, believe that he would be a great Pope."

But here is what I heard in Rome nine years later at the Prince of Santa Croce's[4] from a tool of the Jesuits, who were then at their last gasp:[5] The Benedictine Cardinal Tamburini was impious; on his deathbed he demanded the viaticum without first making his confession. I hear that, and I say nothing. The next day I asked someone who should know the truth of the matter and who could have no reason to hide it. He said that the Cardinal had himself celebrated mass three days earlier, and so it must be concluded that if he did not ask for a confessor it was because he would have had nothing to tell him.

Woe unto those who love truth and who do not know enough to seek it at its source. I hope, my dear reader, that you will not find it hard to forgive me my digressions.

So the next day I go to see the Cardinal, and he at once puts down his pen, saying that I had done well by coming early to tell him the story of my escape, of which he had heard wonders.

"Willingly, Your Most Excellent Eminence, but it is a long story."

"So be it. I have heard that you tell it well."

"Shall I sit on the floor?"

"Oh no, your coat is too handsome."

He rings. He tells the gentleman who enters to have a seat brought, and a lackey brings me a stool. A seat without arms or a back makes me angry, I tell my story badly, and in a quarter of an hour it is all over.

"I write better than you speak," he said, "and if you do not believe me read this at your leisure, it is a funeral eulogy on Prince Eugene;[6] I make you a present of it. You may go to kiss the Holy Father's foot tomorrow at ten o'clock."

Back at the house and thinking of the odd character of this Cardinal, a man of intelligence yet haughty, vain, and talkative, I decide to make him a handsome present. It was the Pandectarum Liber unicus,[7] which my Swiss acquaintance M. F.[8] had given me at Bern and for which I had no use; it was a folio, well bound and in a good state of preservation. It was a gift which, as the chief Librarian of the Vatican, he should prize, the more so since he had a fine library of his own[9] under the care of my friend Winckelmann. So I write His Eminence a short letter in Latin, and another to Winckelmann, who was to present the code to him as an offering from me. I thought this rare book was more than a fair exchange for his funeral oration, and I hoped that on another occasion he would not leave me to ask for a stool. I sent it to the Abate at once by Costa.

The next morning at the appointed hour I go to Monte Cavallo.[10] I needed to be neither introduced nor announced to the Holy Father, for any Christian is at liberty to appear before him once he sees the door open; besides, he had known me in Padua when he occupied the episcopal throne there;[11] nevertheless, I had preferred to have my visit arranged beforehand.

I had scarcely entered and kissed the holy cross depicted on his holy slipper before, laying one hand on my left shoulder, he said that he remembered the time I left his reception at Padua as soon as he began chanting the Rosary.

"I have, Most Holy Father, much greater sins to reproach myself with; so I have come to prostrate myself at your feet to receive absolution for them."

He then gave me his blessing with an ample gesture and asked me what favor I wished to ask of him.

"Your Holiness's intercession, so that I can freely return to Venice."

"We will speak to the Ambassador and give you our answer afterward. Do you often go to see Cardinal Passionei?"

"I have been there three times; he gave me his funeral oration on Prince Eugene, and to show him my gratitude I have sent him the Pandects as a present."

"Has he received it?"

"I believe so."

"If he has, he will send Winckelmann to pay you for it."

"That would be to treat me like a bookseller. I will not accept any payment."

"In that case he will send you back the code, we are certain. That is his habit."

"If His Eminence sends me back the code I will send him back the funeral oration."

At that the Pope laughed so hard that he was seized by a fit of coughing, and, after spitting, he laughed again.

"We shall be pleased to know the end of this incident, without the world's being informed of our harmless curiosity."

After these words a benediction given with an even more ample gesture informed me that my audience was ended.

As I left, an elderly Abate approached me, asking me in surprised tones if I was the Casanova who had escaped from the Leads.

"I am he."

"And you do not remember me? I am Momolo,[12] gondolier in those days for the Ca' Rezzonico." [13]

"Then you have become a priest?"

"Certainly not, but here we all dress as priests. I am first scopatore[14] (sweeper) to the Most Holy Father."

"I heartily congratulate you, and I beg you to excuse me if it makes me laugh."

"Laugh away, for my wife and my daughters laugh too every time they see me dressed as a priest. Come to see us."

"Where do you live?"

"Behind Trinità dei Monti.[15] Here is my address."

"You shall see me this evening."

I returned to the house, delighting in the thought that I was to spend the evening with the family of a Venetian gondolier. Dining with my brother, I told him nothing of my conversation with the Pope, but I invited him to accompany me on my visit to the gondolier turned scopatore santissimo.

But after dinner in comes the Abate Winckelmann, on purpose to tell me that I was high in the good graces of his Cardinal; that the code I had sent him was rare and valuable and in better condition than the one in the Vatican.[16]

"I have come," he said, "to pay you for it."

"I wrote His Eminence that I was making him a present of it."

"He does not accept presents of books, for he wants it for his own library and being Librarian of the Vatican he fears slander."

"That is understandable, but the code cost me nothing, so I do not wish to sell it. Tell the Cardinal that I will be honored if he will accept it as a present."

"He will send it back to you."

"And I will send him back his funeral oration. I will not take presents from someone who refuses to accept them."

And so it was: On the next day the Cardinal sent me back my book, and within the hour I sent him back his funeral oration, writing him that I had found it a masterpiece. My brother emphatically pronounced me wrong, but I paid no attention. Toward nightfall we went to the house of the Abate Momolo, who was expecting me and who had announced me to his family as a prodigy.

After introducing my brother to him, I examine all the members of the family one by one: his wife, four daughters, the eldest of whom was twenty-four, and two little boys; they were all ugly. I was there; it was for me to stay there and try to enjoy myself. In addition, the place smelled of poverty, for the scopatore had to live on two hundred scudi a year. For all that, the worthy man no sooner saw me seated than he told me he wanted to give me supper, though it would be only a polenta[17] and pork chops.

"Will you permit me to send to my house for six bottles of Orvieto[18] wine?"

"It is for you to say."

I immediately wrote Costa a note ordering him to come with the six bottles and a ham. A half hour later he arrived with my hire valet, who was carrying the basket, and all the girls exclaimed:

"What a handsome young man!"

I see Costa delighted, I ask the Abate Momolo if he wants to invite him for supper, all the girls say yes, and I tell him to stay. Delighted to be so honored, Costa immediately goes to the kitchen to help Momolo's wife make the polenta.

A cloth is spread on a large table, and a half hour later a polenta big enough to feed twelve hungry people is brought in and placed on it, followed by a large casserole filled with pork chops.

There is a knock at the street door; the boy says it is Signora Maria and her mother. I see all the girls make wry faces at the news.

"Who sent for them?" asks one.

"What do they want here?" asks another.

"They are hungry," says the father; "they shall share the food which Providence sends us."

I see the two starvelings come in: a very pretty girl of modest bearing and a sad-looking mother who seemed ashamed of her poverty. The girl at once apologizes, she says she would not have come if she had known that strangers were present. Momolo alone answers her greeting, saying that she has done well to come, and he places a chair for her between my brother and myself. I then look at her closely, and I find the poor girl a perfect beauty.

The family fall to eating, no more is said. The polenta is excellent, the pork delicious, the ham perfect; in less than an hour not a sign remains that anything to eat had ever been on the table; but the Orvieto wine continues to keep the company in high spirits. The conversation turns to the lottery,[19] which was to be drawn on the next day but one, and all the girls report the numbers on which they had risked three soldi. I tell them that if I could be sure of only one number I should be satisfied; young Mariuccia, who was on my right, said that if one number was enough for me she could give it to me. I laugh at her offer; but she does not laugh, she tells me in all seriousness that she is sure of twenty-seven. I ask the Abate Momolo if one can still stake, and he replies that the lottery does not close until midnight and that he would himself go and stake; I thereupon give him forty scudi in notes of hand and I tell him to put twenty scudi unconditionally on twenty-seven, of which I made a present to the five girls at the table, and twenty scudi on twenty-seven coming out fifth[20] for myself. He goes, and comes back a quarter of an hour later with the two tickets. Mariuccia thanks me and says she is sure she will win; but that she has doubts about my ticket, for it was not certain that her number would come out fifth.

"But I am certain of it because you are the fifth girl I have seen in the house."

My explanation made everybody laugh. Momolo's wife said I would have done better to give the forty scudi to the poor, and her husband told her to be still, for she had no idea how clever I was. My brother laughs, but he, too, tells me I have done a foolish thing. I reply that I have taken a chance. I adroitly press the modest Mariuccia's hand, she presses mine with all her strength, and I understood all that she meant. I left them about midnight, asking Momolo to repeat the supper on the next evening but one, so that we could rejoice over our winnings in the lottery.

On the way home my brother said that if I had not become rich as Croesus I must be a fool; but he agreed with me that Mariuccia was as beautiful as an angel.

The next day Mengs came to Rome, and I supped with him and his family. He had an ugly though goodhearted sister[21] who was talented; she had been in love with my brother, who, when she spoke to him, did not look her in the face. She painted portraits in miniature which were excellent likenesses, and I believe she is still living in Rome with her husband Maroni.[22] She said to me one day that my brother would not treat her so scornfully if he were not the most ungrateful of men.

Mengs's wife[23] was pretty, virtuous, very scrupulous in performing all the duties of a wife and mother, and very submissive to her husband, whom she could not have loved because he was not lovable. He was stubborn and cruel, and always got up from the table drunk; but when he dined out he had the good sense to drink only water. His wife had the patience to serve as his model for all the nudes he had occasion to paint. She told me one day that her confessor had ordered her to obey her husband in this respect without protest, for otherwise he would have taken another model, whom he would have enjoyed before painting her and so would have sinned.

After supper everyone was tipsy. Winckelmann turned somersaults on the floor with Mengs's children, male and female, who adored him. The learned man liked to frolic with the young in the manner of Anacreon and Horace: Mille puellarum, puerorum mille furores ("Passions for a thousand girls, a thousand boys").[24] What happened to me one day at his house is worth recording.

Early that morning I go without knocking into a small room in which he was usually alone copying out some antique inscription, and I see him hastily leave a boy, at the same time quickly setting his breeches to rights. I pretend to have seen nothing, immersed in admiring an Egyptian idol which was behind the door of the room. The Bathyllus,[25] who was indeed very pretty, leaves; Winckelmann comes to me laughing and says that, after the little I had seen he did not think he could keep me from deducing the rest, but that he owed himself a kind of justification, which he begged me to hear.

"Know," he said, "that not only am I not a pederast, but that all my life long I have declared it inconceivable that the inclination could have exercised such an attraction on the human race. If I said this after what you have just seen, you would pronounce me a hypocrite. But here is the truth of the matter. In the long course of my studies I first came to admire, then to idolize the ancients, who, as you know, were almost all of them b[uggers] [26] without concealing the fact, while a number of them even immortalized the charming objects of their love by their poems and even by magnificent monuments. Indeed, they went so far as to cite their inclination as testimony to their morality—for example, Horace, who, to prove to Augustus and Maecenas that he was beyond the reach of calumny, defied his enemies to prove to him that he had ever incurred the guilt of adultery.[27]

"In the light of this obvious truth, I scrutinized myself, and I felt a kind of disdain and even of shame because in this respect I did not in the least resemble my heroes. At considerable cost to my self-esteem, I felt that I was in a way contemptible, and, unable to convict myself of stupidity merely by cold theory, I decided to seek the light of practice, hoping that by analyzing the thing my mind would gain the illumination it needed in order to distinguish the true from the false. Having so resolved, I have been applying myself to the matter for the past three or four years, choosing the prettiest Smerdiases[28] in Rome; but all to no avail: when I set to work, non arrivo ('I get nowhere'). To my dismay I always find that a woman is preferable in every respect. But, quite aside from my seeing nothing wrong in that, I am afraid of acquiring a bad reputation, for what would people say in Rome, or anywhere else where I am known, if it could be said of me that I have a mistress?"

The next day I went to pay my respects to the Pope.

Seeing the Abate Momolo in the first antechamber, I begged him to bestow his best attention on the evening's polenta, then I was shown into the presence of the Holy Father, who at once said to me:

"The Venetian Ambassador[29] has told us that, if you desire to return to your country, you must present yourself before the Secretary of the Tribunal."[30]

"I am ready to do so, if Your Holiness will give me a letter of recommendation in your own hand. Without such a letter, I will never expose myself to the risk of being shut up in a place from which the invisible hand of God released me by a series of miracles."

"You are wearing a very handsome coat, which you certainly did not put on to offer prayers to God."

"True, most Holy Father, but I did not put it on to go to a ball either."

"We know the whole story of the returned presents. Admit that you gratified your pride."

"But at the same time humbling an even greater pride."

Seeing the Pope smile, I went down on one knee and begged him to grant me his kind permission to present my code of the Pandects to the Vatican Library; by way of answer I received only a benediction, which in Papal language signifies: "Rise, your prayer is granted."

"We will send you," he said, "a token of our singular affection, without your having to pay the customary registration fee."

A second benediction told me to leave. I was curious to see the token of his "singular affection" which the Pope had promised me.

I at once sent my code to the library by Costa, then I dined with Mengs. Someone brings the five numbers drawn in the lottery, and my brother looks at me. I did not remember that I had played.

"Twenty-seven," he said, "came out fifth."

"So much the better, we will be gay."

My brother tells the whole story to Mengs, who replies:

"Follies sometimes turn out luckily; but they are follies none the less."

I told him that I would go at once to Naples to enjoy the fifteen hundred Roman scudi[31] which Fortune had sent me; and the Abate Alfani[32] says that he will come with me as my secretary. I make him promise to do so.

I invited Winckelmann to come and eat polenta at the Abate Momolo's, leaving it to my brother to show him the way there, then I went to see my banker, the Marchese Belloni,[33] to settle my accounts and obtain from him a letter of credit on a banker in Naples. I commanded nearly two hundred thousand francs, I had at least ten thousand scudi in jewels, and thirty thousand florins at Amsterdam.

Toward nightfall I go to Momolo's, where I find Winckelmann and my brother; but instead of finding the family joyous, they seem to me sad. Momolo said his daughters were angry because I had not staked on the number coming out fifth for them as I had for myself. They had twenty-seven scudi each[34] and they were gloomy, whereas two days earlier they had not had a copper and they were gay. More and more clearly I perceive that the true source of gaiety is in the mind which is free from cares.

Costa puts on the table a basket in which there are ten cornucopias of sweetmeats. I say that I will distribute them when everyone is at the table. Momolo's second daughter tells me that Mariuccia is not coming, but that they will send her two cornucopias.

"Why isn't she coming?"

"They had a quarrel yesterday," Momolo answered, "and Mariuccia, who is really in the right, left saying that she would not come again."

"You ungrateful creatures!" I said to them, though not harshly. "Consider that day before yesterday she brought you good luck. It was she who gave me the twenty-seven. In short, find a way to bring her here, or I will leave and take the cornucopias with me."

Momolo said that it would serve them right.

The mortified girls beg their father to go and persuade her to come, but he replies that they must go themselves, and in the end they decide to go with Costa; two would be enough. Mariuccia lived next door.

A half hour later I see them come back triumphant and Costa proud that his mediation had succeeded in reconciling the girls. At that I distributed my cornucopias.

The polenta came with the pork chops; but after them the Abate Momolo, whose acquaintance with me had brought two hundred scudi[35] into his house in one day, gave us choice dishes and excellent wines. Mariuccia's manner set me on fire. Since I could only press her hand, she could reply only by pressing mine in return; but I needed no clearer language to be certain that she loved me. Going down the stairs with her, I asked if I could not talk with her in some church; she replied that I should go the next morning at eight o'clock to Trinità dei Monti.

At seventeen or eighteen years of age, Mariuccia was tall, had a very good carriage, and seemed carved by the chisel of Praxiteles.[36] She was fair, but her fairness was not that of a blonde, which with its unrelieved brilliance almost suggests that she has no blood in her veins. Mariuccia's fairness was so alive that it offered the eyes a rosy bloom which no painter could ever have caught. Her black eyes, very large and prominent, and always in motion, had a dew on their surface which seemed a coating of the finest enamel. This imperceptible dew, which the air very easily dissipated, was continually restored by the rapid blinking of her lids. Her hair was gathered into four heavy braids, which joined at her neck to form a beautiful boss, yet not so tightly as to restrain a quantity of little curls which everywhere escaped from it, more especially to ornament her high and broad forehead with a random pattern as artless as it was unstudied. Living roses animated her cheeks, and sweet laughter dwelt on her beautiful mouth and her fiery lips, which, neither quite meeting nor quite parted, showed only the extremities of two perfectly even rows of teeth. Her hands, on which neither muscles nor veins were visible, appeared long in proportion to their breadth. This Roman beauty had not yet been seen by a connoisseur; it was to me that chance presented her in a blind alley where she lived in the darkness of poverty.

I did not fail to be at the church she had named at eight o'clock the next morning. As soon as she was sure I had seen her she went out, and I followed her. She stopped at a great ruined building and sat down on the highest steps of a long stairway, saying that no one would think of climbing it and so I could talk to her freely.

"Charming Mariuccia," I said, sitting down beside her, "you have made me fall madly in love with you; tell me what I can do for you; for, hoping to be granted your favors, my chief thought must be to deserve them."

"Make me happy, and I shall not find it hard to surrender to your love in return for your bounty, for I love you too."

"Then what can I do to make you happy?"

"Free me from the poverty which overwhelms me and from the constraint to which I am subjected by living with my mother, who means well but who, being devout to the point of superstition, damns my soul by dint of trying to assure my salvation. She even criticizes my cleanliness because it might make me pleasing to men. If you had given me as charity the money you enabled me to win in the lottery, she would have made me refuse it because you might have given it to me with evil intentions. She lets me go to mass alone only because our confessor assured her that she might let me do so; but I should never dare to stay out a minute longer, except on feast days, when I may stay at church two or three hours performing my devotions. So we can see each other nowhere but here. But this is what is needed if you want to make me happy and have the means to do it: a young, handsome, well-behaved young man, an excellent wigmaker, saw me at the scopatore's two weeks ago; the next day he waited for me at the church door and gave me a letter. In it he declares his love, and he says that if I can bring him a dowry of four hundred scudi he will marry me, setting up shop as a wigmaker and buying the necessary household furnishings. I replied that I was poor and that I had only a hundred scudi, in the form of charity vouchers, which were in the hands of my confessor. By now I have a hundred more, for if I married my mother would give me the fifty of her winnings.[37] Hence you can ensure my happiness by obtaining another two hundred scudi in charity vouchers and taking them to my confessor, who is a saintly old man who loves me and would never tell anyone that he had them from you."

"I do not need to go looking for charity vouchers; I will take your confessor two hundred scudi today, and you shall see to the rest. Give me his name. I will tell you the outcome tomorrow morning, but not here, for the cold and the wind are killing me. Leave it to me to find a room where we shall be safe and at our ease and where no one can ever guess that we have spent an hour. You shall see me at the church, and you shall follow me."

Mariuccia gave me the old Minimite's name and promised to follow me the next morning. With gratitude depicted on her features, she received all the tokens of affection which she could receive and I give in the tormenting place where we were, but they amounted to so little that I left her on the stroke of nine o'clock much more in love with her than before and very impatient to have her in my arms the next day in a room which I must set about procuring. It was the first thing I did.

I leave the ruined palazzo, and, instead of going down toward the Piazza di Spagna, I retrace my steps and enter a narrow, dirty street in which there are a few humble houses. I see a woman coming out of one of them to ask me if I am looking for somebody.

"I am looking," I reply, "for a room to rent."

"There is none here, but you will find any number on the Piazza."

"That I know; but I want it here, not to save expense but to be sure I can spend an hour in the morning in it with someone in whom I am interested. I will pay whatever price is asked."

"I understand, and I would oblige you myself if I had two rooms; but my neighbor has one on the ground floor, and I can go and speak to her if you will wait a moment. You may go in."

I enter a hovel, where I see poverty and two little boys writing out their lessons. Five or six minutes later the woman comes back and tells me to accompany her; I go, leaving ten or twelve paoli[38] on the table, from which she takes them, kissing my hand. She shows me into the next house, where I find an empty room on the ground floor, and another woman who says she will let me have the room cheap if I will pay her three months in advance, that is, three Roman scudi, and will agree to supply all the furniture I may need.

"I will pay you the three scudi on the spot; but I cannot undertake to supply the furniture. See to it yourself, and let me have the room all furnished at three o'clock today. I will pay you twelve scudi."

"Twelve scudi? What furniture do you want?"

"A bed, a small table, four chairs, and a burning brazier of charcoal, for it is deathly cold here. I will come only occasionally, early in the morning, and I will always leave before noon."

"In that case, come at three o'clock and you will find my bed and everything else you have asked for."

I give her the three scudi, I promise to come back at three o'clock and I leave. So that is done.

I go at once to Trinità dei Monti, I ask for the father confessor, and I am shown to his room. I see a French monk who appears to be sixty years of age and whose fine, handsome countenance inspires confidence.

"Reverend Father, at the house of the Abate Momolo, scopatore santissimo, I saw a girl named Maria, whose father, XX, lives at Tivoli, and her mother with the girl herself. I fell in love with her, and I found an opportunity to tell her so and to offer her money to seduce her; she replied that instead of making her criminal offers I ought to use my influence to obtain her some charity vouchers which would enable her to marry a suitor who had presented himself and who would make her happy. Her reprimand touched me, but it did not cure me of my criminal passion. I talked to her a second time, and I told her that I wanted to give her two hundred scudi for nothing and that I would take them to her mother. She replied that I would cause her ruin, for she would believe that the money was payment for a crime and would refuse to accept it. She said it was to you, her confessor, that I should take it, and at the same time speak to you on her behalf so that the marriage she has in view can take place. So here is the money, which I bring you, wishing to have nothing further to do with the matter. I shall leave day after tomorrow for Naples, and I hope that on my return I shall find her married."

He took the hundred zecchini[39] and gave me a receipt; then he said that, by showing an interest in Mariuccia, I became the protector of an innocent dove, that she had been confessing to him for five years, and that he often ordered her to go to communion without hearing her confession because he knew her well enough to be certain that she was incapable of committing a mortal sin. He added that her mother was a saint, he promised me that he would see the marriage concluded after he had inquired into the character of the young man to whom she wished to give herself, and he assured me that no one should ever know from whom she had received this assistance.

After having thus arranged the whole matter to my satisfaction, I went to dine with Mengs and was easily persuaded to go to the opera at the Teatro Aliberti[40] with his whole family. But I did not fail to go first to the little room I had rented, to see if it was furnished. I found everything in it which I had ordered, I paid twelve scudi, and received the key to the room from the mistress of the house. She assured me that I would find it heated every day at seven o'clock in the morning.

My impatience to see the next day arrive made me find the whole opera bad and kept me awake the whole night.

The next morning even before the appointed hour I go to Trinità dei Monti; Mariuccia arrives a quarter of an hour later, I see her, I leave, she follows me at a distance, and I enter the house and open the door of my room, which I find heated. A moment later I see Mariuccia, apprehensive and uncertain, I lock the door, and, clasping her in my arms, I restore all her courage. I tell her about my visit to her confessor, and I end by showing her the receipt he had made out for the two hundred scudi and by assuring her that he would himself take steps to arrange her marriage. I urge her to make me happy, telling her that the time is passing quickly, she replies that we have almost three hours before us, for she has told her mother that she would perform her devotions to thank God for the hundred scudi they had won[41] in the lottery.

Full of my happiness and reveling beforehand in the pleasures in which I was to immerse my senses, I clasp Mariuccia in my arms, I cover her face with fiery kisses, and, undressing her little by little, I lay all her charms bare before me, and my soul rejoices to meet not the slightest resistance. Mariuccia does not anticipate my desires, but, pliable by nature, she abandons herself to my appetite, never daring to take her eyes from mine for fear that they will stray to some place which will give them too easy a triumph over the expiring remnants of her modesty.

But now she is in the bed, motionless and ready to succumb. It is the moment when, whether more or less fortunate than she in having no shame to conquer, I must make haste. The sacrifice was perfect, and I had no cause to doubt the purity of my victim. Other symptoms, far dearer to a soul in love, made mine certain that Mariuccia had never loved until that moment. But she did more. Pleasure makes pain precious. She assured me she had felt none, and at the second assault I saw her completely possessed by Venus.

The clock of Trinità dei Monti pealed the imperious strokes of ten o'clock into our ears. We quickly dressed. Having arranged to leave for Naples the next morning, I assured Mariuccia that only the hope of clasping her in my arms again before her wedding day would make me hasten my return to Rome. I promised to take her confessor another hundred scudi that day, which would make it possible for her to use the hundred she had won[42] in the lottery on clothes. I told her that I would spend the evening at the Abate Momolo's and should be delighted to see her there; but that we must behave in a manner calculated to dissipate whatever suspicions of an understanding between us might have arisen.

As she departed, she assured me that she knew she had surrendered to love far more than to interest. Leaving last, I informed the mistress of the house that I would not reappear there for ten or twelve days; and I went at once to the Minimite monastery to give my angel's kindly confessor the hundred scudi I had promised her.

When I told the old monk that I was giving them to him so that Mariuccia could use the hundred she had won in the lottery for buying dresses and making shifts, he assured me that he would himself go to her house immediately after dinner both to persuade her mother to consent to it and to speak privately with her daughter in order to obtain the address of the youth who wanted to marry her. When I returned from Naples I learned that he had punctually fulfilled his undertaking.

At two o'clock in the afternoon a cameriere of His Holiness sent in word that he had come to see the Cavaliere Mengs. We were all at table. He at once asked him if I was staying in his house, and Mengs introduced me. He immediately delivered to me, on his Most Holy Master's behalf, the cross of the Order of the Golden Spur,[43] together with a diploma sealed with the Papal seal and declaring me, as a Doctor of Civil and Canon Law, an Apostolic Prothonotary extra urbem.[44] Expressing my gratitude for this high honor, I assured the personage that I would go the next day to thank my new sovereign and ask his blessing. Mengs, as my confrère, immediately embraced me; but I had been granted the privilege of expending nothing. The Cavaliere Mengs had had to pay twenty-five scudi to have his diploma drawn up. They say at Rome that sine effusione sanguinis non fit remissio ("without shedding of blood is no remission").[45] Everything costs money, and with money one can obtain everything, in the Holy City.

I immediately hung the cross around my neck on a broad poppy-red ribbon.[46] This is the color of the order of the gilded soldiers of San Giovanni Laterano,[47] "companions of the palace," in Latin comites palatini, which, translated once again, gives "counts palatine." Poor Cahusac,[48] author of the opera Zoroastre, went mad in Paris about this time when the Papal Nuncio made him a count palatine in the same way. As for me, I did not go mad, but I was so delighted with the decoration that I at once asked Winckelmann if I could have my cross set with diamonds and rubies; he said I was at liberty to do so, and that he knew where I could buy one already set, which I could have for a thousand scudi and which had cost more. I bought it the next morning as soon as I saw it, to make a show with it in Naples. I never dared to wear it in Rome. When I appeared before the Holy Father to thank him I put the cross in my buttonhole in due observance of modesty. I gave up wearing the cross five years later in Warsaw when the Palatine of Russia, Prince Czartoryski,[49] asked me what I was doing with it.

"It's a drug on the market," he said, "only charlatans wear it any more."

But it is the present which the Popes give to Ambassadors, even though they know that these give it to their valets; it is very easy to pretend not to know something and to go quietly on in the same old way.

That evening Momolo gave a supper for me to celebrate my installation; but I made it up to him by opening a bank at faro. I was dexterous enough to lose forty scudi, sharing them out equally among the whole family and showing no partiality to Mariuccia. She found an opportunity to tell me that her confessor had come to her house, that she had given him all the necessary information concerning the young wigmaker, and that he had persuaded her mother to spend the hundred scudi on clothes for her.

Having observed that the Abate Momolo's second daughter was in love with Costa, I told her that I would be off to Naples the next morning but that I was leaving him for her, hoping on my return to find a marriage contract between them, that it would meet with my approval, and that I would even be glad to defray the expense of the wedding. The fact is that Costa did not marry the girl at that time, for fear I was marrying her off to him in order to have the use of her. He was a consummate fool. He proceeded to marry her the next year, after robbing me. We will speak of him again when the time comes.

The next morning, after breakfasting well and fondly embracing my brother, I set off in my fine carriage with the Abate Alfani, preceded by Leduc on horseback. I reached Naples at a time when the whole city was in a state of alarm because the fatal volcano was threatening to erupt.[50] At the last post station the post master showed me the will left by his father, who had died after the eruption of 1754: he said that the eruption by which God intended utterly to destroy the sinful city of Naples would take place in the winter of 1761; hence he advised me to go back to Rome. Alfani declared there was no doubt about it, we must obey the voice of God. The event was foretold, hence it would infallibly happen. Thus it is that certain people reason.

CHAPTER X

My short but enjoyable stay in Naples. The Duke of Matalona, my daughter, Donna Lucrezia. My departure.

IT IS impossible either to express or to conceive how greatly my soul rejoiced when I found myself once more in Naples, where eighteen years earlier I had made my fortune on my return from Martorano.[1] I had gone there only to pay the Duke of Matalona the visit which I had promised him when he was in Paris; but before waiting on that nobleman I wanted to inquire after all my old friends.

So I went out early on foot, first to make myself known to the banker who was Belloni's correspondent. After accepting my letter of credit he gave me the number of bank notes I asked for, assuring me that no one should know anything of our dealings.

Leaving his place of business, I went to the house in which Don Antonio Casanova[2] had lived. I was told that he was living on an estate he had bought near Salerno, and of which he bore the name with the title of Marchese. I go and inquire after Palo;[3] he had died and his son was living at Santa Lucia with a wife and children. I intended to go to see him, but I never found the time for it. I next ask where the advocate Castelli[4] is living; he was the husband of my dear Donna Lucrezia, with whom I had been so much in love at Rome; I could scarcely wait to see her, and I was in ecstasy at the thought of the pleasure we should feel when we met again. I am told that he has long been dead and that his widow lives twenty miles from Naples. I promise myself that I will visit her. I knew that Don Lelio Caraffa[5] was still alive and resided in the Palazzo Matalona.[6]

So I go to dine, then I dress and take a hackney carriage to the Palazzo Matalona. The Duke was still at table; but no matter, I am announced; he comes out to see who it is, he recognizes me, he gives a cry, he embraces me, he at once does me the honor to address me in the second person singular, he introduces me to his wife, who was a daughter of the Duke of Bovino,[7] and to all the very numerous company. I tell him that I have come to Naples only to pay him the visit I had promised him in Paris.

"Then it is only right that I should put you up; let someone go at once to the inn at which Casanova s'est débarqué ['disembarked'] and bring all his luggage here and, if he has a carriage, put it in my stable."

I accept.

A fine-looking man who was at the table no sooner heard the name Casanova than he said to me gaily:

"If you bear my name, you must be a bastard of my father's."

"Not of your father's," I replied, "but of your mother's."

My riposte is applauded, the man comes and embraces me, and the misunderstanding is explained. Instead of hearing "Casanova," he had heard "Casalnuovo," [8] and the gentleman was none other than the Duke of that fief.

"You know," the Duke of Matalona said to me, "that I have a son."[9]

"I was told so, and I found it hard to believe; but now I am no longer surprised. I see a princess who could not fail to perform the miracle."

The Duchess blushes, without vouchsafing me a look, but the company clap their hands, for it was well known that before his marriage the Duke of Matalona was supposed to be impotent. His son is summoned, I say that he looks like him; a cheerful monk who was seated beside the Duchess says he does not, and she coldly gives him a slap in the face, which he receives with a laugh.

In less than half an hour my banter endeared me to the entire company with the marked exception of the Duchess, who maintained a deliberate haughtiness which took the ground from under my feet. She was beautiful, but lofty as the clouds, deaf and mute in season and out of season, and always in control of her eyes. I labored for two days to persuade her to converse with me, and finally, despairing of success, I left her to her pride.

The Duke showed me to my apartment and, seeing my Spaniard, asked me where my secretary was, and when I said he was the Abate Alfani, who had assumed the office so that he could stay in Naples incognito, he replied that he had been well advised to do so, for he had cheated a great many people with his pretended antiquities.[10]

He took me to see his fine stable, where there were superb horses, then his picture gallery, then his library, and finally his private apartment and his choice books, which were all forbidden. After that he made me swear not to breathe a word of what he was going to read me. It was a scathing satire[11] on the whole court, of which I understood nothing. I never kept a secret more faithfully.

"You shall come with me," he said, "to the Teatro San Carlo,[12] where I will introduce you to the most beautiful ladies in Naples, and to which you may go whenever you wish; when you want to be completely free you shall go to my box on the third tier, which is always open to my friends. In that way the opera will cost you nothing. I will also introduce you at my mistress's box, to which you may go when you please."

"What, my dear Duke! You have a mistress?"

"Yes, for form's sake, for I love only my wife; nevertheless people believe I am in love with her and am even jealous because I never introduce anyone to her and do not allow her to receive visitors."

"And the Duchess, young and charming as she is—does not object to your having a mistress?"

"My wife cannot be jealous of her, because she knows that I am impotent with all the women on earth except with her."

"I take it you are not joking, but I find it hard to believe. Can a man have a mistress he does not love?"

"But I do love her, for she is divinely intelligent and she amuses me; but she does not interest me physically."

"That is possible; I suppose she is ugly."

"Ugly? You will see her this evening. She is pretty and only seventeen years old, she speaks French, her mind is unprejudiced, and she is well-bred."

At the hour for the opera he takes me to the great theater, he introduces me to several ladies, all of them ugly. In the great middle box I saw the very young King,[13] surrounded by many members of the nobility dressed richly but without taste. The whole parterre and all the boxes were full, the latter all covered with mirrors and illuminated inside and out because of an anniversary.[14] The effect was most striking.

He takes me to his private box on the third tier and introduces me to his friends; they were the most brilliant minds in Naples. I laughed to myself at those who do not believe that the intelligence of a nation is far more dependent on its climate than on education.[15] Such critics should be sent to Naples. What intelligence! Boerhaave,[16] the great Boerhaave, if he had been in Naples, would have known the nature of sulphur far better from its effects on plants, and even more clearly from its effects on animals. Nowhere but in that country is water the only remedy needed to cure any number of diseases which, in our country, would be deadly without the art of pharmacy.

The Duke, who had vanished, returns and takes me to the box in which his mistress was seated in company with a respectable-looking woman. As he enters he says:

"Leonilda mia, ti presento il cavalier Don Giacomo Casanova veneziano amico mio" ("My Leonilda, I beg to introduce my friend the Chevalier Don Giacomo Casanova, of Venice").

She receives me affably and modestly, and she renounces the pleasure of listening to the music for that of talking with me. When a girl is pretty it takes but a moment to find her so; if her charms must be examined to elicit a favorable judgment they become dubious. Donna Leonilda was striking. I smiled, glancing at the Duke, who had told me that he loved her as a father loves his daughter and that he kept her only for fashion's sake; he understands me, and he says I must believe what he had told me. I reply that it is incredible, and with a sly smile she says that anything that is possible is credible.

"I admit that," I said, "but one is free to believe or not believe when a thing seems unlikely."

"Exactly; but I think believing is quicker and easier. You arrived in Naples yesterday, it is incredible, yet it is true."

"What is incredible about it?"

"Can anyone believe that a stranger would come to Naples at a time when everyone there is in terror?"

"And indeed I felt afraid until this moment, but now I have no fear at all. If you are in Naples St. Januarius[17] cannot but protect it. You laugh?"

"I am laughing at an amusing idea. If I had a suitor with a face like St. Januarius's he would reap no favors."

"Is the saint so very ugly?"

"You can decide that for yourself when you see his statue."

The bantering tone which she had taken was one which was but a step from friendship and frankness. The charms of the mind are superior to the spell of beauty. I bring up the subject of love, and she discourses on it in masterly fashion.

"If love," she says, "is not followed by possession of the loved object it can only be a torment, and if possession is forbidden one must not allow oneself to love."

"I agree, and the more so because even the enjoyment of a beautiful object is not a true pleasure if it has not been preceded by love."

"And if love has preceded it, it accompanies it—of that there is no doubt. But one may doubt if love follows it."

"That is true, for possession is often the death of love."

"And if it is not dead in both the persons who love each other, that is murder, for the one of them in whom love survives is left unhappy."

"That is indubitable, Madame,[18] and from this argument, based on the most irrefutable dialectic, I must infer that you condemn the senses to perpetual starvation. That is cruel."

"God preserve me from such Platonism. I condemn love without enjoyment as severely as I do enjoyment without love. I leave you to draw the inference."

"Love and enjoy, enjoy and love, turn and turn about."

"Exactly."

My conclusion set her laughing, and the Duke kissed her hand. The duenna, who did not understand a word of French, listened to the opera; but I!

I was beside myself. These things were being said by a seventeen-year-old girl as pretty as a Cupid. The Duke now recited a ribald epigram by La Fontaine on enjoyment and desires, which is found only in the first edition[19] and of which the first four lines are as follows:

> La jouissance et les désirs
> Sont ce que l'homme a de plus rare,
> Mais ce ne sont pas vrais plaisirs
> Dès le moment qu'on les sépare.
>
> ("Enjoyment and desires are man's rarest possessions, but they cease to be true pleasures as soon as they are separated.")

I said that I had translated the epigram, with the six following lines, into Italian and Latin, and that in Italian it had taken me twenty lines to say what La Fontaine said in ten, whereas I said it all in six in my Latin translation. Donna Leonilda said she was sorry she did not know Latin.

In polite Neapolitan society the first token of friendship which a gentleman or a lady bestows on a new acquaintance is to use the second person singular in addressing him. Both parties are then more at their ease; but this mode of address entails no diminution in the respect which they owe each other.

Donna Leonilda filled me with admiration; if one does not recover from it, it becomes adoration, then irresistible love. The opera, which lasted five hours, came to its end without my realizing how long it was.

After the young prodigy left with her duenna the Duke told me that we must part unless I liked gambling.

"I am not averse to it with the right sort of players."

"Excellent. Then come with me. You will be with ten or twelve men of my stamp at a faro bank, then a cold supper; but it is a secret, for gambling is forbidden. I will vouch for you."

He takes me to the Duke of Monteleone's[20] and up to the fourth floor, where, after passing through ten or twelve rooms, I find myself in one in which a mild-looking banker was dealing; before him were silver and gold coins to the value of three or four hundred zecchini. The Duke makes me sit down beside him, introducing me as his friend. I go to take out my purse, but I am told that play there is on one's word and that one pays at the end of twenty-four hours. The banker gives me a livret[21] and a basket in which, between singles and doubles, there are a thousand counters. I say that each counter will be worth a Neapolitan ducat; that completes the ceremonies. In less than two hours I lose my whole basket, and I stop. Then I sup very gaily. The supper consisted of an enormous dish of macaroni and ten or twelve dishes of various sorts of shellfish. On the way home I never gave the Duke time to indulge in those condolences on one's losses which are always irksome. I kept him delightfully occupied with talk of Donna Leonilda.

Early the next morning the Duke sent me word that if I wanted to go to kiss the King's hand with him I must dress for the occasion. I put on a coat of rose-colored short-napped velvet embroidered with gold spangles, and I kissed the King's hand, which was swollen with chilblains.[22] He was nine years old. The Prince of San Nicandro[23] brought him up as far as in him lay, but he became an accomplished monarch, affable, tolerant, just, and generous, although too unceremonious, which, in a king, is a serious fault.

I had the honor of dining at the right of the Duchess, who, after looking at my coat, felt obliged to say that she had seldom seen a finer.

"By such means, Signora, do I attempt to preserve my person from too thorough a scrutiny."

She smiled. When we rose table the Duke took me downstairs with him to the apartment of his uncle Don Lelio, who remembered me well. I kissed the venerable old man's hand, asking him to forgive my youthful escapades. He told his nephew that eighteen years earlier he had chosen me to be the companion of his studies,[24] and he was very glad to hear me give a brief account of all my vicissitudes in Rome when I was in the service of Cardinal Acquaviva.[25]

After an hour of conversation he asked me to come to see him often.

Toward evening the Duke told me that if I wanted to go to the opera buffa at the Fiorentini[26] it would please his mistress if I went to see her in her box, and he gave me the number of it; he said that he would come for me toward the end of the performance and that we would sup together as we had done on the previous evening. I did not need to order horses harnessed. There was always a coupé in the courtyard awaiting my orders.

At the Teatro dei Fiorentini I found the opera already begun. I enter the box in which Donna Leonilda was sitting, and she receives me with these honeyed words:

"Caro Don Giacomo, it is a great pleasure to see you again."

She saw fit not to address me in the second person singular. The girl's alluring features struck me as being not unfamiliar, but I could not remember what young woman it was of whom she reminded me. Leonilda was a beauty; her hair was light chestnut, a color which is above suspicion, and her beautiful black eyes at once listened and questioned. But what enchanted me, and what I found entirely new, was that when she told a story she spoke with her hands, her elbows, her shoulders, and often with her chin. Her tongue did not suffice her to express all that she wanted to convey.

The conversation turning to La Fontaine's epigram, which I had not wanted to recite to her entire because it was licentious, she said that it could only provoke a smile.

"I have a room," she said, "which the Duke has had hung for me with Chinese designs representing a quantity of the postures in which the people of that country make love. We go there sometimes, and I assure you[27] they do not arouse the slightest sensation in me."

"That may be due to a defect in temperament, for when I see things of that sort well drawn they set me on fire; and I am amazed that when you look at them with the Duke you do not feel tempted to put some of them into practice."

"We feel only friendship for each other."

"That is not easy to believe."

"I could swear that he is a man; but I could not swear that he is capable of giving a woman any substantial proof of love."

"He has a son."

"True. And, according to him, he can love only his wife."

"That is nonsense, for you are a woman to inspire desires, and a man who could be familiarly in your company without his senses responding to it ought to kill himself."

"I am delighted, caro Don Giacomo, to learn that you love me, but since you are staying in Naples only a few days you will easily forget me."

"A curse on gaming, for we could spend charming evenings together."

"The Duke told me that you lost a thousand ducati without flinching last night. I take it that you are unlucky."

"Not always, but when I play on the same day on which I have fallen in love I am sure to lose."

"You will win this evening."

"Today I made my declaration; I shall lose again."

"Then don't play."

"They would say I'm afraid of losing or that I have no money."

"Then I hope you will win, and that you will come and tell me so at my house tomorrow morning. You can come with the Duke."

He arrives, and he asks me if I have enjoyed the opera. It is she who answers that we can tell him nothing about the opera because we had spent the whole time talking of love. She asks him to bring me to her house the next morning so that I can tell her I have won. The Duke replies that it is his turn, that he will be the dealer, but that he will bring me to breakfast with her whether I win or lose.

We left, and we went to the same place, where all the players were waiting for my Duke. It was a company of twelve, each of whom provided the bank in turn. They insisted that this made their chances equal. The idea made me laugh. Nothing is more difficult than to establish equality among players.

The Duke of Matalona takes his place, draws out his purse, and puts two thousand ducati in gold, silver, and bank notes on the table, asking the company to excuse him if he is doubling the amount of the bank in compliment to the stranger.

"Then I, too," I said, "will risk two thousand ducati, and no more, for at Venice people say that the prudent player must never lose more than he can win. So each of my counters will be worth two ducati."

So saying, I take from my pocket ten bank notes of a hundred ducati each and give them to the banker who had won them from me the evening before. War is declared, and in less than three hours, staking only on one card and with the utmost prudence, I lose my entire basket. That ended it. I had some twenty-five thousand ducati; but I had declared that I would not lose more, I was ashamed to go back on my word. I have all my life been dismayed by losing, but I have always had the strength of mind to conceal it; my natural gaiety was doubled precisely because it was forced by art. This has always gained me the good will of the company and opened resources to me. My appetite for supper was none the worse, and my ebullience made me think of so many laughable things to say that I succeeded in entirely dissipating the low spirits of the Duke of Matalona, who was in despair at having won so large a sum from a stranger who was his guest and whom people might think he had entertained only in order to win his money. He was the perfection of courtesy, lavish, rich, generous, and a man of honor.

On the way back to his palazzo he could not bring himself to say that he was not in need of money, that he would give me all the time I wanted to pay him; he rightly feared to wound my feelings; but before he went to bed he could not refrain from writing me a short note in which he said that if I needed credit at his banker's he would stand surety for me for whatever amount I might require. I replied that I was duly sensible of his courtesy and that if I should be in need of money I would accept his generous offer.

The next morning I went to his room early to embrace him and remind him that we were to breakfast with his beautiful mistress. He put on morning dress, as I had done, and we walked to the Fontana Medina[28] and the pretty house near it in which the angel lived.

She was still in bed, not naked but sitting up, modestly charming, beautiful as the day, wearing a dimity corset laced with wide rose-colored ribbons. She was reading Le Sopha, by the elegant Crébillon the Younger.[29] The Duke sat down on the foot of her bed, while I could only stand in a sort of daze, looking at her enchanting face, which I seemed once to have known and even to have loved. It was the first time that I saw her well. Laughing to see me so distracted, she told me to sit down in a small armchair at her bedside.

The Duke said that I was very glad to have lost two thousand ducati to him, for my loss made me sure that she loved me.

"Caro il mio Don Giacomo, I am sorry I told you that you would win, you would have done better not to play: I should love you just as much, and you would be richer by two thousand ducati."

"And I two thousand ducati the poorer," said the Duke with a smile.

"But I shall win this evening, charming Leonilda," I said, "if you will grant me some favor today. Otherwise I shall lose my soul and die in a very few days here at Naples."

"In that case, dear Leonilda," said the Duke, "you must grant him some small token."

"That I cannot."

The Duke told her she might dress and come to breakfast in the Chinese room, and she began to obey him at once, being neither too generous in what she let us see nor too miserly in what she managed to hide from us—a procedure which is sure to set any man on fire who has already been captivated by a woman's pretty face and intelligence and manners. Nevertheless I saw her beautiful bosom; it was a theft, but one which I could never have committed if she had not permitted it. On my side, I pretended I had seen nothing.

During the moments of distraction which a woman permits herself when she is dressing, she maintained with much ingenuity that a sensible girl should be more chary of her favors with a man whom she loves than with one whom she does not love, for the simple reason that she must always be afraid of losing the former while she has no interest in keeping the latter.

I said that in time she would find the contrary to be true in my case; and she replied that I was wrong.

The Chinese designs which covered the room in which we breakfasted were admirable rather for their coloring and their drawing than for the amorous acts they represented.

"On me," says the Duke, "they have no effect whatever"; and, so saying, he shows us his nullity. Leonilda does not look, but I was shocked; however, I concealed it.

"I am," I said, "in the same case, but I do not care to convince you of it."

The Duke says he does not believe it, he puts out a hand, and he finds that I am not lying; he shows his astonishment, and, withdrawing his hand, says that I must be as impotent as he is. I deny his conclusion and I say that to convince him of the contrary I had only to look into Leonilda's eyes, he asks her to look at me, she turns and fixes her eyes on mine, the Duke puts out his hand to the place of proof once more, and he finds he is wrong. He makes to uncover me, but I oppose him; he persists, he laughs, and I let him go on; in a sweet access of ardor I seize Leonilda's hand and, never taking my eyes from hers, I press it to my lips, and the Duke withdraws his wet hand, exclaiming, laughing, and getting up to fetch a towel. Leonilda has seen nothing, but she succumbs to uncontrollable laughter, as do I and the Duke. It was one of those delicious little games which so effectually stimulate Love, who, ever a child, revels in the play and laughter whose nectar makes him immortal. In playing it all three of us transgressed certain limits, though we managed to remain within certain others. We ended it with embraces, and Leonilda's lips pressed to mine sent me away with the Duke, plunged in the intoxication of the love which fetters the mind.

On the way I told the Duke that I would not see his mistress again unless he would relinquish her to me, declaring that I was prepared to marry her and give her a dowry of five thousand ducati.

"Speak to her, I will raise no objection. You shall learn from herself what property she has."

I went to dress, and when the bell rang went down to dinner. The Duchess was surrounded by a large company. She had the goodness to say she was sorry I had had bad luck.

"Fortune, Signora, is changeable; but your kind concern is bound to bring me luck. I shall win this evening."

"I doubt it, your opponent this evening will be Monteleone, who is very lucky."

Reflecting on the state of my gambling ventures after dinner, I decided to play for cash, first so that, in case I was overwhelmed, I should not endanger my honor by losing more on my word than I could pay, secondly in order to relieve the banker of any fear that I would be short when I was cleaned out for the third time, and thirdly in the hope that the change of system would also change my luck.

I spent four hours at the San Carlo in Leonilda's box, finding her more elaborately dressed and more brilliant than she had been on the previous days. I told her that the love she had inspired in me was of a kind which could tolerate neither rivals nor delay nor the slightest possibility of future inconstancy.

"I have told the Duke that I am prepared to marry you, giving you a dowry of five thousand ducati."

"What was his answer?"

"That I should make the proposal to yourself, and that he will raise no objection."

"And we will leave together."

"At once. After that only death can separate us."

"We will talk tomorrow morning. You will make me happy."

The Duke arrives, she tells him that there is no more question of anything between us but marriage.

"Marriage," he replied, "is the one thing in the world which must be considered the most before it is undertaken."

"But not too much, for as long as one is considering it one does not marry; in any case we have no time for that, since Don Giacomo has to leave."

"If it is to be a marriage," he said to me, "you can put off your departure, or return after becoming formally engaged to my dear Leonilda."

"No putting it off, my dear Duke, and no returning. We have made up our minds, and if we are mistaken we shall have all the time we need to repent."

The Duke laughs, he says we will discuss it the next day, and we go to our circle, where we find the Duke of Monteleone dealing with a well-stocked bank before him.

"I have bad luck," I said to him, "when I play on my word, so I hope you will permit me to play for cash."

"As you please—it makes no difference. I have made you a bank of four thousand ducati, so that you can recoup your losses."

"And I promise to break it or to lose four thousand."

So saying, I draw from my pocket six thousand ducati, in paper as always, I give two thousand to the Duke of Matalona, and I begin playing for a hundred ducati. After a very long session I broke the bank; and, the Duke of Matalona having left, I returned to his palazzo alone. When I told him the good news the next morning he embraced me and advised me always to play for cash. A great supper which the Princess della Valle[30] was giving would keep our circle of players from meeting that day. So we went to say good morning to Donna Leonilda, putting off discussing our marriage until the morrow, and we spent the rest of the day looking at the wonders of nature in the environs of Naples. At the great supper I saw the highest nobility of Naples, and great lavishness.

The next morning the Duke told me that I could go alone to his mistress's, where, having business, he would come later, and I went; but he did not come. For this reason we could settle nothing in the matter of our marriage. I spent two hours alone with her; but, as I felt I must be ruled by her inclinations, she found me amorous only in words. When I left her I again swore that it rested entirely with her to leave Naples with me, bound by marriage to my destiny until death.

The Duke asked me, with a smile, if, after spending the whole morning alone with his mistress, I still wanted to marry her.

"More than ever. What have you in mind?"

"Nothing. And since that is how things stand we will talk tomorrow."

That evening at Monteleone's I found a personable-looking banker with much gold before him; the Duke told me he was Don Marco Ottoboni.[31] He was holding the cards in his left hand, and he drew the card very well with his right, but he held the pack so tightly in his hand that I could not see it.

I decide to play for a ducato. With persistent bad luck, I lost only eighteen or twenty ducati after five or six deals. The banker politely asks me why I am staking such small sums against him.

"Because," I reply, "when I do not see at least half the pack I am afraid I shall lose."

The next night I broke the bank of the very amiable and very rich Prince del Cassaro,[32] who asked me to give him his revenge, inviting me to supper at a pretty house he had at Posilipo,[33] where he lived with a virtuosa[34] with whom he had fallen in love at Palermo. He also invited the Duke of Matalona and three or four others. This was the only occasion on which I dealt at Naples. I made him a bank of six thousand ducati, after telling him that, as I was on the eve of my departure, I would play only for cash. He lost ten thousand ducati and stopped only because he had no more money. Everyone made off, and I would have stopped too if the Prince's mistress, who was playing on her word after losing thirty or forty once,[35] had not been in arrears another hundred. I continued to deal, hoping that she would recoup; but I finally put down the cards at two o'clock in the morning, saying that she should pay me in Rome.

Since I was determined not to leave Naples without having seen Caserta,[36] and since Donna Leonilda was of the same mind, the Duke sent us there in a very comfortable carriage drawn by six mules, whose trot was faster than a horse's gallop. During the journey I first heard the voice of her duenna.

It was on the day after our journey to Caserta that we settled the particulars of our marriage in a conversation which lasted two hours.

"Leonilda there," said the Duke, "has her mother living on an estate not far from the city with an income of six hundred ducati a year which I settled on her for life when I bought a piece of property which her husband left her; but Leonilda is not dependent on her. She relinquished her to me seven years ago, and I at once gave her a life annuity of five hundred ducati, which she will bring you as her dowry together with all her diamonds and a fine wardrobe. Her mother has confided her entirely to my love and to my word of honor that I would arrange an advantageous marriage for her. I had her educated, and when I became aware of her cast of mind I cultivated it, freeing her from all prejudices except the one which makes it a girl's duty to keep herself for him whom Heaven has destined to be her husband; and you can be certain that you will be the first man whom my dear Leonilda will clasp to her bosom."

I told him to have the deed for her dowry drawn up and to add to it five thousand ducati del regno, which I would pay over to him when the marriage contract was signed; he said that he would guarantee them himself by a mortgage on a country house which was worth twice as much, and, turning to Leonilda, who was weeping for joy, he said that he would send for her mother, who would be delighted to sign her marriage agreement.

Her mother was living at Sant'Agata in the household of the Marchese Galiani.[37] It was a day's journey from Naples. He said that he would send his carriage for her the next day, that the day after that we would sup together, and on the following day we would settle everything with the notary and would go at once to the little church in Portici, where a priest would marry us, he undertaking to secure a dispensation from publishing the banns. On the day after the wedding her mother would return to Sant'Agata with us, we would dine with her there, and we would continue our journey with her blessing.

At this conclusion to his discourse, I shuddered, then I laughed; but Leonilda, for all her intelligence, fell fainting into the arms of the Duke, who revived her, calling her his "dear daughter" and kissing her again and again. At the conclusion of the scene we all three dried our tears.

From that day on I did not play again. I had won fifteen thousand ducati, I considered myself a married man; it was my part to conduct myself with prudence.

The next day, at supper with Leonilda and the Duke after the opera at the San Carlo,

"What will my mother say," she asked me, "when she sees you tomorrow evening?"

"She will say that you have done a foolish thing to marry a stranger whom you have known for only a week. Have you written her my name, my country, my situation, my age?"

"I wrote her these three lines: 'Come tomorrow, my dear Mama, to sign my marriage contract with a man whom I receive from the hands of His Grace the Duke and with whom I shall leave for Rome on Monday.'"

"And here are my three lines," said the Duke: "'Come at once, my dear friend, to sign your daughter's marriage contract and give her your blessing, for she has wisely chosen a husband who could be her father.'"

"That's not true," said Leonilda, coming to my arms; "she'll think you're an old man, and I don't like it."

"Is your mother old?"

"Her mother," said the Duke to me, "is a charming and very witty woman no more than thirty-seven or thirty-eight years old."

"What is she doing in Galiani's house?"

"Being an intimate friend of the Marchesa, she lives with her family, but she pays board."

The next morning, having various small matters of business to dispose of and needing to go to my banker to give him all my bank notes and obtain his draft on Rome, only excepting the five thousand ducati I was to pay over at the signing of the contract, I told the Duke to expect me at Leonilda's about suppertime.

At eight o'clock I enter the room, in which they were standing with their backs to the fireplace, the Duke between the mother and the daughter.

"Ah! There he is!"

I look first at the mother, who, the instant I appear, gives a piercing cry and sinks onto the sofa. I stare at her, and I see Donna Lucrezia Castelli.

"Donna Lucrezia!" I say, "how happy I am!"

"Let us recover our breath, my dear friend. Sit down here. You are going to marry my daughter."

I sit down; I understand it all; my hair stands on end, and I sink into the gloomiest silence. The astonishment was Leonilda's and the Duke's; they saw that we knew each other; but beyond that they could not go. I think of that past time and of Leonilda's age, and I see that she could be my daughter; but I considered that Donna Lucrezia could not be sure of it, for she was living with her husband, who was not yet fifty and who loved her. I rise, I take a light, and asking the Duke and Leonilda to excuse me, I request the mother to go into the next room with me.

The woman I had so greatly loved in Rome has scarcely sat down beside me before she says:

"Leonilda is your daughter,[38] I am sure of it; I have never considered her anything else, my husband himself knew it, and he made no protest; he adored her. I will show you her baptismal certificate, and after seeing the date of her birth you can calculate for yourself. My husband never touched me in Rome, and my daughter was not born prematurely. Do you remember that my late mother must have read you a letter in which I wrote her that I was pregnant? That was in the January of 1744. In six months she will be seventeen. It was my dear husband himself who gave her the name Leonilda Giacomina at the baptismal font, and when he played with her he always called her Giacomina. This marriage, my dear friend, horrifies me, yet you can understand that I will not oppose it, for I should not dare tell the reason. What do you think? Have you really the courage to marry her? You hesitate. Can it be that you have consummated the marriage before contracting it?"

"No, my dear friend."

"I breathe again."

"She has none of my features."

"That is true. She looks like me. You weep, dear friend."

"Who would not weep? I am going into the other room, and I will send you the Duke. You understand that he must be told all."

I enter, and I tell him to go and speak with Donna Lucrezia. Leonilda, aghast, comes and sits on my lap and asks me what is the matter. My distress keeps me from answering, she kisses me, trembling, and she sheds tears with me. We remained there mute for half an hour, until the Duke returned with Donna Lucrezia, who, alone of the four of us, had assumed a reasonable attitude.

"But my dear daughter," she said to Leonilda, "this unpleasant mystery must be revealed to you; and it is from your mother herself that you shall learn it. Do you remember what name my late husband often called you, when, holding you in his arms, he caressed you?"

"He called me 'charming Giacomina.' "

"That is the name of this gentleman here. He is your father. Go and kiss him as a daughter, and if he has been your lover forget your crime."

It was then that the pathos of the tragedy undid us. Leonilda ran to embrace her mother's knees, and, despite the tears which choked her, said:

"I have never loved him except as a daughter."

The scene then became dumb show, except that the sound of the tears and kisses of the two admirable creatures gave it life, while the Duke and I, the supremely interested witnesses of the spectacle, were like two marble statues.

We remained at table for three hours, always sad, always talking, and passing from reflection to reflection on this more unhappy than happy recognition, and we separated at midnight unaware that we had eaten nothing.

We knew that the next day at dinner we should discuss the incident more coolly and sensibly; we were sure that nothing would stop us from taking the wisest course, and without any difficulty, for there was no other.

On the way the Duke talked aloud to himself, making countless reflections on what moral philosophy may denominate "prejudice." That the union of a father with his daughter is horrible by nature no philosopher will make bold to say; but the prejudice in this regard is so strong that one must have a thoroughly depraved mind to trample it underfoot. It is the fruit of a respect for the laws which a good education has inculcated in a noble soul; and, so defined, it is no longer prejudice, it is duty.

This duty can also be considered natural in that nature inspires us to grant to those we love the same goods which we desire for ourselves. It would seem that what is most conducive to reciprocity in love is equality in everything, in age, in situation, in character; and at first sight one does not find this equality between father and daughter. The respect which she owes to him who had given her being raises an obstacle to the kind of affection she must feel for a lover. If the father takes possession of his daughter by virtue of his paternal authority, he exercises a tyranny which nature must abhor. Our natural love of good order likewise causes reason to regard such a union as monstrous. The offspring of it are bound to be marked by confusion and insubordination; in short, such a union is abhorrent from every point of view; but it is no longer so when the two individuals love each other and have no knowledge that reasons which have nothing to do with their mutual affection ought to prevent them from loving each other; and incestuous relations, the eternal subjects of Greek tragedies, instead of making me weep make me laugh, and if I weep at Phèdre,[39] it is Racine's art which makes me do so.

I went to bed, but I could not sleep. The sudden transition I had to make from carnal to fatherly love caused all my moral and physical faculties the deepest distress. I slept for two hours, after deciding that I would leave the next day.

On waking and finding my decision very wise, I go to communicate it to the Duke, who was still in bed. He replied that everyone knew I was soon to leave and that such haste would be interpreted unfavorably. He advised me to take a broth with him and to consider my projected marriage a joke.

"We will," he said, "spend these three or four days gaily, and we will apply our minds to dismissing the gloomy aspects of this untoward incident and even giving it a comic cast. I advise you to renew your affair with Donna Lucrezia. You must have found her as she was eighteen years ago; she cannot possibly have been better."

This little discourse reduces me to reason. To forget the projected marriage was certainly the best course I could take; but I was in love, and the object of love is not like some piece of merchandise for which, when one cannot have it, one can easily substitute another.

So we went to Leonilda's together, the Duke in his usual spirits, but I pale, undone, the perfect picture of gloom. What immediately surprises me is to find gaiety. Leonilda flings herself on my neck, calling me "dear Papa," her mother addresses me as "dear friend," and my eyes and my soul are held captive by her face, in which eighteen years had been unable to harm a single feature.

We enact a mute scene, embracing each other again and again at intervals; Leonilda gives me, and receives, any quantity of kisses, regardless of what desires they may arouse in us; it was enough for her to be certain that, knowing who we were, we should be able to resist them. She was right. One grows used to everything. It was shame which dissipated my gloom.

I tell Donna Lucrezia about the strange welcome her sister had accorded me in Rome, and we begin laughing; we recollect the night at Tivoli,[40] and the remembered images soften us. After a short silence I tell her that if she would like to come to Rome with me simply to visit Donna Angelica I would undertake to bring her back to Naples at the beginning of Lent. She promises to give me an answer the next day.

Dining between her and Leonilda, and having to forget the latter, it is not surprising that all my old flame was rekindled. Whether it was due to her gay banter, or to my need to love, or to the excellence of the dishes and the wines, at dessert I offered her my hand.

"I will marry you," I said, "and the three of us will set off together on Monday, for now that Leonilda is my daughter I cannot leave her in Naples."

At this proposal my three table companions looked at one another, and no one answered me.

After dinner, overtaken by sleepiness, I had to lie down on the bed, and I did not wake until eight o'clock, when I was surprised to see only Donna Lucrezia, who was writing. She comes to me, she says I have slept for five hours, and that she had not gone to the opera with her daughter and the Duke so that I should not be left alone.

Recollecting an old love in the presence of an adorable woman reawakens it, desires are rekindled, and the strength with which they return is boundless. If the two persons are still in love, neither yields to the other in eagerness; they feel as if they were regaining possession of a treasure which belongs to them and which a series of harsh circumstances has long forbidden them to enjoy. Such we became in an instant, with no preamble, no idle talk, no preliminaries, and even with no feigned attacks, in which one or the other cannot but be playing a role. Immersed in the sweetness of a happy silence, we surrendered ourselves to the one true author of nature, to love.

I was the first to break the silence during the first intermission. If a man has a mind which sees the amusing side of things, will it not continue to be of the same cast during the delightful repose which follows an amorous victory?

"Here I am again," I said, "in the charming country which undid me to the sound of gunfire and drums the first time I dared to explore it in the dark." [41]

She could not but laugh, and, memory joining in, we recollected in turn all that had happened to us at Testaccio and Frascati and Tivoli.[42] We passed them in review only to laugh, but what are the subjects for laughter which two lovers who are alone together bring up except an excuse to celebrate the festival of love once more?

At the end of the second act, in the enthusiasm which love crowned and content leaves in the soul,

"Let us," I said, "be each other's until death; let us thus assure ourselves that we will die happy; we are of the same age, and we can even hope to die at the same time."

"It is my dearest wish, but stay in Naples and leave Leonilda to the Duke. We will frequent society, we will find her a husband worthy of her, and our happiness will be complete."

"I cannot settle in Naples, my dear. Your daughter was ready to leave with me."

"Say 'our daughter.' I see that you wish you were not her father. You love her."

"Alas! I am very sure that my passion for her would be stilled as long as I could live with you; but I answer for nothing if you should not be there. She is charming, and her mind captivates me even more than her beauty. Being sure that she loved me, I renounced attempting to seduce her only for fear of making her distrust me. Such an apprehension on her part might have lessened her fondness. I aspired to her esteem, I did not want to trouble her innocence. I wanted to possess her only legitimately and with a right equal to hers. My dear, we have created an angel. I cannot understand how the Duke—"

"The Duke is impotent. Now you understand all."

"How can he be impotent? He has a son."

"He is impotent, I tell you."

"Nevertheless—"

"Nevertheless. He is impotent, and he knows it."

"Let me see you as I did at Tivoli."

"No, for a carriage is stopping."

How Leonilda burst out laughing when she saw her mother in my arms! She gave us countless kisses. The Duke arrived a moment later, and we supped very gaily. He declared me the happiest of mortals when I told him I should spend the night honorably with my wife and my daughter; and he was right: I was the happiest of mortals in those days.

> Quand'ero in parte altr'uom da quel ch'io sono.
>
> ("When I was in part a different man from the man I am.")[43]

After he left, it was Leonilda who undressed her mother, while, after wrapping my hair in a kerchief, I threw my clothes into the middle of the room. She tells her daughter to get into bed beside her.

"Your father," she says, "will confine his attention to your mother."

"And I," she replies, "will give mine to you both"; and, on the other side of the bed she undresses completely and gets in next to her, saying that as her father I was at liberty to see all my handiwork. Her mother is proud of her, she praises her, and she rejoices to see that I find her beautiful. It sufficed her that she was in the middle and that it was only upon her that I extinguished the fire with which she saw that I was burning. Leonilda's curiosity delighted me to the soul.

"So is that what you did," she asked me, "when you engendered me eighteen years ago?"

But the moment which leads Lucrezia to the death of love has come, just when, to spare her, I feel it my duty to withdraw. Moved to pity, Leonilda sends her mother's little soul on its flight with one hand and with the other puts a white handkerchief under her gushing father.

Lucrezia, grateful for her daughter's fond ministrations, turns her back to me, clasps her in her arms, gives her countless kisses, then, turning to me again, says in moving tones:

"There, look at her, she is unstained, touch if you want to, nothing has suffered harm, she is as I made her."

"Yes," said Leonilda, laughing, "look at me and kiss Mama."

Alas! I loved her mother, otherwise nothing would have saved her from my fury. The combat began again and did not end until we fell asleep.

What waked us was the rays of the sun.

"Go and draw the curtain, dear daughter," says her mother.

At that Leonilda, naked as my hand, obediently goes to draw the curtain, showing me beauties of which, when one is in love, one has never seen enough. Alas! Coming back to bed, she lets me bestow my kisses on all that I saw; but as soon as she sees me on the edge of the precipice she slips away and gives me to her mother, who receives me with open arms and imperiously orders me to not spare her but to make her another Leonilda. At the end of the encounter, which was a very long one, I believed I had obeyed her, but my blood, which she saw when I yielded to exhaustion, left her doubtful.

"You have accustomed me," she said, "to this frightening phenomenon."

After assuring the innocent Leonilda that it was of no consequence, we dressed, and the Duke of Matalona arrived. It was Leonilda who gave him an account of all our nocturnal labors. In the wretchedness of his impotence he could not but congratulate himself on not having witnessed them.

Determined to leave the next day so that I should be in Rome in time to enjoy the last week of the Carnival, I used all my powers of persuasion on the Duke to assure myself that a present I had determined to bestow on Leonilda would not be refused. It was the dowry of five thousand ducati which I would have given her if she could have become my wife. The Duke decided that her being my daughter was all the more reason why she should accept the amount as a dowry. She accepted it, smothering me with caresses and making me promise that I would come back to Naples to see her when I learned that she was married. I promised, and I kept my word.

Since I had decided to leave the next day, the Duke wanted me to see all the Neapolitan nobility in his palazzo at a great supper of the kind I had seen at the Princess della Valle Piccolomini's. So he left me with my daughter, saying that we would meet again at the supper. We dined together, and we spent the rest of the day within the bounds prescribed to a father and daughter. The large amount of blood I had lost the night before may have contributed to my share in our abstention. We did not embrace until the very last moment of our parting, which the mother felt as keenly as did the daughter.

I went off to dress for the supper. When I took leave of the Duchess, she addressed me in these words:

"I am sure that you will always recollect Naples with pleasure."

No one could doubt it. After showing my generosity to the Duke's household, I left as I had arrived. That nobleman, who died three or four years later, escorted me to the door of my carriage.

CHAPTER XI

Accident to my carriage. Mariuccia's wedding. Flight of Lord Lismore. My return to Florence and my departure with La Corticelli.

WITH MY Spaniard riding ahead and Don Ciccio seated beside me, I am sound asleep in an excellent four-horse carriage when I am startled awake by a violent jolt. It was midnight when my carriage was overturned in the middle of the highway, beyond Francolisi[1] and four miles from Sant'Agata. Alfani, who was underneath me, was screaming from the pain in his right arm, which he thought was broken and which afterward proved to be only dislocated. My Leduc, coming back, told me that the two postilions had fled and that they might have gone to take the news to highway robbers.

I easily got out of the carriage through the door which was above me; but Alfani, unable, between his age and his disabled arm, to make his own way, had to be pulled out. We managed it in a quarter of an hour. His piercing shrieks made me laugh because of the strange oaths with which he interlarded his silly prayers to St. Francis of Assisi, his patron.

For my part, accustomed to being overturned, I suffered no damage. It depends on the position one assumes. Don Ciccio may have hurt his arm because he put it outside.

From the carriage I take my dueling pistols, having short ones in my pocket, my carbine, and my sword. I tell Leduc to mount and go looking for armed peasants in the vicinity, money in hand. Meanwhile, Don Ciccio having lain down on the hard ground groaning and in no condition to resist robbers,[2] I make my own preparations to sell them my fortune and my life at the highest price. My carriage being close to the ditch, I unhitch the four horses, I tie them to the wheels and the pole in a circle, and I station myself behind them with my five firearms.

In this predicament I could not help laughing at poor old Alfani, who was writhing exactly like a dying dolphin on the seashore and who uttered the most horrible execrations when a mare whose back was turned to him took it into her head to empty her bladder on him. There was nothing to be done; he had to put up with the whole stinking rain and to forgive my laughter, which I had not the strength to hold in.

The darkness of the night and a strong north wind made my situation still more trying. At the least sound I heard, I cried, "Who goes there?" threatening death to anyone who should dare to advance. I had to spend two whole hours in this tragicomic situation.

Leduc finally arrived at full gallop, shouting at the top of his voice and followed by a band of peasants, each with his lantern, come to my rescue. There were ten or twelve of them, all armed with muskets, and all ready to obey my orders.

In less than an hour the carriage was put back on its four wheels, the horses were harnessed, and Don Ciccio was restored to the seat he had occupied. I sent all the peasants away well satisfied, keeping only two who, serving as my postilions, brought me to the posthouse at Sant'Agata[3] at daybreak. The row I raised there was terrifying:

"Where is the post master? Someone go fetch me a notary, for the first thing is to make a statement. I insist on an indemnity; and the postilions who overturned me on an excellent road, where a spill is impossible unless it is done on purpose, shall be at least sentenced to the galleys."

A wheelwright arrives; he looks over my carriage and finds the axle broken, a new one must be made at once, and the verdict is that I will have to stay there at least one day.

In need of a surgeon, Don Ciccio goes without telling me to the Marchese Galiani,[4] whom he knew[5] and who comes in person to ask me to stay in his house until my carriage is repaired. I accept his invitation. He orders my carriage put in his stable at once.

The Marchese Galiani was as learned as he was courteous—courteous in the Neapolitan fashion, without ceremony. He was not as brilliant as his brother,[6] whose wit was effervescent, and whom I had known in Paris as Embassy Secretary to the Count of Cantillana.[7] The Marchese who offered me his hospitality was a mathematician; at that time he was writing a commentary on Vitruvius,[8] which he afterward published; but ploravere suis non respondere favorem speratum meritis ("they lamented that their merits did not meet with the gratitude for which they had hoped").[9] He introduced me to his spouse,[10] whom I knew to be the intimate friend of Donna Lucrezia; she was an excellent wife and mother, with several young children. Don Ciccio was immediately put to bed, and a surgeon was summoned, who, after examining him thoroughly, eased his mind by assuring him that it was only a dislocation, or, in his language, a "luxation."

At noon we hear a carriage arriving at a fast trot; we go to the window, and I see Donna Lucrezia getting out of it.

She comes up the stairs, she embraces the Marchesa, and, not in the least surprised to see me, asks me what chance has brought me here. She tells the Marchesa that I am an old friend of her late husband's and that she had just seen me again in Naples at the Duke of Matalona's.

After dinner I asked this creature made for love if we could spend the night together, and she showed me that it was absolutely impossible. I repeated my offer to marry her at Sant'Agata and take her with me, and she replied that if I really loved her I had only to buy an estate in the Kingdom, where she would come to live with me and would not demand that I marry her except in case she gave me children.

I should have lived happily with that charming woman, but I loathed the idea of settling down anywhere. In Naples I could have bought an estate which would have made me rich; but I should have had to adopt a prudent course of conduct which was absolutely foreign to my nature. After supper I took leave of the entire company, and I left at dawn so that I should be in Rome the next day. I had only fifteen stages[11] to cover on a very good road.

Arriving at Carillano,[12] I see an Italian two-wheeled carriage known as a mantice. Two horses were being harnessed to it. I needed four; I get out, and I hear my name spoken. I turn, and there, sitting under the hood beside a young and pretty girl, is Signora Diana, the Prince del Cassaro's[13] virtuosa, who owed me three hundred once. She said that she was going to Rome and that she was very glad we should make the journey together.

"We shall spend the night," she said, "at Piperno." [14]

"Signora, I shall not stop until I reach Rome."

"We shall get there tomorrow just the same."

"I know that, but I sleep better in my carriage than I do in the poor beds one finds in these inns."

"I dare not travel at night."

"Then we shall meet again in Rome."

"That's not right. You see that I have only a fool of a valet and my chambermaid, who is no braver than I am, and besides the wind is cold and this is an open carriage. I will come in yours."

"I have my old secretary with me, who broke his arm day before yesterday."

"Shall we dine together at Terracina?[15] We will talk."

"Very well. We will dine there."

We ate well. We were to arrive at Piperno after dark; Signora Diana again urged me to spend the night there. She was blonde and too fat, I found her unappetizing, but her chambermaid attracted me. I finally promise that I will sup with her, put her under the innkeeper's protection, and then leave, for I could not waste ten hours at the post station.

At Piperno I find an opportunity to tell the chambermaid that if she promises to be kind to me that night I will stay there.

"I will come to your bed," I say, "and you may be sure I will make no noise; your mistress will not wake."

She promises, and she even lets one of my hands assure me that she will be kind.

After supper they go off to bed; I go to wish them good night, and I see them. I cannot be mistaken, the door is open; I knew what I needed to know. After putting out the candle I go off to bed too. A half hour later I make my way to their bed, and my hands encounter the Signora Diana. It was obvious. The chambermaid had told her the story, and they had changed places. I could not possibly be mistaken, I did not need to use my eyes, my hand had sufficiently convinced me. I paused, hesitating between two ideas, both of which would adequately avenge me for the trick. The first was to get into bed with her, the other to dress and leave at once. The latter prevailed. I woke Leduc, and he the innkeeper, I paid, I had horses harnessed, and I went to Rome. I saw Signora Diana three or four times at the Barbary horse race,[16] and we saluted each other from a distance; if I had thought she would pay me I would have gone to see her.

I found my brother, Mengs, and Winckelmann cheerful and in good health, and Costa very glad to see me back. I at once ordered him to tell the Abate Momolo that I would go to his house for polenta that evening and that he need make no preparations. I ordered Costa to see to providing a supper for twelve. I was sure that Mariuccia would be present, for Momolo knew that I enjoyed seeing her.

As the Carnival[17] was to begin the next day, I hired a landau for the entire week. This is a carriage seating four, the hood of which can be lowered either in front or behind and in which people drive on the Corso[18] every day of that week from twenty-one to twenty-four o'clock. They go masked, or unmasked if they choose; they wear all sorts of masking costumes on foot and on horseback; they threw sweetmeats to the populace, they hand out satires, pasquinades, pamphlets. The lordliest people in Rome mingle with the humblest, there is general confusion, and the Barbary horses race down the middle of the Corso between the landaus, filled with spectators, which are drawn up to left and right. Toward nightfall the whole crowd makes off to fill the theaters for operas, plays, pantomimes, and rope-dancing exhibitions, in all which entertainments the performers have to be whole men or castrati. People also go to inns and pothouses, where all the rooms are full of patrons eating with might and main, as if they never ate except on those days.

I at once went on foot to the banker Belloni's[19] to deposit my money and obtain a letter of credit on Turin, where I was to see the Abate Gama and be entrusted with the mission from the Court of Portugal to the Congress of Augsburg, on which all Europe was counting. After that I went to look at my room behind Trinità dei Monti, where I hoped to see Mariuccia the next morning. I found everything in good order.

In the evening the Abate Momolo greeted me with cries of joy, and his whole family did likewise. His eldest daughter said with a smile that she was sure I would be glad if she sent for Signora Maria; I replied that she was quite right; and a few minutes later I saw her arrive with her pious mother, who at once told me that I should not be surprised to see her daughter better dressed, for she was to be married in three or four days. I congratulated her, and all the girls together asked her: "To whom, to whom?" Whereupon Mariuccia blushed and said very modestly to one of Momolo's daughters:

"You know him; he is So-and-So, who has seen me here and who is going to open a wigmaker's shop."

Her mother adds that it was Father XXX, her confessor, who had arranged the marriage and who had in his keeping the four hundred scudi which her daughter would bring him as her dowry. Momolo adds that he is an upright young man, who would have married his daughter if she had had such a sum.

I see that the girl is mortified, I comfort her, I tell her that her turn will come, and she takes me at my word. She believed I could not fail to know that she was in love with Costa and that I was planning to have him marry her. Nothing was further from my thoughts. Her idea was confirmed when I told Costa to use my landau to take all Momolo's daughters to the Corso the next day, well masked, for they must not be recognized; I told him to hire clothes from the Jews. They were delighted.

"And Signora Maria?" the jealous sister asked me.

"Signora Maria," I replied, "is about to be married;

so she must not attend any entertainment except with her fiancé."

Her mother applauds me; whereupon the clever girl at once pretends to be mortified. I then turn to the Abate Momolo and ask him to do me the favor of inviting Mariuccia's fiancé to supper, and he promises he will do so.

Being very tired, and having let Mariuccia see me, I had nothing further of consequence to do. So I asked the company to excuse me, and, after wishing them all good appetites, I went home.

The next morning at seven o'clock I did not need to enter the church. Mariuccia saw me, followed me, and we were alone in our little room. She needed to talk to me, I was eager to hear all her news, but such talk would have infringed on love. We had only an hour before us, and when one is making love one does not spend time chatting. We did not even bother to undress. As she put on her hood after we exchanged a last kiss, she finally told me that she was sure she would be married on the last day but one of the Carnival, that her confessor had arranged everything, that I had done well to ask Momolo to invite her future husband to supper, and that we could spend four hours together on the coming Sunday, the eve of her wedding day. She left after that, and I slept for a good hour.

On my way back to the house[20] I meet a carriage driven at high speed and preceded by a courier. A young nobleman dressed in black and wearing a blue ribbon[21] puts out his head, calls my name, and orders the carriage stopped. I am greatly surprised to see Lord Tallow,[22] whom I had met in Paris at his mother's, the Countess of Lismore,[23] who was separated from her husband and the kept mistress of Monsieur de Saint-Albin,[24] the Archbishop of Cambrai. He was a natural son of the Duke of Orléans, Regent of France.

Lord Tallow was a handsome young man, full of wit and talent, but unbridled in his pursuit of all the vices. Knowing that he was not rich, I was surprised by the style in which I saw he was traveling and even more by the blue ribbon. He hastily says that he is going to dine at the Pretender's,[25] but that he will sup at home; he invites me, I accept. He was lodging in the house of the English tailor in the Piazza di Spagna.

I went there, after laughing my fill at the comedy at the Tor di nona,[26] where I saw Costa with all the scopatore's daughters.

But I was very pleasantly surprised when, entering Lord Tallow's apartment, I saw the poet Poinsinet.[27] He was a short young man, ugly, amusing, full of inspiration and talent for the theater. He would have shone in the French Parnassus if five or six years later he had not most unfortunately fallen into the Guadalquivir and been drowned.[28] He was on his way to Madrid to make his fortune.

"What are you doing in Rome, my dear friend? And where, pray, is Lord Tallow?"

"He is in the next room; but he is no longer Tallow, he is Earl of Lismore, his father having died recently. You know that he was an adherent of the Pretender. I left Paris with him, gladly seizing such an opportunity to see Rome without spending a copper."

"Then His Lordship has become rich?"

"Not yet; but he will be, for his father's death makes him the master of an immense fortune. It is true that everything is confiscated; but that makes no difference, his claims are incontestable."

"Then he is rich in claims; but how did he become a Knight of one of the French King's orders?"

"You are joking. That's the blue ribbon of the Order of St. Michael,[29] the Grand Master of which is the Elector of Cologne, who has just died. His Lordship, who, as you know, plays the violin extremely well, happening to be at his court in Bonn, played him a concerto of Tartini's.

The gracious prince, not knowing how to give him any substantial token of his esteem, presented him with the ribbon you saw. You cannot imagine how pleased His Lordship was by the present, for when we return to Paris everyone who sees him go by will think it is the Order of the Holy Ghost."

We enter the drawing room, where we find His Lordship with the guests he had invited to supper. He comes to embrace me, calls me his dear friend, and, one by one, names to me all the persons who made up his select company: seven or eight girls, each prettier than the one before; three or four castrati, all fit to play women's parts to perfection in the Roman theaters; and five or six abati, husbands to all wives and wives to all husbands, who boasted of it and defied the girls to be more shameless than they. Yet the girls were not what would be called public prostitutes;[30] they were music lovers, devotees of painting, and dabblers in libertine philosophy. In this company I was a greenhorn. I see a respectable-looking man who is leaving; His Lordship asks him:

"Where are you going, Prince?"

He replies that he does not feel well. His Lordship tells me that he is the Prince of Chimay,[31] a subdeacon, and that he is seeking permission to marry in order to keep his illustrious family from becoming extinct. I praised his foresight.

At supper, where we were twenty-four, we may have emptied a hundred bottles. Everyone rose from the table intoxicated, except for myself and the poet Poinsinet, who had drunk only water. It was then that the great orgy began. It is impossible to describe all the excesses I saw; but a great libertine can imagine them. A castrato and a girl offered to undress in the next room, stipulating that they would keep their heads covered and lie in bed on their backs. They defied anyone to go in to see them and be able to decide which was male and which female. Bets were laid, and they went. We all entered, and no one ventured to decide. We were allowed only to look. I offered to wager His Lordship a hundred scudi against fifty that I would say which was the female. The probabilities were equal, and His Lordship accepted. I won, but there was no question of his paying me. This first act of the orgy ended with the prostitution of the two naked bodies. They defied all the men in the company to sodomize them, everyone set to work with the exception of myself and Poinsinet, and no one succeeded; but afterward we were treated to the spectacle of five or six copulations, in which the abati shone by alternating between the active and passive roles. I alone was respected. His Lordship, who had not shown a sign of life throughout the debauch, attacked poor Poinsinet; he defended himself in vain, he had to let himself be undressed and put in the same condition as His Lordship, who was stark naked too. We gathered around them. His Lordship took up his watch and offered it to the first person who could give either Poinsinet or himself an erection.[32] The hope of winning the watch put the girls, the abati, and the castrati on their mettle. Everyone wanted to be first; it was decided to write each name on a slip of paper and draw them. This was the most interesting part of the drama for me, who, during the whole incredible performance, never felt the slightest sensation, except that I laughed, chiefly at the distress exhibited by Poinsinet, who was reduced to being afraid of having an erection, since the drunken Earl swore that if he made him lose his watch he would have him pitilessly sodomized in the presence of all the actors. The scene, and the drama, ended when there was no one left with any hope of winning the watch. However, the secret of the Lesbians was employed only by the abati and the castrati; the girls would not use it; they wanted to preserve their right to look down on those who had employed it. It was pride rather than shame which stood them in good stead. They were afraid of employing it to no purpose.

What I gained from this hellish debauch is a better knowledge of myself. I risked my life. I had only my sword, and I would certainly have used it if His Lordship, in his Bacchic frenzy, had taken it into his head to force me to behave like the others, as he had done to poor Poinsinet. I have never understood what reason or what power made him respect me, for he was drunk. When I left, I promised him that I would come again whenever he sent me word, but I was firmly determined never to return there. Once outside of the stinking rooms, I thought I was restored to life. All sorts of foul things littered the floor of the abominable stage. Nevertheless I went to bed well satisfied to have witnessed a spectacle whose like I had never seen before and which I never saw equaled later.

Toward evening he came to see me on the pretext of returning my visit; he was on foot, he said that he did not care to see the Barbary horse race, and he invited me to take a walk with him at the Villa Medici.[33] I accept. I congratulate him on the immense fortune he must have inherited in order to live as he was doing, and he replies, laughing, that his entire capital is some fifty scudi, that he has no letter of credit, that his father had left nothing but debts, and that he already owed three or four thousand scudi.

"I am amazed that you are given credit."

"I am given credit because everyone knows that I have drawn a bill of exchange for two hundred thousand francs on Pâris de Montmartel.[34] But in five or six days it will come back protested, and I shall not wait until that awkward moment to make my escape."

"If you are certain it will be protested I advise you to leave today, for since the sum is so large the advice might be sent sooner."

"No, for I still have a slim hope. I have written my mother that I am ruined if she does not find a way to pay the amount to the banker on whom I drew, and in that case my bill will be accepted. You know my mother loves me.''

''I also know that she is not rich.''

''That is true; but Monsieur de Saint-Albin is so; and, between ourselves, I believe he is my father. Meanwhile, my creditors are almost as calm as I am. All those girls you saw would, if I asked them, give me all they possess, for each of them expects a substantial present this week, but I don't want to cheat them. The one I shall cheat, if I have to, is the Jew who wants to sell me this ring for three thousand zecchini, whereas I know it is worth only a thousand.''

''He will track you down.''

''I defy him to find me.''

It was a straw-colored solitaire of nine or ten carats. He left, asking me to say nothing. This harebrained wastrel did not arouse the slightest feeling of pity in me. I saw in him a wretch who would end his days in some fortress or who would kill himself if the idea occurred to him.

I went to sup at Momolo's, where I found the wigmaker, Mariuccia's fiancé. She had sent Momolo word that, her father having come from Palestrina on account of her marriage, she could not be present at the supper. I admired my dear Mariuccia's tactfulness; and throughout the supper I devoted my entire attention to the young man, in whom I found all that Mariuccia could wish. He was good-looking, sensible, and modest, and everything he said revealed an admirable frankness and probity. These characteristics, which would do honor to a great king, were nevertheless those of a wigmaker, whose distant prospect of succeeding in life was bounded by his wigs. He told me in the presence of Tecla (she was Momolo's daughter) that it was she who would have made him happy if she had had means to help him open a shop, and that he must thank God for having made the acquaintance of Mariuccia, who, after hearing him, had found a true father in God in her confessor. I asked him where he would hold the wedding party, and he said it would be at the house of his father, a gardener, who lived on the farther side of the Tiber, and that he had already decided to give him ten scudi for the expenses because he was poor.

How I wanted to give him ten scudi then and there! But how was I to do it? I should have betrayed myself.

"Is your father's garden pretty?" I asked him.

"Not pretty; but very well kept. Since he owns the land he has made one which he hopes to sell and which yields twenty scudi a year; I should think myself fortunate if I could buy it."

"What is the price of it?"

"Two hundred scudi."

"That is a bargain. Listen to me. I met your intended here, and I found her in all ways worthy of happiness. She deserves a decent young man like yourself. Tell me what you would do if I gave you two hundred scudi here and now to buy your father's garden?"

"I would add the garden to my wife's dowry."

"Excellent. Here are two hundred scudi, which I entrust to the Abate Momolo because I do not yet know you well enough. The garden is yours as part of the dowry of your future wife."

With that, I give him the money, which he hands to Momolo, who undertakes to make the purchase the next day; whereupon the young man kneels to kiss my hand, shedding tears of gratitude. All the girls cry, and so do I; but all these different tears had different sources: it was an alliance between vice and virtue. I made the young man rise and embraced him. He ventured to invite me to the wedding; I declined. I merely said that I would be glad if he would come to supper at Momolo's on Sunday; it was the eve of his marriage. I asked Momolo to arrange for Mariuccia and her father to be present too. I was sure I should see her Sunday morning. It would be for the last time.

It was seven o'clock when we met, and, having four hours before us, we went to bed. She began by telling me that everything had been arranged at her own house the day before, in the presence of her father, her fiancé, her confessor, the notary, and Momolo, who, having tendered the receipt from her fiancé's father, had included the garden in the contract for her dowry. She said further that her father confessor had found means to give her twenty scudi for the notary's fee and the expenses of the wedding.

"This evening," she said, "we shall sup together at Momolo's, and you did very well to arrange it. Nobody can say a word. My fiancé adores you. You did very well, too, to decline to come to my wedding at Trastevere.[35] The house would have been too poor for you, and the talk afterward would have made my future less happy."

"How will you manage if your husband takes it into his head to find fault with your physical condition, which he may expect to find intact?"

"My caresses, my sweetness, and my clear conscience, which do not even let me give it a thought, are my assurance that my husband will not think of it either."

"But if he brings it up?"

"It would hardly be tactful; but what is to keep me from answering, with all the sincerity of seeming innocence, that I don't know what he is talking about, that I have no knowledge of these things?"

Four hours passed very quickly. We parted, taking leave of love and shedding sweet tears.

After the Barbary horse race, which I attended with Mengs's family, who amused themselves throwing sweetmeats from a bag I had filled for them into the landaus we overtook, we went to the Teatro Aliberti, to which the castrato[36] who was playing the leading woman's part was drawing the entire city. He was the favorite of Cardinal Borghese, with whom he was invited to sup alone every evening.

The virtuoso sang very well, but his principal attraction was his beauty. I had seen him strolling at the Villa Medici, dressed in men's clothes, and though his face was handsome enough he had not made an impression on me, for one saw at once that he was not a whole man; but on the stage, dressed as a woman, he was a firebrand.

It would seem that a man dressed as a woman could not but be known for what he was if he let too much of his chest be seen; but it was precisely by so doing that the little monster bewitched everyone in the audience. Tightly laced in a very well-fitting corset, he had the figure of a nymph, and few women could show a firmer and more enticing bosom than his. The illusion he created was such that it was impossible to resist it. One looked, the spell acted, and one had either to fall in love or be the most stolid of all Germans. When he walked across the stage waiting for the ritornello[37] of the aria he was singing his gait was imposing, and when he swept his gaze over the boxes his black eyes revolved so tenderly and modestly that they ravished the soul. It was obvious that, as a man, he meant to foster the love of those who loved him as such and who would not have loved him if he had not been a man; but that he also meant to inspire love in those who, to love him, had to think of him as really a woman. Yet Rome, the Holy City, which thus drives the whole human race to become pederasts, refuses to admit it as she refuses to admit the existence of an illusion which she does everything possible to foster in the minds of audiences.

"You are right," replied a celebrated Monsignore of the wristband game[38] to put me off; "yes, you reason very soundly. Why do they allow this castrato to exhibit his beautiful breasts and at the same time insist that he be known to be a man and not a woman? And if women are forbidden to appear on the stage[39] so that the senses shall not be excited into becoming the victims of their charms, why seek out men endowed with the same attractions who deceive and seduce the senses and give rise to desires far more sinful than the natural desire aroused by real women? It is stubbornly maintained that to suppose pederasty so easy and so common is to malign the human race, and even that falling in love with these artificial creatures is matter for laughter, because those who do so are all bound to find they have been hoodwinked when it comes to conclusions; but would to God that it were so! Far from feeling hoodwinked, they throw themselves into the thing with gusto and even come to take such pleasure in the subterfuge that a great many people who are lacking neither in intellect nor in common sense prefer these gentlemen to all the prettiest girls in Rome."

"The Pope would do well to put a stop to this practice."

"I say no. One could not have a beautiful actress to supper alone without causing a scandal; and one can have a castrato to supper. It is true that afterward one goes to bed with him; but no one is supposed to know that; and if it becomes known no one can swear that there has been any wrongdoing, for after all he is a man, whereas one cannot go to bed with a woman except to enjoy her."

"True, Monsignore. The chief thing is to make certainty impossible, for well-bred people never pass judgment on uncertain grounds."

Having seen the Marchesa Passarini,[40] whom I had met in Dresden, in a box with His Highness Don Marcantonio Borghese,[41] I went to make my bow to them. The Prince, who had known me in Paris ten years earlier, invited me to dine with him the next day. I went, and he was not at home; I was told that I could dine even so, I left. On the first day in Lent he sent me his valet with an invitation to sup at the Marchesa's, whom he was keeping. I promised to go, and he waited for me in vain. Pride, the child of stupidity, never loses its mother's nature.

After the opera at the Aliberti I went to sup at Momolo's, where I saw Mariuccia with her father, her mother, and her fiancé. I was impatiently awaited. It is not difficult to make people happy if one confines one's efforts in that direction to those who deserve happiness. I supped delightfully in the company of these poor and honest people. It is possible that my satisfaction arose from my vanity, I knew that I was the author of the happiness and the joy I saw portrayed on the handsome faces of the bride and groom; but vanity itself must be held dear by him who, examining himself, finds that it has often been the cause of his doing good. After supper I made a small bank at faro, obliging everyone to play for counters, for none of them had a copper, and I saw to it that the bank was broken. After that we danced, despite the prohibition issued by the Pope, who believed that dancing was damnation and permitted gambling. His successor Ganganelli[42] did just the opposite. My present to the young couple was purposely small in order to avoid suspicion; I let them have my landau so that they could drive on the Corso and enjoy the Carnival, and I ordered Costa to take a box for them at the Teatro Capranica.[43]

Intending to leave Rome on the second day in Lent, I went to receive the Holy Father's blessing at twenty-two o'clock, just when the whole city was on the Corso. He received me most graciously. He said he was surprised I was not watching the great show with everyone else. He kept me for a good hour, talking of Venice and Padua, and when I again commended myself to his good offices in the matter of a pardon which would permit me to return to Venice, he told me to commend myself to God.

On the next day, which was the last day of the Carnival, I went to the Corso on horseback, dressed as Pulcinella,[44] throwing sweetmeats into all the landaus in which I saw children and finally emptying my basket on Momolo's daughters, whom I saw in my landau with Costa. Toward nightfall I went and took off my costume, then went to Momolo's, where I was to see Mariuccia for the last time. Our supper party was much the same as the one on the previous Sunday; but what was new to me, and very interesting, was that I saw Mariuccia married and that I thought her husband had a different attitude toward me from the one I had observed in him the first time I had seen him.

Wanting to know all, I found an opportunity to sit down beside Mariuccia at a time when we could talk freely. She gave me a detailed account of the whole of the first night, and she praised all her husband's excellent qualities. He was gentle, in love, even-tempered, and had become her fond friend after she had confided to him that I was her only benefactor.

"And he did not suspect," I asked, "a secret understanding between us and a few meetings?"

"Not in the least. I told him that what you had done to make me happy had been entirely through my confessor, after you had spoken with me only once in the church, where I had informed you of the good chance I had of being married to him."

"And you think he believed you?"

"I am sure of it; but even if he didn't, isn't it enough if he pretends to?"

"Certainly; I should even think more highly of him, for I would rather you were married to an intelligent man than to a fool."

This faithful narrative from Mariuccia's lips was the reason why, when I said good-by to the whole company, having to leave on the next day but one, I embraced the wigmaker, presenting him with my watch, and gave his wife a handsome ring of the same value. After that I went home to bed, telling Costa and Leduc that we would begin packing the next day.

But the next morning at nine o'clock I received a note from Lord Lismore, in which he asked me to go alone to the Villa Borghese[45] about noon to talk with him. Though I clearly foresaw what he would have to say to me, I went. I was in a position to give him some good advice, and my friendship for his mother made it my duty to go.

Since he was waiting for me where I could not fail to pass, he comes to meet me and hands me a letter from his mother, which he had received the day before and in which she told him that Pâris de Marmontel had just sent her a note saying that he had received a draft on her for two hundred thousand francs issued at Rome by him, which he would honor if she would be so good as to supply the funds. She had replied that she would let him know within three or four days if she could transfer the amount to him. She told her son that she had only asked for the delay to gain him time, which he should use to reach some place of safety, for he could be sure that his draft would be protested.

I hand him back her letter and tell him he must vanish.

"Give me the means, by buying this ring. You would not know that it does not belong to me if I had not told you so in confidence."

I arranged to meet him again at four o'clock, and I went to have the stone, which had been removed from the setting, appraised by one of the leading jewelers in Rome. After telling me that he knew the stone he declared it worth as much as two thousand Roman scudi. I took them to him, five hundred in gold and fifteen hundred in paper which he was to take to a banker who would give him a bill of exchange on Amsterdam for the amount in bank notes. He said that he would leave alone at nightfall and ride at full gallop to Leghorn, taking only a small courier's satchel with his absolute necessities and especially his precious blue ribbon. I wished him a good journey and kept the stone, which I had set in Bologna ten days later.

On the same day I obtained a letter of introduction from Cardinal Francesco Albani[46] to Monsignor Onorati, the Nuncio,[47] in Florence, and another from the painter Mengs to the Chevalier Mann,[48] whom he asked to put me up. I was going to Florence for La Corticelli and for my dear Teresa, and I counted on the Auditor's pretending not to know that I had returned to Tuscany in spite of the unjust order he had given me, and the more so if the Chevalier Mann should be putting me up.

On the second day of Lent the news of Lord Lismore's disappearance was the talk of the city. The English tailor was ruined, the Jew who owned the ring in despair, and all the scapegrace's wretched servants turned out into the street almost naked, for the tailor had despotically confiscated whatever he could lay his hands on, saying that it must all be the property of the swindling Lord who had ruined him.

The comic side of the tragedy was enacted for me by Poinsinet, who appeared before me clad in a redingote under which he had on nothing but his shirt. The host, having seized everything he possessed, had threatened to send him to prison when he had told him he was not in His Lordship's service.

"I haven't a copper," he said, "or another shirt, I know nobody, and I see nothing for it but to throw myself into the Tiber."

He was not destined to drown in the Tiber, but in the Guadalquivir, in Spain. I lightened his despair by telling him that he was at liberty to come to Florence with me, but no farther, for I had someone waiting for me in Florence. So he stayed with me, sedulously composing verses until the moment of my departure.

My dear brother Giovanni gave me a most beautiful onyx. It was a cameo representing a bathing Venus in bas-relief. It was a genuine antique, twenty-three centuries old, for with a very strong lens one could read the name of the sculptor Sostratus.[49] I sold it two years later in London to Dr. Maty[50] for three hundred pounds sterling, and it may still be in the British Museum.

So I set off with Poinsinet, whose gloom kept me entertained with the most amusing ideas. On the next day but one I arrive in Florence, going directly to Vannini's, who makes an effort to conceal his surprise at seeing me. I at once wait on the Chevalier Mann, whom I find at table alone; he receives me cordially, reads Mengs's letter, and asks me if the matter between the Auditor and myself has been settled, I say it has not, and I see him look chagrined, he tells me frankly that he would compromise himself if he put me up, that I had been ill advised to return to Florence.

"I am only here in passing."

"That is all very well; but you must realize that you cannot avoid going to see the Auditor"

I promise him I will do so, and I go back to my inn. No sooner have I entered my room than a police officer comes to tell me that the Auditor wishes to speak with me and will expect me early the next morning. The order annoys me, and in my ill-humor I decide to leave rather than to obey a command which was an insult to me. With this idea in mind, I set out; I go to Teresa's, I am told that she has left for Pisa; I go to La Corticelli's, she falls on my neck and makes all the Bolognese grimaces appropriate to the occasion. It is a fact that, though she was pretty enough, the only real attraction the girl had for me was that she made me laugh.

I give her mother money, ordering her to make us a good supper, and I go out with the girl, telling her that we will take a walk. I escort her to my inn, I leave her with Poinsinet, then I call Costa and the innkeeper into the other room. In his presence I order Costa to leave the next morning with Leduc and all my effects and to come to Bologna, where he will find me lodged at the "Pilgrim."[51] The innkeeper departs. I then order Costa to leave Florence with Signora Laura and her son, telling her, as was true, that I had gone ahead with her daughter; I tell Leduc the same. After that I take Poinsinet aside and give him ten zecchini, asking him to find lodgings elsewhere. He weeps with gratitude and tells me that he will leave on foot the next morning for Parma, where he is sure that Monsieur Dutillot[52] will not leave him without succor.

I go back to the room in which La Corticelli was, I tell her to come with me; she thinks we are going back to her mother's; but, without enlightening her, I go to the post station, I have two horses harnessed to a chaise, and I order the postilion to drive to L'Uccellatoio,[53] the first post station on the road to Bologna.

"But where are we going?" she asks me.

"To Bologna."

"And Mama?"

"She will come tomorrow."

"Does she know it?"

"No; but she'll know it tomorrow when Costa tells her and takes her and all my luggage with him."

La Corticelli declares it an excellent joke, she laughs, and we set off.

CHAPTER XII[1]

I arrive in Bologna. I am expelled from Modena. I go to Parma and to Turin. The beautiful Jewess Leah. The milliner R.

LA CORTICELLI had a mantle well lined with fur, but the fool who was carrying her off did not have even a cloak. The wind was very cold; nevertheless I would not stop. I was afraid of being followed and forced to return, which would have caused me the keenest mortification. A scudo which I gave the postilion to drink my health induced him to go at full gallop. I thought the wind would blow me away on the crest of the Apennines; but nothing could stop me for more than the three or four minutes required to change horses. The postilions thought I was a prince abducting the girl who was with me. The idea of being taken for the heroine of an abduction made the little madcap laugh at the top of her lungs for all the five hours it took us to make forty miles. We left Florence at eight, and I did not stop until an hour after midnight at a post station in Papal territory, where I had nothing more to fear. The name of the station was "The Ass Unloads";[2] the name set my feather-brained companion laughing, and we went upstairs. The whole household was asleep, but the racket I made and three or four paoli which I at once distributed among the servants got me a fire lighted and set everyone scurrying to prepare a repast of some sort. We were dying of hunger and cold. The innkeeper told us there was nothing to eat, but I laughed at him; he had butter, eggs, macaroni, rice, Parmesan cheese, bread, and good wine; and the idiot did not see that we had the ingredients for an excellent meal. I got my way; and I had a bed made up which astonished the innkeeper, for I had insisted that all the bed furniture from four others should be used in making it up. La Corticelli, who was eating like a madwoman, suddenly said, "What will Mama say?" and burst into such hysterical laughter that she seemed on the verge of expiring.

We went to bed at four o'clock in the morning after ordering that we be waked when a four-horse English carriage[3] arrived. Stuffed with macaroni as we were, and tipsy from Chianti and Montepulciano,[4] we did not feel like making love, and when we woke what sports we indulged in amounted to very little. It was an hour after noon; we were ready to eat; and the innkeeper, following my instructions, gave us a very good meal. But when I saw darkness fall without having seen my carriage arrive I began to wonder what could have happened; however, La Corticelli refused to hear of anything untoward. I went to bed after supper, having decided to send the post master's son to Florence if my party did not arrive during the night. They did not arrive, and I dispatched an express messenger to Costa to learn what had happened; for if there had been violence of any kind I would have gone back to Florence myself, despite La Corticelli, who would have been very averse to returning.

The messenger I sent left at noon and came back at two o'clock to tell me that my party would arrive in less than an hour. My carriage was being drawn by horses supplied by a vetturino, and was followed by a two-horse calèche in which there were an old woman and a boy.

"It's Mama!" said La Corticelli, "Oh, how we'll laugh! We must have a good meal got ready for her and let her tell her whole amazing story, which she will remember to her dying day."

Costa told me that he had been delayed for twenty-four hours because the Auditor, to avenge himself for my having disregarded his order, had sent word to the post station to refuse my servants horses, but that a certain Agresti, who was not subject to the order, had given him horses, undertaking to get him to Bologna in two days and a half. But here is the discourse delivered by Signora Laura, which rejoiced her daughter's soul:

"I got supper ready, as you ordered me, and I spent more than ten paoli, as you will see, and which you will repay me, for I'm a poor woman; but just think how anxious I was when I saw hour after hour pass and never saw you come back. At midnight I sent my son to Vannini's to find out what had become of you, and imagine my grief—for I'm a mother—when my son came back and said no one at your inn knew anything about you. I spent the night without ever going to bed, and in the morning I went to the authorities and complained that you'd carried off my daughter and demanded that they send someone after you to make you bring her back; but think of it! they laughed at me and told me I shouldn't let her leave my house with you unless I went with her too. What slander!"

"Slander," said La Corticelli.

"Certainly, for it was as much as to tell me that I had consented to my daughter's being carried off, which those vermin had no reason to suppose, because if I'd consented to it I wouldn't have gone to them for justice. After that I went to Doctor Vannini's, where I found your valet, who assured me you'd gone to Bologna, where I'd find you if I'd follow your carriage, and you'll pay for it, I hope, for that's what I arranged with the vetturino. But let me tell you: what you've done is too much for a joke."

I consoled her by assuring her that I would pay for everything. We left the next morning, and we arrived in good time at Bologna, where I went to stay at La Corticelli's, sending my valets to an inn from which I had meals brought in for the whole family. I spent a week there, in the course of which my madcap mistress, who knew a quantity of girls as giddy as herself, procured me pleasures so delicious that I sigh every time I recall them to my aging memory. There are cities in Italy where one can procure all the pleasures which a sensual man finds in Bologna; but they are nowhere to be had so cheaply or so easily or so freely. In addition, one eats and drinks very well there, one strolls under the arcades, and one finds not only wits but men of learning in the sciences. It is a pity that—whether because of the air or the water or the wine—one contracts a slight case of the itch, which gives the Bolognese the pleasure of scratching, and that is not so trifling a pleasure as one might think when the itching is not too intense. Especially during the month of March the ladies use their fingers with enchanting grace to scratch their hands.

I left La Corticelli about the middle of Lent, wishing her a good journey too, for she was about to go to Prague, where she had been engaged for a year as second ballerina. I promised I would go to fetch her in person and take her to Paris with her mother. The reader will see how I kept my word.

It was sheer whim which led me to stay in Modena, which I reached the same day. The next morning I go out to see paintings, I return for dinner, and I find a boor awaiting me with an order from the government to continue my journey at latest the next day. I call the innkeeper, and I make him repeat the order in his presence. I told him I had understood. He goes.

"Who is that man?" I ask the innkeeper.

"A constable."

"And the government sends me a constable?"

"The person who sent him can be no one but the Bargello."[5]

"Then is the Bargello the Governor of Modena? The low scoundrel!"

"Low scoundrel! Don't let anyone hear you. All the aristocrats speak to him. He manages the opera;[6] the greatest noblemen eat at his table and so gain his good will."

"But why does this noble Bargello expel me from Modena?"

"I have no idea. Go and talk with him. You will find a man of parts."

Instead of going to see the blackguard,[7] I go to see the Abate Testagrossa;[8] still alive and then resting on his laurels, he was a man who, despite his humble birth, had distinguished himself by his intelligence and whom his master the Duke of Modena[9] had judged worthy to conduct political negotiations for him at several courts. This Abate, who had made my acquaintance in Vienna in 1753, after greeting me most graciously, was greatly annoyed to hear what had just befallen me.

"What can I do?" I ask him.

"Leave, for the man is capable of treating you even more insultingly."

"I will leave. But could you do me the favor of acquainting me with the reason for this strange proceeding?"

"Come back this evening."

That evening the Abate told me that the Bargello, as soon as he had seen my name in the register, had guessed that I was the same Casanova who had escaped from the Leads, and, one of his duties being to guard the city against suspicious persons, he hastened to order me to leave.

"I am surprised," I said, "that, telling me this, you do not feel ashamed for the Duke of Modena. What an outrage! What deliberate subversion of morality and even of the good of the State!"

The next morning, just before I get into my carriage, a tall, robust man between twenty-five and thirty years of age, with the look of a cutthroat, asks me for a word in private.

"If you will stop in Parma for only three days," he says, "and will now promise on your honor that you will give me fifty zecchini when I come to ask you for them and you have learned for a certainty that the Bargello has been killed, I promise to kill him myself by blowing out his brains with my carbine tonight."

"I thank you," I said, "and I beg you to let him die his natural death. Here is a scudo; go and drink my health."

It is certain that if I had been sure the villain was not setting a trap for me I should have given him the promise he asked for; but I feared a plot. I reached Parma the next day and put up at the post station inn, giving the name of Chevalier de Seingalt, which I still bear; for once a man of honor takes a name to which no one else can lay claim it is his duty to keep it. I had then borne it for two years,[10] though I often added it to my family name.

I had scarcely reached Parma before I dismissed Costa; but a week later, the day before my departure, I took him back. His father, a violinist and very poor, had a large family to provide for.

I inquired for Monsieur d'Antoine,[11] and he was no longer there; and the Director of the Mint, Dubois-Chatellerault,[12] was in Venice. He was there by permission of the Infant-Duke, to set up a coining press,[13] and he did it very well; but it was not used. Venetian coins are not milled. Republics are superstitiously attached to their old ways; they fear that the slightest change of any kind is likely, or indeed is bound, to have an effect on the constitution which will be detrimental to the State. Ne tangas Camerinam ("Touch not Camerina").[14] The Venetian government is still as rigidly Greek[15] in spirit as it was at the birth of the Republic.

My Spaniard, who was delighted when I dismissed Costa on arriving in Parma, was annoyed when I took him back.

"He is no profligate," he said, "he is sober, he does not frequent bad company; but I believe he is a thief precisely because he makes a point of not cheating you in small matters. You will be his victim. He's waiting to gain your entire confidence before he makes his move. That's not my way; I'm a bit of a cheat, but you know me"

The rascal saw better than I did. Five or six months later Costa stole fifty thousand scudi from me. Twenty-three years later—that is, in 1784—I found him in Vienna as valet to Count Hardegg,[16] and, finding him poor, I was tempted to get him hanged. I proved to him, documents in hand, that I could do it. At that he took refuge in tears and in the pity of an honest man named Bertrand who was in the household of the Sardinian Ambassador. This Bertrand, whom I esteemed, so worked on me that I heroically pardoned him. When I asked the wretch what he had done with all he had stolen from me in money and jewels he said he had lost it all by furnishing the funds for a biribissi,[17] that it had been his own associates who had cleaned him out. In that same year he had married Momolo's daughter, who had left him very soon afterward.

But to continue.

At Turin I went to lodge in a private house in which the Abate Gama, who was expecting me, was staying. I took the whole apartment on the second floor, laughing at the sermon on economy which he immediately preached me. Having assured him again that I would be ready to go to Augsburg whenever the representatives of the belligerent powers had assembled there, he assured me, on his side, that I would receive credentials in May and that he himself would give me all the necessary instructions. I was supremely gratified by this mission.

After making adequate arrangements with the mistress of the house for my meals I went to the coffeehouse, where the first person I saw was the self-styled Marquis Desarmoises, whose acquaintance I had made at Aix-en-Savoie. The first thing he told me was that games of chance were forbidden and that the ladies I had met at Aix would undoubtedly be delighted to see me again. As for himself, he said that he lived by playing backgammon, despite his not being lucky with dice, for in backgammon knowledge of the game outweighed bad luck. I could well understand that, with luck favoring neither player, the one who knew the game better would win, but I did not understand how the opposite case was possible.

We went to walk on the beautiful promenade leading to the citadel,[18] where I saw a quantity of pretty girls. Turin is the city of Italy in which the sex has all the charms for which love can hope, but in which the police are the most troublesome; and, the city being small and very populous, the spies know everything; it follows that the only freedom one can enjoy there is that which one obtains by taking the greatest precautions and employing the services of clever bawds, whom one must pay very well, for, if they are caught, they risk being punished with a severity nothing short of barbarous. Neither public prostitutes nor kept women are allowed there, which is most gratifying to the married women, as the ignorant police should have foreseen. For the same reason the devotees of the wristband game[19] make holiday there.

Among the beauties I see, only one impresses me so much that I ask about her. Desarmoises knew them all. He said that she was the famous Leah,[20] a Jewess and unconquerable, having resisted the attacks of the most celebrated amateurs of the sex in Turin; that, her father being a horse dealer, there was no difficulty in going to her house, but that there was nothing to be done there. I determine to take my chances, and he promises he will guide me to her house. I invite him to dine with me; on our way we encounter Monsieur Z.[21] and two or three more of the people who had been at Aix, I bestow and receive compliments, but I am not of a mind to call on any of them or even to leave a visiting card at the Marquis de Prié's[22] door.

Immediately after dinner he shows me the way to the Jewish horse dealer's outside the Porta del Po.[23] I ask him if he has a good saddle horse for sale; he sends a boy to the stable to bring one out; meanwhile, into the courtyard comes his charming daughter to receive compliments on her charms. I find her beyond praise. Slender, at most twenty-two years of age, dressed tastefully but without affectation, wearing no cap over hair whose blackness was just softened by a touch of powder, complexion of lilies and roses, lively and eloquent eyes which, under proud brows, declared war on all who came to conquer them. Her whole appearance betokened intelligence and social grace. Lost in ecstatic contemplation, I did not see the horse in front of me. Though my thoughts are elsewhere, I manage to examine it, looking at all its points as if I am an expert, I open its mouth, I inspect its feet and knees, I give it a sudden blow on the back, I feel its ears, I make it walk, trot, and gallop, and I tell the Jew that I will come the next day in top boots to ride it. It was a dapple gray, and priced at forty Piedmontese pistole, which comes to about a hundred zecchini. The beautiful Leah tells me that the horse is gentleness itself and that its amble is as fast as any other horse's trot.

"I have tried it several times," she says, "and if I were rich it would be mine."

"Then you would both be happy, for I am sure that it has loved you ever since you rode it. I will not buy it until I see you on its back."

She blushes, her father says she must do me the favor; she consents; I promise I will be there at nine o'clock in the morning.

I keep my word, and I find her dressed in riding clothes. What a body! What a likeness to the Callipygian Venus[24] in her hips, her thighs, her knees! I had already fallen under the spell. She mounts like the most nimble Spaniard, and I mount another horse which is standing ready for me. I accompany her everywhere, the horse went very well, but my thoughts were all of her. Returning to the house at a walk I tell her that I will buy the horse, but as a present for her, and that if she will not accept it she shall not see me again. The only condition I make is that she will ride it in the morning whenever I ask her to do me the favor. I say that I will stay in Turin five or six weeks, that I had fallen in love with her on the promenade, and that buying the horse had been only a pretext for gaining the sweet satisfaction of seeing her and declaring my passion. She replies, very sensibly, that the friendship she had inspired in me was infinitely flattering and that the generous present I was making her was not necessary to assure me of her own. That the condition I imposed on her was one which she cherished and that she would take pleasure in accepting the present I offered her even if she were not sure that her father would be displeased if she refused it; she ended by asking me to give her the horse in her father's presence, repeating my stipulation that I would not buy it if she refused it.

This I proceeded to do. Her father, whose name was Moses, thought it an excellent bargain, he congratulated his daughter, accepted, tendered me a receipt for the forty pistole I gave him, and invited me to breakfast with him on the following day.

The next morning Moses received me with the utmost respect. The charming Leah, in female attire, said that if I wanted to ride she would quickly dress as she had done the day before, and I replied that we would ride another day; but her father, who was always thinking of money, said that if I liked driving he could sell me a very pretty phaeton with two excellent horses. His daughter said he should show them to me, and he went off to order the horses harnessed.

"I will look at the carriage," I said to Leah, "but I will not buy it, for I have no use for it."

"You could go driving with the lady whom you love."

"With you. But perhaps you would not dare."

"Why not, in the country, outside of Turin?"

"Very well, I will look at it."

Her father drives up in the phaeton, I go downstairs with Leah, and I look at the carriage and the horses; I find them very attractive.

"You can have the whole rig for only four hundred zecchini; after Easter anyone who wants it will have to give me five hundred for it."

We get in with Leah, we drive a mile and return to the house. I tell Moses I will give him my answer the next day; he leaves, and I go upstairs again with Leah.

"The rig," I say, "is certainly worth four hundred zecchini, and tomorrow I will pay them with pleasure; but on the same conditions on which I bought the horse, and with one more—that you will grant me all the favors which are granted to love."

"You speak very clearly. I reply no less clearly. I am a decent girl and I am not for sale."

"Permit me to tell you, my beautiful Leah, that all women, decent or not, are for sale. When a man has the time, he buys them with his attentions, and when he is in a hurry, as I am, he has recourse to presents and money."

"Then he takes the wrong course; he would do better to inspire love by the assiduity of his attentions."

"Nothing would make me happier; but, I repeat, I am in a hurry."

Her father comes back, and a moment later I leave, saying that if I could not return on the morrow I would come some other day and we would talk about the phaeton.

It was clear that Leah had taken me for a spendthrift ready to become her dupe. She would have liked to get the phaeton on the same terms on which she had got the horse. For my part, I had been prepared to lose a hundred zecchini; but that must suffice. My course must be to suspend my visits and see what would result between Leah and her father, who, with his love of money, must be very much displeased that she had not found some way to make me buy the phaeton, whether by giving or not giving herself to me, for that could not matter to him. I was sure that in the end I should see them come to me.

It was on Saturday that I saw the beautiful Jewess on the promenade at the citadel.

"We see nothing more of you," she said; "either come to breakfast with me tomorrow morning or I will send you the horse."

I promised I would come, and I kept my word. She had me breakfast with her aunt, who was there only for propriety's sake, and after breakfast she put on riding clothes in my presence, but with her aunt still there. She stepped out of her skirt, under which she already had breeches, then took off her corset and put on a jacket, letting me see what I pretended not to see; but she knew what she was about. She asked me to arrange her jabot, and in doing so I touched what had previously engaged only my sight. I knew that she had a plan, and that my success depended entirely on foiling it. I had hopes of victory.

Her father arrived just as we were mounting; he said that if I would buy the phaeton and the horses he would let me have them for twenty zecchini less. I replied that it lay with his daughter to make me do whatever she pleased when we came back from our ride.

We set off at a walk, and she says that, having told her father that she could make me buy the carriage and horses, I ought to buy them so that he would not be angry with her.

"Buy them," she says, "on the understanding that you will not give them to me until you are sure that I love you. I promise we will go driving alone together whenever you please, so long as we do not get out anywhere; but I think you no longer care about that, your affection was only a passing fancy."

"To convince you that mine was not a passing fancy, I will buy the phaeton and have it put in a coach house in Turin and I will keep the horses in a stable and not use them; but if you do not make me happy within a week I will sell them."

"Come tomorrow."[25]

"I will come, but I want a pledge of your affection this morning."

"This morning? I couldn't."

"I will go upstairs with you; and when you change your clothes you can grant me some favors."

Back at the house, we get out, and she astonishes me by telling her father that the phaeton is mine and he has only to have the horses harnessed. The Jew laughs, he goes up with us, and Leah confidently tells me to count out the money.

"I haven't it on me, but I can give you a note."

"Here are pen and paper."

I immediately write the banker Zappata to pay 380 zecchini at sight. The Jew leaves to collect them, and Leah remains alone with me.

"By your trust in me," she says, "you have rendered yourself worthy of my heart."

"Then quick—get undressed."

"No. My aunt is in the house, she might come in, and I daren't lock the door. You shall be content with me tomorrow. But now I'm going to undress; so you go into that closet. You shall come out as soon as I am in women's clothes again."

I consent, and she locks me in. Looking at the door from bottom to top, I see a crack high up between the two leaves, I get on a stool, and I see the whole room, and Leah sitting before me on a sofa and immediately beginning to undress. She changed her shift, took off her shoes and stockings, wiped her feet, examined a toenail, took down her breeches, a button dropped off, and she bent to get it from under the sofa; there was no end to the postures in which she exhibited herself, and I felt certain she knew I was at the crack. I could not refrain from masturbating.

When she was dressed she opened the door; I fall on her neck, I tell her I have seen everything, she will not admit it, I try to enforce my rights, she resists, and in comes her father, thanking me and saying that his house and everything in it are at my service, after which he gives me a receipt for 380 zecchini. I leave thoroughly vexed, and I return to my lodging in the Via Po[26] in the phaeton. I put it in my coach house, and I send the horses to a stable, keeping the coachman. I was of a mind not to see Leah again. She had pleased me in her postures, but the pleasure she had given me had arisen entirely from an irritation which Love could not but abhor. She had forced him to be a thief, and the starving child had given in; but when afterward he thought he had the right to demand the same fare freely given and was refused it, scorn took the place of esteem. Leah would not admit that she was a whore, and my love would not consent to be a cheat.

I made the acquaintance of an amiable Chevalier, a man of letters, a soldier, and a great lover of horses, whose only fault was horse-faking. He introduced me to several families of consequence; but I did not cultivate them, for I had no wish to be drawn into the sentimental relationships which were all that they offered; what I wanted was substantial pleasures, for which I was willing to pay cash. The Chevalier de Brézé[27] was not the man I needed. He bought my phaeton and the horses for thirty zecchini less than I had paid for them, and he left for the country. A Signor Baretti,[28] who had known me at Aix-en-Savoie and who acted as croupier for the Marquis de Prié, took me to call on La Mazzoli,[29] a former dancer, then being kept by the Cavaliere Raiberti,[30] a cold, very gentlemanly personage who directed the Department of Foreign Affairs. La Mazzoli, who was not pretty, had several girls come to her house for me, but I did not find any of them worthy to take the place of Leah, whom I thought I no longer loved. I was mistaken.

The Cavaliere Coconà,[31] who had the pox at the time, offered me his mistress; she was a seamstress, whom, despite all she said to me, I never dared to touch. After a week I stopped seeing her. His brother Count Trana, whom I had also known at Aix, introduced me to Signora Sc.,[32] who tried to inveigle me into committing a crime. My Good Genius kept me from it. Count Trana cleared himself. Not long afterward his uncle died and he became rich. He married and was unhappy.

I was bored; and Desarmoises, who regularly ate at my table, became uneasy. I was thinking of going to Milan. He advised me to make the acquaintance of a French milliner, of some celebrity in Turin, known as "La R." [33] She employed seven or eight girls, who sewed for her in a room next to her shop. He thought that, if I went about it in the right way, I could get one of them. Since I had money I did not think it would be difficult. I went to La R.'s shop to buy some black blond-lace which

I wanted to send to Venice. On entering I was surprised to see Leah, who was bargaining for a number of things she had chosen and which she protested were too dear. She said, reproachfully but kindly, that she had thought I must be ill; I replied that I had been busy. She attracted me. I told her she would see me the next day. She invited me to a Jewish wedding party, at which, she said, I would find a large crowd. I knew that it would be entertaining, and I promised to go. After bargaining for a long time without coming to terms, Leah left, and La R. was going to put away all the gewgaws at which she had been looking, when I said that I would buy them myself. She smiled, I paid her, and she asked me where I was staying and at what time she should send me my purchases.

"You might do me the honor, Signora, of coming to breakfast with me tomorrow morning and bringing them yourself."

"I cannot leave my shop, Signore."

"Then by whom will you send them?"

Despite her thirty-five years, La R. attracted me. I told her that I wanted some black blond-lace. She opened a door and asked me to follow her. I was surprised to see seven or eight girls, all of them pretty, so busy working that they scarcely looked at me. La R. opens several cupboards and takes out magnificent lengths of blond-lace. With my eyes and my attention on the girls, I said that I wanted enough to make two Venetian bautte.[34] She knew what they were. In Venice they were the height of luxury. The lace cost me more than a hundred zecchini. She told two of her girls to take it to me the next day together with all the things which Leah had refused and I had bought.

"Yes, Mama."

They rise, and I find them charming. I go back to her shop with La R. and, sitting down at her counter, I praise the beauty of her apprentices, but I say—which was not true—that I would have preferred her to any of them. She declines my proffered homage, saying frankly that she has a lover, and an instant later she tells me he is at the door.

In comes the Comte de Saint-Gilles.[35] He was an old man who could no longer make any possible pretensions to gallantry. I thought that La R. had been trying to hoodwink me; but the next day I learned that she had told me the unvarnished truth. I had met him at the "Change"[36] coffeehouse; I left him with his fair one after making him a bow.

The next morning the pretty girls came, and I ordered chocolate, but they refused it. After giving me my purchases they were about to leave; but I suddenly thought of telling them to take Leah all the things she had chosen and to come back afterward and tell me how she had received the gift. They agreed to do so and waited while I wrote her a note. I could not give the two girls the slightest indication of my affection, for I had not dared to shut my door and the mistress of the house and her ugly daughters found a hundred excuses for constantly coming and going. But when they returned I waited for them at the foot of the stairs, and after giving them a gold pistole[37] I told them they had only to say the word and it was in their power to make my heart theirs. They said that Leah had graciously accepted my handsome present and that she was expecting me.

In the afternoon I pass La R.'s shop, she is alone, she calls to me, and I am glad to go and sit at her counter. She thanked me for my generosity to her girls, and she asks me if I am very much in love with the beautiful Jewess. I tell her frankly that I love her but that, having had no success, I had acted accordingly; she congratulates me, saying that she is nothing but a cheat whose only thought was to fleece the men who were taken with her charms.

"Perhaps that is also the principle of your charming girls."

"My girls are accommodating only when I tell them that they may be so."

"Then I commend myself to your kind offices, for they would not accept even a cup of chocolate from me."

"Their behavior is forced on them; you do not know Turin. Are your lodgings satisfactory?"

"They are excellent."

"Are you perfectly free there? Can you have anyone you choose to supper and do anything you like in your rooms? I am sure you cannot."

"So far I have had no occasion to try it; but I believe—"

"Do not deceive yourself. Everyone in the house is a spy for the police."

"Then you think I could not ask you to supper with one or two of your apprentices?"

"I should take good care not to go. The whole of Turin would know of it, and people would say what was not true."

"And if I went to lodge elsewhere?"

"It is the same everywhere; but I know a house in which you could live as you choose and to which my girls, if proper precautions were taken, could even come to bring you anything you might buy at my shop."

"Where is the house? I will do whatever you tell me to do."

After saying that I must not confide in any Piedmontese, she gave me the address of a small furnished house in which no one lived except the old caretaker and his wife. She said that I could rent it by the month, and that if I paid in advance no one would even ask my name. The house was some two hundred paces from the citadel, the last in an unfrequented street, with a back gate which gave onto the countryside and which I could even enter by carriage.

I went there at once; I found it answered her description in every detail, I rented it for a month, and the very next night I slept there. La R. admired my dispatch.

The next day I went to the wedding to which Leah had invited me, and which I found entertaining; but I resisted all the arts with which she tried to lure me back into her toils. However, I rented a closed carriage from her father, having it sent to my house and putting the horses in my stable; I was thus able to go wherever I pleased and enter and leave at any hour. It was just as if I were outside the city. I had to give the address of my new lodging to the ever too curious Abate Gama, and I thought I had good reason to hide nothing from Desarmoises, whom his poverty made completely dependent on me; nevertheless my door was closed to everyone except when I ordered it opened to people whom I expected. I could not doubt the fidelity of Costa and my Spaniard.

In that auspicious house I had, one by one, but always accompanied by another, all of La R.'s girls, the last of whom, whose name was Vittorina, was obstructed and did not know it. La R., who did not know it either, had given her to me as a virgin, and I was forced to believe her such for the two hours during which I hoped for victory; but finally, exhausted by my efforts, I decided to see what was the matter, candle in hand. I saw the fleshy membrane pierced by a hole so small that the head of a pin would scarcely pass through it. Vittorina herself urged me to put my little finger in by force, but to no purpose. The attempt caused her not the slightest pain, but what was in the way was only flesh. It was the outer extremity of her vagina, which nature by the purest chance had made impenetrable in her case. It condemned Vittorina to die a virgin unless some skillful surgeon performed the celebrated operation on her—the same one which was performed on Signorina Cherufini[38] soon after Signor Lepri[39] married her.

"Your little god Hymen," I said "defies the most vigorous Love to seat himself on his altar."

The poor girl wept.

When I told La R. the story she laughed and said that it could make Vittorina's fortune. It was Count de La Pérouse[40] who had Vittorina's obstruction removed some years later. When I came back from Spain I saw her pregnant.

Early in the morning on Maundy Thursday Moses and his daughter Leah came to see me. I was not expecting them. I greeted them cordially. They did not dare appear in Turin during our holy days. I advised them to spend them with me, and I realized that I should have no great difficulty in persuading them when I saw the scoundrel show me a ring he wanted to sell me. I said that I might buy it from his daughter, and he hoped that I would make her a present of it, but I disappointed him. I kept them for dinner and supper, and I gave them a room with two beds, in which they slept very comfortably.

The next morning, seeing that I had not yet bought the ring and having business, he asked me to let him use my carriage all day, saying that he would come back toward nightfall, at the beginning of his Sabbath, to go home with his daughter. After he left I bought the ring for six hundred zecchini, but on the conditions I laid down, and, being in my house, Leah could not cheat me. She refused me nothing; and in the evening her father was as pleased as I was—but not Leah, who expected that when she left I would give her a present. I told her that I would take it to her in person.

On Easter Monday a man brought me a note summoning me to the police office.

CHAPTER XIII[1]

My victory over the Vicario, the Superintendent of Police. My departure. Chambéry. Desarmoises's daughter. Monsieur Morin. M. M. of Aix. The boarder. Lyons. Paris.

SURPRISED BY such a summons, which promised me nothing pleasant, I dress and go by sedan chair to the office of the Vicario.[2] He was seated at a large table, with eighteen or twenty people standing about him. He was a man sixty years of age, with half of his nose concealed by a black patch because of a malignant ulcer.

"I have had you summoned here," he said, "to order you to leave[3] in three days at the latest."

"You have no right, Signore, to give me such an order; so I will not leave until it suits me."

"I will have you expelled by force."

"Indeed! I cannot resist force; but I hope you will think it over, for in a well-governed city it is unheard of to expel a man who is doing nothing illegal and who has a hundred thousand francs in the hands of a banker."

"So much the better. In three days you can pack and make arrangements with your banker. I advise you to obey: the order comes from the King."[4]

"If I left I should become an accomplice in your injustice; but since you speak in the King's name I will instantly wait on His Majesty. I am sure that he will revoke the unjust order which you have so publicly given me."

"Has not the King power to make you leave?"

"Yes, but only by using force if I resist. He also has the power to sentence me to death, but he has to supply the executioner to carry out the sentence on me."

I had met the Cavaliere Raiberti at the house of a dancer he was keeping; he was the First Secretary in the Department of Foreign Affairs. I have myself carried to his office,[5] and I tell him the whole story, ending by saying that I must have an audience with the King, for I had made up my mind I would not leave of my own free will. The worthy man advises me to go instead to speak with the Cavalier Ossorio,[6] who was then in charge of Foreign Affairs and who had the King's ear. I like his advice, and I at once wait on the Marchese Ossorio; he was a highly intelligent Sicilian. After telling him all the circumstances, I ask him to bring the matter to His Majesty's attention, since, considering the Vicario's order unjust, I was determined not to leave. He promised he would speak to the King and told me to come back the next day.

I went to dine with the Abate Gama, thinking that I would be the first to bring him the news. But not a bit of it: he knew that I had been ordered to leave and how I had answered the Vicario, and when I told him that I was still determined not to obey he did not dare to condemn my firmness. He assured me that, if I left, he would send me all the necessary instructions at whatever address I should give him.

The Cavalier Ossorio received me the next morning in the most affable manner. The Cavaliere Raiberti had spoken to him on my behalf. He said that he had spoken to the King and to Count d'Aglié[7] as well, and that I could stay; but that I must go at once to speak further with the latter, who would give me what time I might need to finish my business in Turin.

"I am waiting," I said, "for instructions from the Court of Portugal for the Congress to be held in Augsburg, which I shall attend."

"Then you believe that the Congress will be held?"

"No one doubts it."

"There are those who believe it will come to nothing. I am delighted to have been of service to you, and I shall be glad to hear how the Vicario receives you."

So I go to the Vicario, who no sooner sees me than he says that the Cavalier Ossorio had told him I had business which obliged me to remain in Turin a few more days, and so I might stay.

"But no doubt you can tell me approximately how many days you will need."

"I have no way of knowing precisely, for I am awaiting instructions from the Court of Portugal in regard to the Congress which is to be held at Augsburg. I think I might leave for Paris in a month; and if I am delayed longer than that I will do myself the honor of informing you."

"I shall be glad if you will."

I at once went back to the Cavalier Ossorio, who said with a smile that I had caught the Vicario, for I had set an indefinite time. But what a titbit it was for the politic Gama when I told him that the Cavalier Ossorio doubted if the Congress would be held! Nevertheless, I again assured him that I would go to Augsburg and that I would leave in three or four weeks.

La R. lavished congratulations on me, for she could not but be delighted that I had humiliated the Vicario; but we thought it best to give up the little suppers with her girls at my house. Having already had them all, I did not find this small sacrifice too painful. I continued in this course until the middle of May, when I left Turin after receiving from the Abate Gama a letter for Lord Stormont,[8] who was to be the Plenipotentiary for England at Augsburg. It was with him that I was to work in the matter of my mission.

Having decided to see Madame d'Urfé before going to Germany, I wrote to her asking her to send me a letter to Monsieur de Rochebaron,[9] at Lyons, which I might have occasion to use. Intending also to stop at Chambéry for three or four days to pay a visit at the convent grating to M. M., for whom I sighed every time I remembered her, I asked Signor Raiberti for a letter for that city; and I wrote to my friend Valenglart at Grenoble to remind Madame Morin that she had promised to show me a resemblance at Chambéry.[10]

But now for another inauspicious event, considering the very harmful consequences it had for me.

Five or six days before I left Turin, I see Desarmoises appear before me at ten o'clock in the morning, looking very downcast.

"I have just received an order," he said, "to leave Turin within twenty-four hours."

"Do you know the reason for it?"

"It is because yesterday at the Caffè del Commercio[11] I contradicted Count Scarnafigi[12] when he said that the writer of the Gazette de Berne was in the pay of France; he left the place in a rage, I followed him to make him listen to reason, but in vain; he apparently lodged a complaint, and tomorrow early I shall have to decamp."

"You are French, and since you can claim the protection of the Ambassador,[13] you would make a mistake in leaving so precipitately."

"In the first place the Ambassador is away, and in the second place my barbarous father disowns me. I would rather leave. I will wait for you in Lyons. I only ask you to lend me another hundred scudi, which I will repay you."

I gave him the small amount, and he left the next day at dawn. I told him that I would stop for some days in Chambéry.

After obtaining a letter of credit on Augsburg I left, and the next day I crossed the Mont Cenis on mules—I, Costa, Leduc, and my carriage. Three days later I reached Chambéry, putting up at the only inn,[14] where all travelers are obliged to lodge.

Seeing a very pretty young lady come out of the room next to mine, I ask the maid who she is, and she says she is the wife of a young man who was staying in bed recovering from a sword thrust he had received four days before on his way from France.

Leaving my room to go to the post station for the letter Valenglart was to have written me, I stop before my neighbor's, the door of which was open, and offer her my services as her fellow lodger; she asks me to come in; I see a handsome young man sitting up in bed, and I ask him how he feels. His wife tells me that the surgeon had forbidden him to talk because of a sword thrust in the chest which he had received half a league away on the road from France, that he hoped to be cured in a few days and continue his journey to Geneva. Just as I am about to leave, the maid comes in and asks me if I will sup alone in my room or with Madame. I reply, laughing at her blunder, that I will sup in my room, that I have not the pleasure of the lady's acquaintance; the latter replies that it would be an honor and a pleasure if I would sup with her, and her husband says the same in a whisper; so I say that I will gladly avail myself of his kindness. Whether she was married or unmarried, she was charming. When I found her escorting me to the stairs I took the liberty of kissing her hand, which in France is a tender yet at the same time respectful declaration of love.

I hurry to the post station, and I find two letters, one from Valenglart telling me that Madame Morin would come to Chambéry if I would send a carriage for her. I open the other letter, and I see that it is signed Desarmoises. He wrote me from Lyons. He said that on his way from Chambéry he had met his daughter in a carriage with "a scoundrel" who had carried her off and that he had pinked him in the body with his sword but had been unable to stop the carriage which was taking them to Chambéry. He asked me to make inquiries and to persuade his daughter to return to Lyons, and, if she refused, to go to the police for assistance, acting in the name and at the behest of her unhappy father, who demanded her return; he assured me they were not married, and he implored me to use whatever means were in my power to do him this service of friendship. He asked me to answer him at once by express messenger, sending me his address.

I had no need to make inquiries. His daughter could only be my neighbor; but I was very far from taking any steps to send the charming creature back to Lyons.

Returning to the inn, I sent Leduc to Monsieur Valenglart in Grenoble with a four-seated carriage and a letter containing another addressed to Madame Morin, in which I told her that, since I had stopped at Chambéry only for her, I would await her convenience. After that I joyfully abandoned myself to the promising adventure which Fortune was offering me. Mademoiselle Desarmoises and her abductor had inspired me with feelings of the fondest friendship; I did not stop to discover if what was leading me on was vice or virtue.

I enter their room, and I see the surgeon dressing the young man's wound. It was not dangerous; it was suppurating. After the surgeon left, I congratulate him, I recommend diet and silence, and I return to my room for the rest of the day until suppertime, after handing Mademoiselle Desarmoises, in his presence, the letter I had just received from her father. I was sure that she would come and speak to me.

A quarter of an hour later I see her appear before me, looking downcast. She hands me the letter, asking me what I intend to do.

"Nothing. I shall consider myself fortunate if you will enable me to be of service to you."

"I breathe again."

"Could you believe anything else of me? The moment I saw you, you interested me. Are you and he married?"

"No, but we shall be as soon as we reach Geneva."

"Sit down and tell me the whole story. I know that your father has the misfortune to be in love with you and that you shun him."

"So he has told you that; I am glad of it. A year ago he arrived in Lyons, and a quarter of an hour later I took refuge with a friend of my mother's, for I cannot spend so much as an hour with him except at the risk of suffering the most monstrous violence. The young man whom you saw in bed is the only son of a merchant in Geneva; my father himself brought him to our house two years ago, and we immediately fell in love. After my father left, he asked my hand of my mother, who, my father being in Marseilles, did not feel that she had the right to decide my future. She wrote to him in Marseilles, and he replied that he would make up his mind when he returned to Lyons. Meanwhile my lover went to Geneva, where he obtained his father's consent to our marriage, and he came back to Lyons with all the necessary information and an excellent letter of recommendation to Monsieur Tolosan.[15] When my father arrived last year I fled, as I told you, and my lover had Monsieur Tolosan himself ask for my hand on his behalf. My father said he would answer him when I had come home. Monsieur Tolosan told me I should return to my father's house, and I replied that I would do so if my mother would come to fetch me and take me under her protection; but when Monsieur Tolosan told her this she said she knew her husband too well to bring me back home. He again asked my father for his consent, but to no purpose. A week or ten days later he left, then we learned that he was at Aix-en-Savoie, then at Turin, and finally, seeing that my father would not make up his mind, my lover proposed that I go away with him, having Monsieur Tolosan himself assure me that he would marry me in Geneva; my mother consented. So we set off a week ago. By ill luck we took the road through Savoy and met my father not far from this city. He recognized us, he made the carriage stop, he comes to me, he tries to force me to get out, I scream, my lover takes me in his arms, my father seizes his sword and plunges it into his body. Seeing people coming in response to my cries and the coachman's, and believing that he had killed my lover, he got on his horse again and fled at full gallop. I will show you the sword stained halfway up with blood, though the wound is only three inches deep."

"I have to answer his letter. I am trying to think how best to obtain his consent for you."

"There is no need of that. We shall be none the less married and none the less happy without it."

"That is true; but you cannot so lightly disregard your dowry."

"What dowry? He has nothing."

"But when your grandfather the Marquis Desarmoises dies, he will be rich."

"That's a fairy tale. My father has nothing but a small annuity for having served for thirty years as a courier. His father has been dead for twenty years. My mother and my sister live by the work of their hands."

Very much surprised by the shameless effrontery of a man who, after imposing on me in such a fashion, now put me in a position to discover the whole extent of his imposture, I said nothing more. We went to supper and spent three hours at the table. We talked of nothing but the situation, and the wounded man had only to listen to me to know what I thought on the subject. At nineteen, Mademoiselle Desarmoises had every quality to attract.

She wittily ridiculed the foolish passion with which, she told me, her father had loved her madly from the time she was eleven years old.

"And you always resisted him?"

"I resisted him only when he tried to carry his playing with me too far."

"And did that go on long?"

"Two years. I was thirteen when, seeing that I was ripe, he tried to make off with the fruit; but I screamed and jumped out of his bed stark naked and took refuge in my mother's, who from that day on would not let me sleep with him again."

"So you slept with him? How could your mother allow it?"

"She did not think he could love me like a lover, and I had no idea there was anything wrong in it. I believed that all he did to me and wanted me to do to him was only play."

"But you saved the jewel."

"I kept it for my lover."

At that the poor wounded man, weak though he was from hunger, laughed, and she rose from the table and gave him a quantity of kisses. I was in a state of excitement, for her faithful narrative had set the girl before my mind's eye more than stark naked. I thought that if I had been in her father's place she would not have escaped me so easily, and I forgave him for having forgotten in his love that she was his daughter. When she escorted me to my room I made her feel the effect her narrative had produced on me, and she laughed; but since my servants were there, I had to let her go.

The next morning very early I wrote to her father that his daughter was determined not to leave her lover, who was only slightly wounded, and that at Chambéry she was completely safe under the protection of the laws. I went to her room to show her my letter, and, finding her at a loss to express her gratitude, I asked her lover to permit her to embrace me; he opened his arms and said:

"And me too."

My hypocritical love then donned the mask of fatherly affection. I called them my children, and I offered them my purse full of gold if they needed it. The surgeon comes, and I go back to my room. Madame Morin arrived at eleven o'clock with her daughter, preceded by Leduc cracking his whip. I ran to embrace her, thanking her again and again for the favor she was doing me. The first piece of news she gave me was that her niece Mademoiselle Roman[16] was the King's mistress, lived in a fine house in Passy,[17] was five months gone with child [18] and on the way to becoming the Queen of France, as my divine horoscope had predicted.

"At Grenoble," she said, "no one talks of anything but you, and I advise you not to go back there, for you would never be allowed to leave. You will have the whole nobility at your feet and every woman who is eager to know her daughter's destiny. The whole town now believes in judicial astrology, and Valenglart is exultant. He has wagered a hundred louis against fifty that she will give birth to a prince; he is sure he will win; if he loses he will be laughed at."

"He will win. I am going to Paris, and I hope you will give me a letter to Madame Varnier, who will arrange for me to have the pleasure of seeing your niece."

"It is only right that you should, and I will give you a letter to her tomorrow."

I introduced Mademoiselle Desarmoises to her by her lover's family name, after asking her if she would stay for dinner. So she joined the three of us, and after dinner we went to the convent, where M. M., as soon as her aunt was announced, came down to the grating very much surprised at her visit and even more so when she saw me. When Madame Morin introduced me she told me that she had seen me five or six times at the spring at Aix, but that I could not recognize her for she had always gone there veiled. I admired her tact and her presence of mind. I thought she looked even more beautiful. After we spent an hour talking of Grenoble and M. M.'s old friends she left us to ask the Abbess to come down, and to fetch a young girl boarder of whom she was fond and whom she wanted to introduce to Madame Morin.

I availed myself of the opportunity to tell that lady that she was quite right about the resemblance and to ask her to do me the favor of arranging for me to breakfast with her[19] the next morning and of giving her a dozen pounds of chocolate which I had at my lodging. She urged me to give them to her myself.

She came back to the grating with the Abbess, two other young nuns, and the boarder, who was from Lyons and pretty enough to eat. While I, as in duty bound, took on all the nuns, Madame Morin told her niece that I wanted to try some chocolate which I had brought from Turin, if her lay sister would prepare it. M. M. told me to send her the chocolate, saying that she would be delighted to breakfast with us the next morning and with the nuns who were there.

I sent it to her as soon as we were back at the inn, and we supped in Madame Morin's room, still in the company of Mademoiselle Desarmoises, whose charms dazzled me more and more; but I talked to her only of M. M., with whom she felt sure I had had an intrigue at Aix.

The next morning, after the breakfast, I told her she would not find it so easy to give me a dinner for twelve at which we would all be seated side by side at the same table; she replied that we would all be at the same table, the only difference being that half of it would be in the convent and the other half, cut off by a grating, would be in the visiting room. I then said it was something I should like to see, if she would permit me to pay for it; and she consented. So the dinner was fixed for the next day. M. M. undertook to arrange everything and to invite six nuns; I said I would send her the wines. It was Madame Morin who, knowing my tastes, told her to spare no expense.

After escorting Madame Morin, her daughter, and Mademoiselle Desarmoises back to the inn I called on Monsieur Magnan,[20] to whom I had a letter of introduction from the Cavaliere Raiberti, and asked him to find me some good wines, and he gave me all sorts of them in more than sufficient quantities. I sent them to M. M.

Monsieur Magnan was a pleasant-looking, intelligent man, very well off, who lived in a very comfortable house outside the city and had a pleasant wife who had not yet lost her bloom and nine or ten children, among them four very pretty girls, the eldest of whom was nineteen. He was passionately fond of good living, and to convince me of it he invited me to dinner on the next day but one.

After having spent all day in the convent visiting room we would have supped in the wounded man's room in order not to leave him alone, if the surgeon had not told us he must be allowed to sleep.

The next day we went to the visiting room at eleven o'clock, and at noon dinner was announced. The table was a charming sight. The guests numbering twelve, two thirds of them were beyond the grating, for the nuns, counting the boarder, numbered eight and we only four; the grating was between us; but the table appeared to be continuous. I was seated beside M. M.; but to no purpose, for the wall was between us up to the sill, and above that was the grating. At my left I had Mademoiselle Desarmoises, who needed no help in keeping the nuns entertained with amusing stories. We who were outside had Costa and Leduc to wait on us, while the nuns within were waited on by their lay sisters. The abundance of dishes, the bottles, and the conversation made the dinner last three hours; we were all tipsy; and but for the grating I could easily have possessed all the eleven females present, who were in no state to reason. Mademoiselle Desarmoises had become so gay that, if I had not kept her in check, she would have scandalized all the nuns. I could not wait to have her alone with me in some place where nothing would interfere with my forcing her to quench the flame which, at no cost to herself, she had set raging in my soul from the beginning to the end of this unique dinner.

After coffee we removed to another visiting room where we remained until nightfall. Madame Morin took leave of her niece, and the exchange of thanks between the nuns and myself, in which each side tried to outdo the other, went on for a quarter of an hour. After I had told M. M. in everyone's hearing that I would do myself the honor of seeing her again before my departure, we went home, very well pleased with the occasion, which still delights me every time I remember it.

Madame Morin left me a letter to her cousin Madame Varnier, and I promised to write her from Paris whatever I managed to learn about her niece. She drove away at eight o'clock in the morning, preceded by my Spaniard, whom I ordered to convey my compliments to the caretaker's whole family. I went to dine with the pleasure-loving Magnan, finding everything delicious. I promised him I would stay with him whenever I was in Chambéry, and I kept my word.

Leaving Magnan's house, I went to call on M. M., who at once came to the grating alone. After thanking me for visiting her, and for having contrived to make such a brilliant occasion of it under the cloak of her aunt, she said my coming had disturbed her peace of mind.

"I am ready, my dear, to climb the garden wall more nimbly than your ill-omened lover"

"Alas! Believe me, you are already spied on. Everyone here is sure that we knew each other in Aix. Let us forget all, my dear friend, and so spare ourselves the torture of vain desires."

"Give me your hand."

"No, it is over. I still love you, but I cannot wait to know that you are gone. Your leaving will give me a true proof of your affection."

"You amaze me. You appear to be in perfect health; you look more beautiful than ever; I know that you are made for love. I do not understand how you can be content to live in continual abstinence."

"Alas, when one cannot have the reality, one plays at it. I will not hide it from you that I love my young boarder. It is a love which fosters my peace of mind; it is an innocent passion; her caresses suffice to quench a flame which would kill me if I did not diminish its intensity by make-believe."

"And your conscience does not suffer?"

"What I do does not trouble me."

"But you know it is a sin."

"And I confess it."

"And what does your confessor say?"

"Nothing. He absolves me, and I am happy."

"And does your little boarder confess too?"

"Of course; but she sees no reason to tell her confessor what she does not consider a sin."

"I am astonished that her confessor has not enlightened her, for enlightening the young mind is a great pleasure."

"Our confessor is a wise old man."

"Then I must leave without receiving so much as a kiss from you?"

"Nothing at all."

"May I come tomorrow? I shall leave the next day."

"Yes; but I will not come down alone, for the nuns might imagine something. I will bring my little boarder.

Then nothing can be said. Come after dinner, but to the other visiting room."

If I had not known M. M. at Aix her religion would have surprised me; but such was her character. She loved God, and she did not believe that he would fail in mercy because she had not had the strength to overcome nature. I returned to the inn annoyed that she would have nothing more to do with me, but sure that Mademoiselle Desarmoises would make up to me for it.

I found her sitting on the bed beside her lover, whom diet and fever had made extremely weak; she said she would come to supper in my room in order to let the patient rest, and the patient pressed my hand to show me his gratitude.

Having dined all too well at Magnan's, I ate very little; but Mademoiselle Desarmoises, who had not dined, ate and drank with ravenous appetite. She enjoyed my amazement. After my servants left I challenged her to drink glass for glass of punch with me, and it put her in the state of gaiety which wants nothing but to laugh and which laughs to find itself entirely deprived of will power and reason. However, I cannot say that I took advantage of her state of intoxication, for, all her natural voluptuousness being aroused, she could not wait to join in all the pleasures which I urged upon her until two o'clock in the morning, when, both incapable of more, we parted.

After sleeping until eleven o'clock I went to see her in her room, where I found her as fresh as a rose. When I asked her at what hour she wished to dine she replied in the most enchanting manner that she would rather save her appetite for supper. Her lover remarked to me, calmly and politely, that it was impossible to keep up with her.

"At drinking," I said.

"At drinking," he replied, "and at something else too."

She laughed, and hurried to kiss him.

This brief dialogue convinced me that Mademoiselle Desarmoises must adore the young man, for in addition to his being very handsome he was of just the temperament she needed. I went and dined alone. Leduc arrived from Grenoble just as I was leaving to see M. M. He told me that the caretaker's daughters had made him put off his departure while they wrote to me; and he gave me three letters and three dozen pairs of gloves which they had sent me as a present. Their letters were entirely devoted to urging to come and spend a month with them. I had not the courage to return to a town where, with the reputation I had made, I should have had to cast every girl's horoscope or become the most boorish of men by refusing her the favor.

After sending my name in to M. M. I entered the visiting room which she had indicated, and a moment later I saw her before me with the boarder who was the object of her affection. She was not yet twelve years of age, and her face denoted an alliance between sweetness and subtlety; dark, tall, well built, and tightly laced in a corset, she showed her entire bosom, delighted that those who saw it could not think she took pride in it, since all that she displayed was the place for what love might hope to find there. It was easy to guess what the unseen part of her figure was like, and her interesting face impelled one to judge most favorably of all the rest. I told her at once that she was very pretty and that she could not fail to make the man happy whom Heaven had destined to be her husband. I knew that the compliment would make her blush. It is cruel, but it is precisely there that seduction begins. A girl of her age who did not blush would be either an idiot or thoroughly indoctrinated and experienced in all the practices of libertinism. Nevertheless, the source of the blush which rises to a youthful face when its owner is confronted with an alarming idea is a puzzling problem. It may be modesty, it may be shame, and it may be a mixture of the two. It is a conflict between vice and virtue, in which virtue usually succumbs, being overthrown by those henchmen of vice, the desires. Knowing the boarder from what M. M. had told me, I could not but know what caused her to blush.

Pretending not to have noticed her blushing, I talked with M. M. for a moment, then returned to the attack. She had already recovered her composure.

"How old are you, my charming child?"

"Thirteen."

"You're mistaken, darling," said M. M. "You're not quite twelve yet."

"The time will come," I said, "when, instead of adding to your age, you will subtract from it."

"I will never lie, I'm very sure of that."

"Then you want to become a nun?"

"I have not yet received my vocation; but nothing will oblige me to lie even if I live in the world."

"You will begin to lie as soon as you have a lover."

"Then my love will lie too?"

"Of course he will."

"If that were the way of it, love would be a very base thing, but I don't believe it, for I love my dear friend here and I never hide the truth from her."

"But you will not love a man as you love a woman."

"Exactly the same."

"No, for you don't sleep with her, and you would sleep with your lover."

"That makes no difference. My love would be the same."

"What! You wouldn't rather sleep with me than with M. M.?"

"No indeed, for you are a man and you would see me."

"Then you must know you are ugly."

At that she turned to M. M. with her pretty face red as fire, asking her if she was really ugly. She replied, bursting with laughter, that on the contrary she was very pretty, and she took her between her knees. I said that her corset was too tightly laced, for her waist could not possibly be so small. She replied that her corset was so loose that I could put my hand under it. I said that I did not believe it, whereupon she turned her little boarder so that her side was toward me and against the grating and told me to put out my hand; at the same time she pulled up her dress. I put my hand under it, and I found that M. M. was right, but I cursed the shift and the grating which prevented my arm from going farther.

"I believe," I said to M. M., not withdrawing my hand, "that this is a little man; may I convince myself of it?"

But at the same time that I asked her permission, my hand went to work without waiting for it to be granted, and to such good purpose that I convinced and more than convinced myself not only that the boarder was a charming little girl but that M. M. took no less pleasure than she did in my curiosity. The little girl drew away, bestowing a kiss on her dear friend, whose smiling countenance assured her that she had not committed any great sin in letting herself be thus explored; but, on my side, surprise had almost stupefied me. The little girl asked permission to absent herself for a moment. I must have been the cause of it.

"Are you aware," I said to M. M., "that the revelation you have procured me makes me unhappy?"

"Why?"

"Because, having found your boarder charming, I am dying to devour her."

"I'm sorry, for you cannot do any more than you have done; but even if it were possible I would not let you have her, for you would spoil her for me."

"Give me your hand."

"Certainly not. I don't want to see."

"But you are not angry with my hand or with my eyes."

"On the contrary, if you have had pleasure I am very glad, and if you have awakened desires in her she will love me the more."

"Oh that the three of us could be together in perfect freedom!"

"Impossible."

"Are you sure no one saw us?"

"Perfectly sure."

"The sill of this grating kept many charms from me."

"Why didn't you go to the other one? It is lower."

"Let us go there."

"No, for I couldn't think up a reason."

"I will come tomorrow, and I will leave for Lyons at nightfall."

The little girl returned, and I rose and stood facing her. I had a quantity of charms on my watch chains, and I had not had time to rearrange my clothing properly. She noticed it at once; and my charms gave her curiosity a very plausible pretext.

"You have a lot of pretty things there," she said. "May I look?"

"As much as you like, and touch them too."

At that, M. M., foreseeing what would happen, said that she would return. In no time at all I made the too curious boarder lose all her interest in the charms. She did not try to hide her amazement or the pleasure she took in satisfying her curiosity about an object entirely new to her and all of whose parts she found herself at perfect liberty to examine. She desisted from her investigation when she was startled by an eruption the agreeable sight of which I took the greatest pleasure in providing for her.

Seeing M. M. slowly returning, I quickly rang down the curtain and seated my self. My watches being still on the sill, she asked the little girl if she had found the charms pretty; she answered yes, but soberly. In less than two hours she had made so long a journey that she had good reason to be thoughtful. I spent the rest of the day telling M. M. the whole story of my journey to Grenoble, Marseilles, Genoa, Rome, and Naples, promising that I would come to finish it the next day at the same hour. The little girl said that she was curious to know how I had ended matters with the Duke of Matalona's mistress.

Back at the inn, I supped with Mademoiselle Desarmoises, and after paying her the due tribute of a lover I went off to bed, assuring her that it was entirely on her account that I was still delaying my departure. The next day, after dining with her, I went to the convent visiting room. After sending in my name to M. M. I went to the grating with the low sill.

She came alone, but at once told me that the little girl would soon follow her.

"Yesterday," she said, "you set her on fire; she told me everything and she indulged in every kind of wantonness, each time calling me her husband. You have seduced her, and I am very glad you are leaving, for I believe she would go mad. Wait till you see how she is dressed."

"Are you sure she won't tell?"

"Perfectly sure. All I ask is that you do nothing to her in my presence. When I see that the time has come, I will leave."

In she comes, as gay as possible, with a dress which is open in front and a skirt which reaches only halfway down her legs.

She has scarcely sat down before she reminds me that I had left off my story with Donna Leonilda in bed, and I go on to the end when her mother showed her to me stark naked. At that M. M. left, and the little girl quickly asked what I had done to assure myself that my daughter was a virgin. Stretching out my arm and putting my hand into the opening of her skirt, I made her feel what

I had done, enjoying her emotion, which she did not trouble to hide. She then gave me her hand, so that I could use it for the same purpose; but M. M. came back.

"It doesn't matter," the little girl said, "I've told her everything; she's kind, she won't tell."

I went on with my story, and when I finally came to the place where I described the charming obstructed girl and recounted all the efforts I had vainly made to satisfy her, the little boarder became so curious that, to enable me to teach her, she exposed herself in the most charming of all postures. M. M., seeing that I had risen, fled just as I was about to break my promise to her; but the boarder told me to kneel on the sill and leave it to her. I obeyed, guessing her intention. She was moved to eat me, and she may have hoped to swallow me; but the too great pleasure she aroused in my soul liquefied my heart. She did not leave me until she was convinced of my exhaustion. I sat down, and in gratitude pressed my lips to the sweet mouth which had sucked the quintessence of my soul and my heart.

I left the two angels toward the end of the day, saying good-by and promising that I would see them again the following year.

Back at the inn, I took leave of the wounded man, whom I vainly urged to make free of my purse; he assured me that he was not in need of money. I promised him I would oblige Desarmoises to refrain from proceeding against him if he ever went back to Lyons, and I kept my word. His fiancée came to sup with me and to sport until midnight, when she left me so that I could go to sleep until daybreak, when I had ordered horses.

I arrived in Lyons the next day, going to lodge at the "Parc"[21] and at once sending word to Desarmoises. I told him, concealing nothing, that his daughter's charms had seduced me, that her future husband was a most amiable young man, and that he had every reason to consent to their marriage, though he had no need of his consent. He did all that I demanded of him when I said that I could continue to be his friend only on that condition. He drew up a document, signed by two witnesses, which I sent to the wounded man in Chambéry by express messenger the same day.

Desarmoises insisted on my dining with his wife and his younger daughter in his mean house. The girl had not the slightest charm, and his wife filled me with pity.

Since I had to go to Paris, I gave him the money he needed to wait for me in Strassburg with my Spanish valet. Monsieur de Rochebaron was in the country. I thought I was wise to take only Costa with me, but I was wrong. I took the road through the Bourbonnais, and I reached Paris on the third day, going to lodge at the Hôtel du Saint-Esprit[22] in the Rue Saint-Esprit.

Since I needed to go to bed I at once wrote a note to Madame d'Urfé, sending it to her by Costa. I promised that I would go to dine with her the next day. Costa was quite handsome but spoke French very badly and was rather stupid, so I was sure that Madame d'Urfé would take him for some extraordinary being. She replied that she awaited me with the utmost impatience.

"Tell me," I said to Costa, "how the lady received you and how she read my note."

"She looked at me in a mirror, speaking words which I could not understand; after that she burned incense, walking around the room three times. Then she looked at me closely, smiled, and told me to wait outside for her answer."

Volume Eight

CHAPTER I[1]

My stay in Paris and my departure for Strassburg, where I find La Renaud. My misfortunes in Munich and my unhappy stay in Augsburg.

AT TEN o'clock in the morning, refreshed by the pleasant feeling that I was once more in Paris, which, for all its imperfections, is so attractive that no city in the world can dispute its right to be considered the city of cities, I went to see my dear Madame d'Urfé, who received me with open arms. She told me that young D'Aranda was well and that, if I wished, she would have him to dine with us the next day. I said I should be glad to see him, then I assured her that the operation by which she was to be reborn a man would take place as soon as Querilinte,[2] one of the three heads of the Rosy Cross, had been freed from the dungeons of the Inquisition in Lisbon.

"That is why," I added, "I must go to Augsburg in the course of the next month, where, on the pretext of a mission I have obtained from the government, I shall confer with Lord Stormont[3] with a view to securing the adept's release. To that end, Madame, I shall need a good letter of credit and some watches and snuffboxes to bestow as occasion demands, for we shall have to win over some of the profane."

"I will gladly see to all that, my dear friend, but you need be in no hurry, for the Congress is not to assemble until September."

"It will never be held, Madame, believe me; but the ambassadors of the belligerent powers will confer even so. If, contrary to my expectations, a congress should be held I should have to go to Lisbon.[4] In any case I promise you we shall meet again this winter; I shall have to devote the two weeks I shall spend here to defeating a plot of Saint-Germain's."

"Saint-Germain! He would not dare come back to Paris."

"On the contrary, I am certain he is here now, but he is in hiding. The government messenger who ordered him to leave for London convinced him that the English Ambassador was not taken in by the demand for his surrender which Count d'Affry made to the States General in the King's name." [5]

This whole tale was built on nothing but probabilities, and it will be seen that I guessed right.

Madame d'Urfé then congratulated me on the charming girl who had left Grenoble at my instigation.[6] Valenglart had written her the whole story.

"The King adores her," she said, "and she will soon make him a father. I went to see her in Passy with the Duchess of Lauraguais." [7]

"She will give birth to a son who will make France happy, and thirty years from now you will see wonderful things,[8] which I am unfortunately forbidden to tell you before your transformation. Did you speak to her of me?"

"No, but I am sure you will find means to see her, if only at Madame Varnier's."

She was right. But now for what chance brought to pass, as if to urge the excellent woman on to ever more insane delusions.

About four o'clock we were talking of my travels and our plans, when she took a fancy to go to the Bois de Boulogne. She asked me to accompany her, and I acceded to her request. When we were near Madrid[9] we got out of the carriage and, making our way deep into the wood, sat down under a tree.

"It was eighteen years ago today," she said, "that I fell asleep alone in the very place where we are. While I slept the divine Horosmadis[10] descended from the sun and stayed with me until I woke. As I opened my eyes I saw him leave and ascend to Heaven. He left me pregnant with a daughter, whom he took from me ten years ago, doubtless to punish me for having so far forgotten myself for a moment as to love a mortal after him. My divine Iriasis[11] looked like him."

"Are you perfectly certain that Monsieur d'Urfé was not her father?"

"Monsieur d'Urfé never had intercourse with me again after he saw me lying beside the divine Anael."[12]

"He is the Genius of Venus. Was he squint-eyed?"

"Extremely so. Then you know that he squints?"

"I also know that in the amorous crisis he ceases to squint."

"I did not notice that. He, too, left me because of a sin I committed with an Arab."

"He had been sent to you by the Genius of Mercury,[13] who is Anael's enemy."

"It must be so, and it was a grievous misfortune."

"No, your meeting with him made you fit for transformation."

We were walking toward the carriage when suddenly Saint-Germain came in sight; but as soon as he noticed us he turned back and disappeared into another walk.

"Did you see him?" I said. "He is working against us, but our Geniuses made him tremble."

"I am thunderstruck. I shall go to Versailles tomorrow morning to tell the Duke of Choiseul he is here. I wonder what he will say."

When we were back in Paris I took leave of the lady and went on foot to call on my brother, who lived near the Porte Saint-Denis.[14] He received me with cries of joy, as did his wife, whom I found very pretty but very unhappy, for Heaven had refused her husband the power to prove that he was a man, and she had the misfortune to be in love with him. I say the misfortune, for her love made her faithful; otherwise, since her husband treated her very well and left her perfectly free, she could easily have remedied her misfortune. She was consumed with grief because, having no idea that my brother was impotent,[15] she imagined that he deprived her of the object of her desires only because he did not reciprocate the love she felt for him; and her mistake was excusable, for her husband looked a Hercules, and indeed he was one in every respect except that in which she wished to find him so. Her grief brought on a consumption, of which she died five or six years later.[16] She did not die to punish her husband, but we shall see later that her death did in fact prove to be a punishment to him.

The next day I called on Madame Varnier to give her Madame Morin's letter. I was cordially received, and she was so good as to tell me that there was no one whose acquaintance she would rather make than mine, for her niece had told her so many things about me that she was extremely curious to learn more. Curiosity is well known to be woman's greatest infirmity.

"You shall see my beautiful niece, Monsieur," she added, "and she herself will tell you all her circumstances and the state of her heart."

She immediately wrote her a note and enclosed Madame Morin's letter in the same envelope.

"If you want to know what answer my niece sends me," said Madame Varnier, "stay for dinner."

I accepted, and she immediately gave orders that she was at home to no one.
